Today we looked forward to getting an AK 47. But Gerald [Cruz] thought it best to invest his money. Instead we got a Beretta 25 cal.

If I do my theory about me astralling [occult astral projection] all those times and not even know it... Also buy real estate, stocks, bonds, etc. Until we have land in all 50 states. From there spread until we can put someone in authority "under us" in all 50 states. With them speaking for us. We could run this country. Then soon the world.

Note: Some occultists attempt to use the practice of "astral projection." In a meditative state, they concentrate on another place they want to go, then attempt to travel "out-of-body" through time and space in extremely short periods of time.

It seems some people have actually been able to develop this skill, as others have been able to develop other paranormal abilities such as mental telepathy, telekinesis, and so on. Some of these psychic phenomena, such as telepathy and telekinesis (being able to move objects with the mind) have proved demonstrable in studies at places like Duke University. (Some also believe astral projection, for instance, is demonically aided.)

Also, although this diary entry is somewhat vague and fragmented, it is apparent the cult ideology has sunk in, and the next stage, in this cult member's mind, is to proliferate it throughout the planet. (Over time, cult members start to believe their way is not only right — but the only way.)

I also went to my Dad's house to get some house placements for the chart Gerald's doing: "Crowley's Chart."

Note: This, again, is a reference to one of the most "famous" satanists of modern time: Aleister Crowley.

Gerald hurt his neck first thing this morning. It really hurt me to see him in pain. I offered my life, as a sacrifice, for Gerald's health...

Note: This cult member had become so brainwashed and controlled by the high priest, that after awhile he apparently would have done anything for Cruz and the cult — including murder. And in the early morning hours of May 21, 1990, at 5223 Elm Street, he apparently did just that.

Defense lawyer Paul Ligda would later argue that mind control and fear of Cruz drove this cult member to help murder the four people. Ligda called a number of character witnesses, including the cult member's mother and sister, and two former neighbors, who said the defendant was a "...kind, quiet and a good boy," according to a Modesto Bee article.

It took a jury less than three hours to find this cult member guilty of four counts of first-degree murder, and conspiracy to commit first-degree murder.

MIND CONTROL

Apparently this cult member went through a complete personality metamorphosis, and in a relatively short time. Steven Hassan in his book Combatting Cult Mind Control defines cult mind control as: "...a system which disrupts an individual's identity. The identity is made up of elements such as beliefs, behavior, thought processes, and emotions that constitute a definite pattern.

"Under the influence of mind control, a person's original identity, as formed by family, education, friendships, and most importantly that person's own free choices, becomes replaced with another identity, often one that he would not have chosen for himself without tremendous social pressure.

"...He takes on a totalized ideology that, when internalized, supersedes his prior belief system."

And to take all this to another level, children born into groups like trans-generational satanic cults are indoctrinated from the start — never even having a prior identity (i.e., not knowing any semblance of "normal from abnormal"). Thus, the installation of ideology is that much more potent, that much more ingrained.

Note: For as "close-knit and sophisticated" as the Stanislaus County cult appeared, according to reports, and as you will see in some of the later chapters, it could virtually be considered a minor league baseball team in comparison to some of the ultra-highly sophisticated, and connected, satanists currently playing on a major-league level around the world.

ALEISTER CROWLEY

Cerny said the California cult was following some of the teachings of Aleister Crowley, one of the most public and celebrated occult "black magicians" of modern times.

He was born in England in 1875. In 1898 he became a member of the Order of the Golden Dawn, a magical society organized by Samuel Liddell (MacGregor) Maters, an occult scholar who had translated works on the Kabbalah (the occult version of "the tree of life") and magic rituals.

Crowley eventually formed his own "magical society," the Order of the Silver Star, and eventually moved to the United States.

During a libel trial in the early 1930s, public disclosure of Crowley's sensational lifestyle caused him to be denounced as "The Wickedest Man in the World."

In his book Magick in Theory and Practice, Crowley writes about one of his occultic beliefs (one apparently held by many satanists practicing ritual abuse):

> The blood is the life... any living thing is a storehouse of energy varying in quantity according to the size and health... at the death of the animal this energy is liberated suddenly. The animal should therefore be killed within the Circle, or the Triangle, as the case may be, so that its energy cannot escape... For the highest spiritual working one must accordingly choose that victim which contains the greatest and purest force. A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim.

Note: Cult "circles" demonstrate a symbolic show of unity, and are usually formed around the person being sexually abused, tortured, sacrificed. Also, satanism is the antithesis of Christianity. Much satanic doctrine has been formulated as the reverse of Christian principles. In the Catholic Church, for instance, partaking of the consecrated bread and wine is "eating Jesus' body and drinking His blood," called for in the Scriptures. Christians believe the power is in the "Spirit." Satanists turn this around, drinking the blood of their victims and cannibalizing the flesh because they believe that's where some of their spiritual power source comes from.

SUPPRESSION?

Ritual crime investigator Randy Cerny expresses frustration that the cult-related aspects of these types of ritual crimes are often ignored — for any number of reasons. Investigative reporter Michael Newton shares the frustration.

Newton did extensive research on satanic-cult-related crime for his book Raising Hell. And at the outset of the book he writes:

> In case after case, authorities have deliberately ignored or suppressed cult related evidence to avoid spooking judges and jurors. Crimes with clear cult involvement are too often advertised as "only" drug-related, "simple" child molestation, and so on.

The pattern of suppression continues with yet another satanic-cult-related case in Massachusetts. One of the leaders of a satanic cult there, Carl Drew, was sentenced to life in prison for a ritual slaying (sacrifice). (There will be more on the particulars of this case in a later chapter.)

However, as other researchers have found, Denver investigative journalist Roy Blake writes in his book Objective Evil: Satanic Cults in U.S. Intelligence:

> As in what seems like most cases with alleged satanic cult involvement, authorities attempt to downplay the role of satanism in the crimes. The New Bedford Times reported on Sept. 25, 1981 that the trial judge [in the Massachusetts case] had forbid mention of any "satanic cults." The cows were well out of the barn by then, however. Newspapers in the area had printed well over 50 articles mentioning the satanic tie since the Standard Times first reported the deaths might have been related to a satanic cult in the area.
> In attempting to downplay the satanic nature of the crimes, authorities rationalized that in the first instance the crimes were sufficiently heinous to stand on their own merits without dragging the satanic "red herring" into the courtroom. The District Attorney worried that mention of satanic activity might result in a prejudiced atmosphere that defense attorneys might be able to take advantage of during the appeal process.

Likewise, for instance, in the early 1990s six children came forward in Evansville, Indiana claiming they had been exposed to satanic ritual abuse in school and other community settings. Victim advocate Rick Doninger spoke out publicly about the case in Evansville and aided in getting one of the children to safety, he said.

The children's case was never brought to trial. However, Doninger was eventually brought to trial for his part in trying to help the children, he said. (The charges: assisting a criminal and interference.) Doninger said he welcomed going to trial as a way of keeping the satanic aspects before the public. However, he said, just before going to trial Doninger's lawyer was informed the judge ruled there would be no mention of satanism during the trial.

Yet despite who knows how many attempts at apparent suppression, Michael Newton also writes in Raising Hell, ...cult related killers stand convicted of murder in 23 states and at least nine foreign countries. Numerous other occultists are now serving time for practicing their 'faith' through acts of arson, rape, assault, cruelty to animals, and similar crimes. Courts in seven American states and in Canada have sustained charges of ritual child abuse in the years since 1984.

In addition, Newton goes on: "Cases involving multiple defendants — 'cults' by definition — have been successfully prosecuted in at least 11 states, with similar convictions recorded in Latin America, Asia, and Africa."

In 1989, in a somewhat rural town about forty miles west of Cleveland, Ohio, three young men — two aged 18 and one aged 20 — were indicted for breaking into a cemetery. Excerpts from a Cleveland Plain Dealer newspaper at the time read:

> Three Norwalk area residents charged with opening two graves, beheading the corpses and stealing the skulls, were part of a cult that had recently gotten instructions on how to sacrifice babies to satan, Norwalk police said yesterday.
> "We're taking this very seriously," he [Police

> Chief Gary Dewalt] said. "They admitted sacrificing small animals to satan. They said they smashed their heads and drank the blood. One of them has mutilated himself with a knife. These aren't just kids fooling around."

According to a May 29, 1994, CNN transcript: A group of people were arrested in Chicago for the ritual sacrifices of some 40 animals — which were found inside an apartment complex. The report merely said the sacrifices were tied to "religious" beliefs.

Although it is not clear whether specific satanic worship was involved in this particular case, one has to wonder how many times, say, the media has shied away from the "s" word because of different pressures, religious prejudices, and so on — just like some court systems have.

MORE BACKGROUND

Also, in research for the book Objective Evil: Satanic Cults in U.S. Intelligence, Blake said he had found two possible European sources for trans-generational, "super-secret" satanic cults in the United States. In California there is good evidence for the existence of Aleister Crowley's Ordo Templi Orientis (O.T.O.) as early as the 1940s, and maybe even the 1930s. (Again, the cult in Salida, California, had been following the teachings of Crowley.) Charles Manson, said Blake, had at least some contact with Ordo Templi Orientis. And indeed, the "helter skelter" vision of a coming race war was originally one of O.T.O.'s teachings.

(Temple of Set (satan) leader Col. Michael Aquino, writes Blake, believes the black magic workings of O.T.O. were actually responsible for his birth in 1946.)

Another possible source for these sophisticated cults in the United States, said Blake, is German, and in fact may stem directly from the occult religion of the Nazi SS. And its successors may help explain the prevalence, for instance, of trans-generational satanic cults in areas of the upper Midwest that have a large German ethnicity.

Note: In Satanism in America by Bart Larson and Wendell Amstutz, Aleister Crowley is described as: "Clearly the most influential occultist of the 20th century, and the father of modern day satanism. He is the author of The Equinox*;* The Book of the Law*; and* Magick in Theory and Practice*."*

Col. Michael Aquino was formerly tied to Anton LaVey, who is the founder of the Church of Satan, and author of the Satanic Bible. Aquino is a lieutenant colonel in the U.S. Army, and authored The Book of Coming Forth by Night. Aquino established the Temple of Set religion in the United States in 1975. ("Set" is an Egyptian name for satan.)

JOHN DOE NO. 60

A San Francisco alcoholic drifter, tragically, became another of these satanic ritual sacrifices in the spring of 1988. According to a May 5, 1988, San Francisco Chronicle article:

> Satanic killer Clifford St. Joseph was sentenced to 34 years to life in prison yesterday for gruesome crimes the judge said "...would astonish the imagination of Edgar Allen Poe or the Marquis de Sade."
> St. Joseph, 46, was accused of participating in the torture, mutilation and ritual murder of a drunken drifter known only as John Doe No. 60... The victim had a pentagram carved on his chest, lash marks across his buttocks, a stab wound to his neck, wax in his right eye, and a sliced lip. The naked body was virtually drained of blood. Police concluded that he had died in a satanic ritual.
> Investigators said that St. Joseph appeared to be part of a satanic cult that involved men of means in San Francisco's gay community.

And there's more.

In the book Raising Hell, Michael Newton writes that nine days after the body was found, police were called to a Stillman Street apartment where they found St. Joseph dressed in a black robe, companion Maurice Bork, 26, stripped to the waist, his face daubed with cosmetics; and another man, Edward Spela, 26, passed out from drugs.

In the middle of the room was a 19-year-old man, who was lying on the floor handcuffed and surrounded by candles. A copy of the Satanic Bible sat out on a coffee table.

According to the San Francisco Chronicle article, this victim told police he had been secretly drugged, chained to a fireplace, gang raped, and forced into sexual acts with a dog during the three days before police arrived. (Many of the same components cult survivors report.) St. Joseph had apparently intended to sacrifice him to the devil as well, he said.

What's more, Newton writes that a San Francisco investigator on the case said he believed even others are linked to the cult, and that their victims are homeless drifters "...not necessarily confined to San Francisco." Newton concludes by noting the investigator called it a gay satanic cult, and that St. Joseph's correspondence reportedly yielded connections with Ordo Templi Orientis, which includes a homosexual 11th degree for members who are so inclined.

UNSPEAKABLE ACTS

Satanism in America co-author Bart Larson has heard some of the most horrific stories imaginable from those who have reported being involved with satanic rituals. Larson was the chaplin at a psychiatric hospital in Missouri for five years.

"I have had a significant number of people describe in great detail human sacrifices they have seen," said Larson.

One of the most horrendous stories was one about a teenage runaway boy who was abducted by a satanic cult made up of both teenagers and adults. As part of the ritual/torture in this particular sacrifice, it was reported the boy was cut open in multiple places and raped in the knife wounds.

This story was relayed to Larson by a teenage youth trying to break away from the cult.

"He told me the story," said Larson, "because he wanted to get it off his chest. As he told it, there was stark terror in his eyes." Larson said the terror not only stemmed from reliving the horrible incident, but also, by revealing it, he was afraid the cult would track and kill him.

Larson said often the person relating the story will tremble almost uncontrollably, convulsively cry, retch... "There is so much emotional affect," said Larson. "For most of them, there just seems no good reason they'd make this up."

Larson said a number of the ritual sacrifice stories he's heard have included victims who have been runaways, hitchhikers, illegal immigrants, drifters...

A highly respected Colorado therapist (who requests anonymity) said he had a similar experience in the late 1970s. At the time, he said he was a psychologist at a U.S. Armed Services Alcoholic Rehab Center. He said two enlisted men came to him at the same time, reporting they were involved with a satanic cult.

They said they had gotten involved because of all the sexual activity in the cult, but one night they witnessed a human sacrifice and got spooked. They now wanted to get out, but were afraid of the legal consequences — as well as being extremely afraid of what the cult might do to them if they defected.

"As they relayed the story," said the therapist, "they both looked extremely afraid, extremely guilty." The therapist said he referred them to a lawyer, but doesn't know what became of the situation.

Chapter 3

ARE THE MEMORIES REAL?

For years, satanic ritual abuse victims have been reporting variations of the same thing: ritual sexual abuse, torture, sacrifice...

However, some are questioning whether childhood repressed memories of sexual abuse and ritual abuse are, in fact, valid. And debate has also risen about the validity of the phenomenon of "recovered memories" in general.

Contention exists people are merely making memories up to, for instance, get on Geraldo. Or perhaps, they are acting out an unfounded malicious vendetta. Some also believe therapists are planting these "memories" in people's minds in order to pad their case loads and keep people in therapy longer. Or, some say, it is merely psychological "quackery."

FMSF CONTROVERSY

In fact, an advocacy group made up primarily of parents whose children have accused them of sexual abuse, ritual abuse..., has started up and is proffering some of the latter allegations. Headquartered in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (FMSF) has taken to the air waves, to the courtrooms, and so on, trying to disprove some of the "alleged" victim stories of abuse.

However, despite its scientific sounding title, there is no clinically acknowledged "false memory syndrome" at this time, said Judith Herman, M.D., an associate clinical professor of psychiatry at Harvard Medical School, and author of Trauma and Recovery.

"The very name FMSF is prejudicial and misleading," said Herman. "There is no such syndrome, and we have no evidence that the reported memories are false. We know only that they are disputed."

Besides accused parents, FMSF has been able to enlist some professionals to function as spokespeople to the media, to serve as "expert" trial witnesses, and so on. However, there are some apparent ironies that have surfaced in connection with the FMSF organization.

The following is an excerpt from a February 29, 1992, FMSF Newsletter where the organization claims it is:

> "...not in the business of representing pedophiles... We are a good looking bunch of people: graying hair, well-dressed, healthy and smiling... Just about every person is someone you would likely find interesting and want to count as a friend."

Part of this FMSF claim might be called into question, given the following.

According to a December 1995 Treating Abuse Today, Dr. Harold Merskey, a member of the Scientific and Professional Advisory Board of FMSF, appeared as an expert witness in the civil trial of a Toronto doctor who had earlier admitted to pedophilia.

Before the Discipline Committee of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, Dr. Leo Pilo pled guilty to sexual abuse of young girls that had come to his practice between 1967 and 1988. Some of the allegations included: manipulating the clitoris and nipples, sexual comments, using a vibrator inside the vagina, masturbating himself to orgasm.

According to the article, the college revoked Pilo's certificate to practice medicine, noting "his abhorrent behavior has been repugnant in the extreme..."

One of the doctor's victims, named in the Discipline Committee hearings, said as a result of the sexual abuse, she suffered such things as sexual dysfunction later in life, relationship problems, an eating disorder and depression (all common to many sexual abuse victims). She took the doctor to trial. He pled innocent.

According to Treating Abuse Today:

In civil court, Pilo's case unfolded in a way that Michele Landsberg, a Toronto Star columnist, characterized as "astounding."

> What is most astounding about this case is that although everyone in the court room presumably knew about Dr. Pilo's published confession, and though many other victims of his abuse had come forward with strikingly similar details of his sickening sexual molestations, none of this was allowed. (1995, p. K1)
> The court reluctantly disallowed this evidence because, under the Ontario Regulated Health Professions Act, passed in 1993, no material heard before the College Discipline Committee can be used in subsequent civil suits. Thus, although Pilo lost his certificate of registration to practice medicine, based on evidence and his own confession of sexually abusing young girls, the civil court could not allow any of this material.
> Merskey, on the staff of the University of Western Ontario (London, Ontario), took the stand on Pilo's behalf. Merskey testified that D.M.M. [the "alleged" victim] probably suffered from "false memory syndrome." He offered this diagnosis despite the overwhelming evidence against Pilo given by five complainants, and despite Pilo's own earlier admission of pedophilia. Merskey reached his psychiatric diagnostic conclusions about D.M.M. in absentia, without the benefit of any direct clinical examination of her.

In a November 25, 1995, Toronto Star, columnist Michele Landsberg writes of the case: "So why does Dr. Pilo now reverse his plea? Perhaps because he suffers from False Innocence Syndrome..."

The following is another apparent disparity in regard to the FMSF claim about not being in the business of representing pedophiles:

Ralph Underwager was one of the leading spokespeople for the FMSF. He lectured across the country on false memory syndrome, was used as an "expert" in numerous alleged abuse trials, and was repeatedly quoted in the media.

Underwager was also quoted in The Journal of Paedophilia, published in Amsterdam (January 15, 1993). The following is one of his quotes:

> "Paedophiles can boldly and courageously affirm what they choose. They can say what they want is to find the best way to love. I am also a theologian, and as a theologian I believe it is God's will that there be a closeness and intimacy, unity of flesh between people. ...[P]aedophilia is an acceptable expression of God's will for love and unity among human beings."

Underwager goes on to say:

> "The solution that I'm suggesting is that paedophilia become much more positive. They should directly attack the concept, the image, the picture of the pedophile as an evil, wicked, and a reprehensible exploiter of children."

What's more, Underwager actually is a theologian. He earned an M.Div. from Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Missouri, and a Ph.D. from the University of Minnesota. He has been director of the Institute for Psychological Therapies in Minnesota. He also reports being a member of the National Council for Children's Rights.

Again, Underwager was a leading spokesperson for the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. Should there be cause for concern some FMSF members have other agendas?

(And for those who don't have conscious agendas, could they, perhaps, have unconscious ones? That is, they may be defending acts of perpetration they actually blocked out. Psychological studies show that people that have been abused in childhood, often become perpetrators themselves as parents — whether that's verbal, physical, sexual, or ritual abuse. And, theoretically, if they blocked the trauma out in their own childhood, they may actually, as adults, block out some, or all, of the trauma involved with their own perpetration as well.)

"When I look at people like Underwager, I'm incredulous, sickened and outraged," said Gail Carr Feldman, Ph.D. She also said she is appalled such a person is a representative of the psychological field to the general public.

Feldman works with both sexual abuse and ritual abuse victims in Albuquerque, New Mexico. She has had to debate "false memory" people, most recently on The Larry King Show, and said she is extremely disturbed by some of the FMSF tactics. "It seems whenever someone reports ritual abuse anymore, someone appears and tries to discredit them," said Feldman.

Likewise, she said she is also disturbed by the trend of some sociologists, whom Feldman refers to as "academic opportunists," to jump in and offer opinions to the media "...about something [ritual abuse] they know absolutely nothing about." For instance, said Feldman, some sociologists refer to the ritual abuse phenomenon as delusional and merely an "urban legend."

URBAN LEGENDS

In the book The Choking Doberman and Other "New" Urban Legends, J.H. Brunvand explains urban legends as "small tales," often first told as a hoax or a joke, spread by gossip, and retold as true by those who actually believe the story to be true. The honest, earnest, emotionally congruent telling of these tales by the naive believer gives them the ultimate persuasive power.

In a chapter for the book Out of Darkness, Dr. George Greaves, Ph.D., prominent lecturer and adjunct professor of psychology at Georgia State University, gives an example of an urban legend: "An urban legend I have heard in various forms since childhood centers on New York children who take vacations in Florida with their parents. While there, their parents purchase cute little baby alligators. Having no real place to keep alligators in their New York apartments, or tiring of having to care for them, the children would, so the story goes, dispose of them by flushing them down the toilet, where they subsequently wound up in the city sewers. In this warm, damp environment, the alligators naturally flourished, and grew into enormous and dangerous creatures that leave the sewers at night, pushing up manhole covers, in search of pet dogs and cats and, yes, even young children to eat."

Later, Greaves cites a personal correspondence of Brunvand's written in 1990, in which the author related reports of ritual abuse survivors seem to him to be very different from "urban legends" in several particulars. For instance:

1) They are told as either first-person victim accounts, or as first-person eye-witness accounts.

2) They are told not only as true, but with often terrifying emotion.

3) The reporters of these stories often provide some sort of proof of what they are saying, such as scars on their bodies.

4) They tell not one, but many such stories.

5) The stories they tell, though ghastly in nature, do not circulate in the general culture in the detail in which they are told.

6) These stories are not brief. A single story may take from one to many hours to tell.

7) Unlike urban legends, there is no measure of fun or delight in them. There is no punch line, no "gotcha!" outcome. One never laughs at these stories, or takes any form of delight in hearing them.

No... one doesn't:

> Fitchburg, Massachusetts (UPI) — The alleged leader of a devil-worship cult was found guilty of first degree murder Friday in the ritual killing of a young Fall River, Mass., prostitute last year.
> Carl Drew, 26, stood pale and expressionless as the verdict was announced. He was immediately sentenced to life imprisonment by Superior Court Judge Francis W. Keating...
> Miss Marsden was allegedly killed, mutilated and beheaded by Drew and two others in a blood-soaked night-time ritual in a wooded area because she wanted to leave the cult.

LEGISLATION

This verdict came March 13, 1981, in Massachusetts. That state must not be going for the "urban legend" explanation much at all. In fact, in 1993, House Bill 1689 — to prohibit certain ritualistic acts — was introduced.

Part of this bill reads: "Whoever commits any of the following acts upon, with, or in the presence of a child age 18 or under shall be punished by imprisonment...

a) Actually commits or simulates the killing of, or tortures, mutilates or sacrifices any animal or human being.

b) Forces the ingestion, injects or in any other way applies the use of a narcotic drug, hallucinogen or anaesthetic or mind altering substance for the purpose of dulling sensitivity, cognition, resistance, memory or to distort perception of any criminal or unlawful activity.

c) In any way forces the ingestion of or external application of human or animal urine, feces, flesh, blood, body parts, body secretions, drugs or chemicals.

d) Forces or entices the child to have sexual contact with another human or animal during a ritual ceremony, or rite or other related observance.

e) Places a child in a coffin or grave.

f) In any way threatens the child with death or serious harm to the child, the child's parents, family, friends, or pets.

g) Unlawfully dismembers, mutilates or incinerates a human corpse.

h) Forces the child to be placed in areas in which the child will come close to or in contact with human body parts.

i) Simulates the performance of surgery and placing imaginary foreign objects within a child.

j) Forces a child to participate in any ceremony, observance, practice or rite, purporting to be a marriage to any deity or other person and following such ceremony, observance, practice or rite with sexual contact or torture."

According to Monarch Resources, a sexual abuse and ritual abuse recovery referral and resource organization in California, similar ritual abuse legislation has been passed in Illinois, Idaho, California, Montana and Louisiana. (Bills are also pending in Oklahoma and Massachusetts.)

REPRESSION

Now to go back to the psychological phenomenon of repressed memories. When a child is being exposed to some of this intense trauma just described (and it's often happening at the hands of people like parents, neighbors, teachers, that, by the natural order of things, should love them), they, simply, can't handle it. They can't handle who the perpetrators are. They can't handle what's happening to them, and in some cases, what they are being forced to do. And, they can't handle, say, going to school and interacting with Johnny, or Suzy, or whoever, while grappling with such issues as torture, sexual abuse, murder.

So, as a survival mechanism, the mind reportedly takes over and represses the memories as they are happening. As a metaphor, it's as if the mind is a computer, and as the data is being entered, the computer is automatically taking the information and storing it in another file (the unconscious) the person doesn't initially (consciously) have access to.

Harvard's Judith Herman, M.D., and Mary Harvey, Ph.D. (Harvey is a lecturer in psychiatry also at Harvard and co-author of The Rape Victim: Clinical and Community Interventions), write extensively about the dynamics of memory. Some clinical experience shows that traumatic memories are formed in an altered state of consciousness induced by terror, say the authors. The focus of attention is greatly narrowed, the surrounding context falls away, and certain details of imagery and sensation are deeply engraved.

In an article for the Harvard Mental Health Letter, April, 1993, "The False Memory Debate: Social Sciences and Social Backlash?" Herman and Harvey wrote:

> Partial, or even complete amnesia for childhood trauma is well documented. The younger the child and the more violent the experience, for instance, the greater the likelihood and the severity of amnesia...
> Delayed recall of traumatic events after a period of amnesia is also well documented. The most recent example is the well publicized case of Father James Porter, a Catholic priest who by his own admission molested more than 100 boys and girls in several states. Many of Porter's victims, including the first to come forward, testified that they had recalled the abuse after a > period of amnesia. In these cases, the fact of the abuse and the phenomenon of delayed recall are beyond dispute...

> When traumatic memories break into awareness, distress can be overwhelming. Survivors are frightened, ashamed, depressed, and tormented by the flashbacks or nightmares. They may feel suicidal or fear they are going crazy...
> Furthermore, the process of uncovering one's history does not depend on a single memory. New memories must be gradually blended with old ones and alternative explanations weighed until a coherent and largely verifiable account is constructed. No patient is eager to discover that she was violated by people she loved and trusted.

Herman and Harvey also wrote that over the past 20 years, public and professional awareness of sexual victimization has dramatically increased. As recently as the 1970s, rape was considered rare and incest was regarded as a universal taboo.

"Less than 20 years ago, for example, the Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry estimated the prevalence of all forms of incest as one case per million population," wrote Herman. And popular and professional literature routinely questioned the character of victims and disparaged the credibility of someone who made claims of assault. Today, however, sexual abuse/incest has been extensively documented.

"LOCKED IN THE MIND"

As with the Father Porter scenario, a case from Raeford, North Carolina would seem to validate the phenomenon of repression as well. According to a December 21, 1979, Associated Press article:

> Edward Leon Cameron disappeared 35 years ago. Sheriff Dave Barrington went looking for him last week and turned up a bizarre murder locked since childhood in a woman's mind...

It was April 8, 1944, and Annie Blue Cameron was just short of her 10th birthday. That night, she now remembers, she overheard her parents quarrelling in the family's farmhouse.

The next day, she opened the door to the front bedroom and saw her father's body on the floor... He appeared to be dead, reads the search warrant drawn up last week. The next week after school she went to the outhouse. She looked down the hole and saw her father's face barely submerged under the excrement.

While in therapy 35 years later, the repressed memories of this series of events surfaced, and the daughter went to law enforcement. A dig at the place where the outhouse had stood, uncovered the father's remains.

The mother snuck away during the digging and committed suicide on the edge of the farm. A note found with her contained a confession.

MULTIPLE PERSONALITIES

Multiple personality is a key element in many satanic cult/ritual abuse survivor stories.

Extreme abuse is the genesis of multiple personality. And while many refer to it as a "disorder," it is actually an extremely creative survival mechanism.

An example: five-year-old Johnny is tied up and being tortured with, say, a knife and electro-shocks during some of the cult conditioning. The human psyche can take only so much pain before it, basically, snaps. And when it snaps, it will throw the person into convulsive hysterics, or a chronic catatonic state... or any number of other conditions which could cost your life during a cult ceremony; or make you useless to the cult in general.

So, when the victim is right on the brink of "snapping," the unconscious steps in and creates, what counselors call, a "dissociative" state. That is, the victim does exactly what the word says. He/she doesn't associate consciously with the trauma/pain anymore. He/she goes into a sort of numb, trance-like state.

In this state, the unconscious will create another personality to handle the next wave of abuse. Say, in Johnny's case, the unconscious creates a "Rambo" persona to deal with the next couple of hours of torture. And, when "Rambo" is on the verge of losing it, yet another personality is created, and so on.

However, the personalities don't just go away when the particular wave of trauma ends. They stay as part of the person's "system" to step in again as needed in the future. Each personality has its own memories and specific function(s). For instance, sexual alters (alter personalities) will be created to help get a victim through a cult orgy; an ultra-meticulous alter will be created in order to remember and carry out each facet of a particular ritual ceremony (one mistake could mean death); and so on.

Later in life, however, the personalities can, at times, get to be a problem.

For instance, at the first hint of any type of threat (even benign) as an adult, John's "Rambo" persona "comes up" automatically and becomes, say, abrasive, overbearing... totally inappropriate for the situation. Or, say, young Suzie's sexual alter Raquel would take over every time she had to have sex with an adult cult member. Well, later in life, Suzie, now Sue, is trying to please her boss as much as possible. And when he starts to "come on" to her sexually, even though it's against Sue's moralistic beliefs and better judgment, Raquel forces her way "up," takes what's called "executive control" of the system, and has sex with her boss. (Before the multiplicity is diagnosed, these "switches" are often merely looked at as extreme mood swings, "Jekyll/Hyde" personalities, and the like.)

Sometimes the host (core) personality, John or Sue, will be co-conscious. That is, they will be able to see everything that's going on as if watching a movie, but have little control over it. Other times, they actually will lose blocks of time while the alter is up, not remembering anything of what happened. (Somewhat like an alcoholic who functions in a blackout, but doesn't remember any of it.)

Once multiple personality is discovered in therapy, the goal is to get the personalities to gradually release their sets of repressed memories and feelings. And as this happens, they will "integrate" with the core personality.

Note: The therapeutic field has recently changed the label "multiple personality disorder" to "dissociative identity disorder."

CULT-CREATED PERSONALITIES

In the more sophisticated satanic cults, what we are graphically learning is they also understand the process of dissociation and creation of alter personalties — in fact, apparently all too well.

According to Denver ritual abuse recovery expert/therapist Holly Hector, Ph.D., the cult will use scare tactics, torture, drugs, sensory deprivation... to move the victim into that numb, dissociative state. Once there, a cult "programmer" will call up a new alter personality, name him/her, and give the personality an assignment. "It's a calculated, methodical split," said Hector, "designed to bring about total cult control of this alter."

One personality, for instance, might be designated at a certain age to bring the person back to the cult. Another may be designated to commit suicide if the system, say in therapy years later, starts to get too close to the memories. (I was recently talking to a woman in Omaha, Nebraska, whose friend had just hung herself shortly after beginning to have childhood memories of satanic ritual abuse.) Another cult-created alter might be designated as a courier, drug-runner, prostitute, assassin. Yet even more, as you will see in later chapters, some may even be groomed to take over key businesses or political positions.

National ritual abuse lecturer Len Anspach says there are several categories of multiple personalty (MP).

An "evolved" MP usually has from ten to 50 personalities. The perpetrator is usually totally ignorant about dissociation and sophisticated programming, said Anspach. The perpetrator might be, for instance, an uncle sexually abusing a young girl for his own pleasure and feeling of power.

Someone with "complex" MP, may have anywhere between 50 and 200 alters. Anspach said complex MP is primarily caused by "the chronic and systematic horrors" of being exposed to things like satanic ritual abuse. The methodical, calculated torture overwhelms the person's physiological and psychological tolerances, laying the groundwork for dissociation and programming. "The cult's agenda is to be able to control a person's life through manipulation," said Anspach.

The next chapter is a story about a person with "complex" MP, and how she found help.

Chapter 4

KATHY'S STORY

The satanic ritual abuse started in a secluded area in the Southwest. And before it was over, Kathy's story was not only out in the open, but was the subject of a major magazine piece that would draw all kinds of nationwide attention.

It was the late 1980's, and Kathy, the mother of five, living in suburban Dallas, wasn't doing well. She was experiencing chronic depression; severe panic attacks sometimes when around her parents, who lived the next block over; and lately, she was experiencing strong thoughts of suicide.

She checked into a psychiatric unit finally, to stabilize. After the hospital, she began weekly therapy. One of the first things she told the counselor: "I have virtually no memories of childhood."

However, the therapist stayed primarily cognitive. That is, he mainly focused on "here and now" circumstances, and tried merely to promote behavioral changes to help Kathy. For instance, if you're depressed — simply do things to pull yourself out, without exploring and working through the deeper cause of the depression, if there is one. The therapy, in this case, would suggest positive thoughts, exercise and volunteer work to pull someone out of depression. Sometimes this works. Sometimes this works short-term. That is, it's like pulling a weed out by the top. If you don't get to the roots, it keeps growing back.

In Kathy's first year of therapy, the depression kept coming back, the thoughts of suicide persisted, the panic around her parents hadn't dissipated.

She switched therapists. The new therapist was skilled in regression work, and Kathy started to, tentatively, move into her past.

The memories came on three levels: pictures, feelings, and body memories. As with visual memories, it also appears the unconscious has the ability to store long repressed body sensations.

Kathy would have memories of her father sodomizing her as a child. With the memories would come severe rectal pain at times, almost as if she were experiencing the abuse in the moment.

What's more, at times, finger prints and bruises would spontaneously appear on the insides of Kathy's arms and legs.

"She would have a memory, then the stigmata would appear on places where she had been pressed to the floor during a rape," Kathy's husband Matthew, who witnessed this, said. "This really helped me see what my wife was remembering was grounded in reality."

Note: For cult survivors, body memories come in all kinds. Inexplicable pain, bruises, the spontaneous appearance of a rash in the form of an upside-down cross, three 6's, or any number of satanic symbols that may have been lightly traced into a survivor's body, for instance, as part of the past torture.

The memories of sexual abuse and some ritual abuse were now coming steadily for Kathy, as were years of repressed traumatic feelings. She remembered, as a small child for instance, her mother partially inserting a knife in her vagina during one of the ceremonies. The blood was then smeared over her body as the cult told her she was satan's "sacrificial lamb." (As is the case with most ritual abuse survivors going through this painful purging process — the initial "presenting" problems concurrently were starting to dissipate. Kathy's thoughts of suicide, the chronic depression, the paranoia... were starting to lessen.)

A short way into the memories, Kathy and Matthew confronted the parents. They then took the issue to the Christian church they had all been attending. An investigative committee was formed, and the church elders eventually asked the father to step down as deacon. Kathy said one of the precipitating factors, was during the investigation an uncle came forward with information about an extra-marital affair her father had had.

On the outside, said Kathy, her parents had looked like the "perfect little Christian couple." Besides church work, they were involved with the International Bible Study Fellowship. They would also continually dole out money and other favors to the family. And, as the abuse allegations spread through the family, said Kathy, her parents started an active campaign to enlist the emotional support of as many other family members as possible.

During all this, Kathy read the book People of the Lie by author/ psychotherapist, Scott Peck M.D.. The book is an exploration of human evil. And one of Peck's main premises is people who are predominantly evil often spin a web, or facade, of "looking good" to mask the evil.

What's more, those that are evil become extremely narcissistic, only worrying about themselves. And that, said Kathy, seemed to, perhaps, be the case with her parents. Instead of slowing to talk with their daughter, her therapist, and so on, to explore "...why their daughter, at one point, was in overwhelming pain and near death in a psychiatric unit," said Kathy, they instead were frantically rushing around to the rest of the family trying to keep their reputation intact.

Note: Another possibility in Kathy's parents' case, as is the case with many possible perpetrators is, again, they, like the victims, block out the memories of their acts. According to psychiatrist Robert Rockwell in the spring, 1994 Journal of Psychohistory*: "It is not surprising that people accused of sexual abuse sincerely believe their innocence, since perpetrators of abuse are usually themselves victims of abuse, and are often dissociative. They are unaware that they dissociate and that they have alter personalities who perpetuate sexual abuse."*

Also, shortly after Kathy's parents had been accused, the False Memory Syndrome Foundation was organized. Early on, one of the Foundation "experts" was invited to give a couple of talks in churches in the Dallas area. (Incidentally, this expert was Ralph Underwager.) Kathy's parents attended one of the talks and decided to become active members. They took FMSF literature to family members and they attended FMSF groups...

Meanwhile, Kathy was going to groups of her own — therapy groups.

The memories kept coming: It was a secluded wooded area. Children were taken by the cult to see a figure of a dead man hung upside-down on a cross. They were told it was Christ, and he had been defeated. Satan was more powerful.

Note: Satanism is, again, the antithesis of Christianity. It promotes an almost insatiable quest for personal power, self-indulgence is the norm, revenge is actively condoned, satan is the enlightened one, all powerful.

Kathy would have a number of memories of the children being taken to the secluded cross over the years. In analyzing the memories, she said she realized the face of the man on the cross was always the same. While as a young child, seized in the terror of the moment, the figure seemed very real, and very dead. It may well have been an illusion, said Kathy. That is, some type of mannequin may have been doctored to create the effect. (Some reports indicate, at times, cult members are master illusionists.)

It wasn't just the ritual abuse memories that were coming for Kathy. With them, again, was years of repressed pain. Convulsive crying, fits of repressed rage, retching, terror. This is typical of a ritual abuse survivor's recovery process. (Feelings, like memories, aren't buried dead in the unconscious. They are buried alive. And they will fester, causing depression, high anxiety, migraines, and any number of other symptoms, until they are worked out.)

Actually, the high intensity of these repressed feelings bubbling up, in correlation to the horrific memories surfacing, tends to lend even more of a measure of credence.

Other typical memories satanic ritual abuse survivors have include: being locked in cages, or coffins; kept without food, water, for days; being drugged; forced to have sex with other children (sometimes while being filmed); forced to participate in animal sacrifices; forced to drink blood; forced to choose a sacrifice victim; forced to help with the killing...

For Matthew, watching Kathy go through all the memories was like being on the most intense roller coaster ride imaginable.

"For instance," said Matthew, "when the ritual abuse memories started to surface in 1990, I remember absolutely reeling from that."

What's more, there were layers of stress as Matthew struggled to deal with what he called the "constellation" of other personalities surfacing with Kathy. (As a ritual abuse survivor, who has multiple personalities from the trauma, moves further into the therapy process, the personalities surface much more and become very distinguishable.)

In dealing with Kathy's multiplicity, that is her switching from one personality to another, Matthew said: "It's, to say the least, a real unusual experience to have a dialogue with a person that merely occupies your wife's body, but is not the person you married. It requires you to actually suspend your expectations about moods, feelings, and so on, you expect of a spouse."

Matthew used the example of having to deal with a five-year-old child alter personality of Kathy's. He said, for instance, he'd be sitting on the bed talking rationally with his 35-year-old wife, when something (a trigger) would happen to bring back a traumatic incident, and with it, up would pop a five-year-old personality, for instance, who would be remembering an abuse scene from the past — and in terror about being abused again now. Matthew would have to switch gears completely, start to reassure this five-year-old personality he was not like her abusive father, then help talk her through the trauma.

This "switching" was quite emotionally taxing for Matthew. He enlisted a support group of friends, did as much reading as he could on the subject "...and actually stayed up one night writing a 30-page letter to a friend about it all."

Matthew said he was convinced as time went on, that not only had Kathy been abused in her past, but there was an extremely recognizable call in her life to recover from it — whatever that entailed. What's more, he said, it was his, and the children's, obligation to support Kathy as best they could.

"Multiple personality has painful social consequences," Matthew added. "Painful for the family, and society at large. For multiple personality to exist in someone, they've had to have been exposed to some pretty ghastly behavior."

Note: The last several years, a number of support organizations have evolved to help people like Matthew deal with the situation.

For instance, Rhode Island's Stand Fast is a nationwide support and referral source designed to help the spouse, family, friends...

As it was for Matthew, the multiplicity was also proving stressful at times for Kathy. Once Kathy accepted that she was multiple, as is the case, again, with many MPs, the personalities felt more at liberty to come to the surface, express themselves more freely, and so on. This meant, at times, Kathy had to work overtime trying to keep her system in check. What's more, she had to learn to listen and attend to each personality's needs. And she also had to learn to deal with cult-allegiant alter personalities that were programmed to sabotage the recovery.

For Kathy, the process was quite taxing, and even more complex.

In addition to the precipitating chronic depression and suicide problems before recovery, throughout her life Kathy had been plagued with codependency characteristics in the extreme. Like most ritual abuse survivors, she experienced unmet potential in relationships and work; she was extremely compulsive; had an overdeveloped sense of responsibility; was extremely self-critical; suffered low self-esteem; had difficulty with intimacy...

However, as Kathy recovered the memories, the repressed feelings, and began to reprogram herself, her self-esteem became much stronger. She said she was able to let down barriers and become more intimate with her family and friends. She was able to be much more assertive with people and with decisions. She could ease up on herself. She became a much better parent. A "warped" sense of God was starting to change.

The recovery was all the payoff she needed, said Kathy. Not a Sally Jessy Raphael spot. Not intentionally carrying out a vendetta against her parents. She said she in no way relished having to separate from them. And she didn't do it for money. Even the Mother Jones Magazine piece that carried part of her story yielded no payment.

She just wanted the story told. Maybe it would help someone else.

THE MEMORY DEBATE

On the November 15, 1993, Jane Whitney Talk Show, False Memory Syndrome Foundation advisory board member Dr. Richard Ofshe said dealing with repressed memories in therapy was simply the latest "quackery" coming out of the mental health industry.

In addition, he said: "No one who studies human memory, there's nothing in the scientific literature, there's nothing in human history, that tells this is possible." (That is, apparently, blocking out whole, elongated series of traumatic events, then recovering them later.)

In a segment on the Cavalcade Productions video False Prophets of the False Memory Syndrome, a brief film clip showed Ofshe saying (during one of this talks): "The world scientific community knows that these are not memories..."

In actuality, not all the "world scientific community" would agree.

Later on the Cavalcade tape, Harvard Medical School's Dr. Bessel Van der Kolk said the nature of traumatic repressed memory recall includes not only the flashback pictures, but a person feeling, behaving and reacting as if the incident was happening in the moment.

"What you see in traumatic memory is that people have implicit, or sensory motor affects, feeling states, images, bodily sensations that are related to a specific incident," said Dr. Van der Kolk.

Dr. Van der Kolk echoed Judith Herman in saying there was currently no such clinically recognized category as "false memory syndrome."

Discover Magazine's May 1994 edition also looked at some of the issues around the false memory debate. Writers Minouche Kandel and Eric Kandel looked at it from a psychological, and biological, perspective:

> Most clinical psychologists believe that children can learn to block memories as a survival mechanism: if physical escape from their tormentors is impossible, psychological escape may become crucial.

The Kendals cite a study done by Judith Herman in 1987. Most of a study group of sexually abused women reported delayed recall after a period of either partial or complete amnesia, and 75 percent obtained independent corroborating evidence of abuse.

On a biological level, while the phenomenon of repressed memories can't be conclusively proved, or disproved, yet, studies are under way.

The Discover article said the implicit memory involves distinct motor sensory pathways in the brain, the automatic nervous system and two additional brain structures called the "amygdala" and the "cerebellum."

According to the article: "...some survivors of abuse described their recovered memories as qualitatively different from other memories: they feel as if they are actually reexperiencing the event, with all its textures, smells, and physical sensations. This parallels the intensity of flashbacks experienced by combat veterans."

The article also notes Harvard's Stephen Kosslyn found that the brain area involved in perceiving an image and storing it as a memory, is also involved in imagining that image. And memory is like perception, in that both are reconstructed events in the brain.

Dr. Van der Kolk said the implicit memories (pictures coming with feelings, body sensations...) of abuse will often come in segments, where a therapeutic patient sometimes can't make a whole story out of it yet. So, at times, a survivor may use some imagination to "knit together" the segments so it makes more sense to them at that particular time in the recovery process.

This can lead to a natural measure of distortion at times, but doesn't take away from the validity of the solid, implicit memories coming back. "What you see in a flashback before you've had a chance to talk about it... that is to be trusted," said Dr. Van der Kolk.

It's also important to see there are, along the motor pathways Dr. Van der Kolk alludes to, distinct biomechanics that go into the formation of memory. A recent New York Times article included an interview with Harvard University neuroscientist Dr. Allen Hobson. An excerpt reads:

> The awake brain receives copious amounts of information from the outside world, mainly in the form of light and sound frequencies, chemical signals, and physical touch, Hobson said. It processes these signals in vast, oscillating networks of brain cells to form representations of the external world and combines these maps with memories, movements, emotions and forethought in a way that gives rise to self-awareness and the ability to navigate the world...

As you can see, these are extremely complex sets of input and processing variables that go into storing memories. And much more study needs to be done.

But therapist and researcher Mike Moore points out, there is, perhaps, one key variable that may never be able to be recreated for study in a test setting: "You can't replicate, in any experimental lab, what it is like to be repeatedly traumatized by your primary care giver [Mom, Dad...] in a child's developmental years."

Note: Some acknowledge while, say, Vietnam veterans may block out some of the horrendous war atrocities they've experienced, they don't block them all out, or forget they were in Vietnam altogether. They use this argument to say: why then should satanic cult survivors, for instance, be any different? That is, why would they block all the memories out, and not remember they were even in the cult at all?

Actually, there are a number of possible reasons. For one, the satanic cult victim is trying to absorb the almost unimaginable, psychic trauma of Mom, Dad, other relatives, neighbors... shooting at them, so to speak. Two: there is often no one safe to tell, and because you're a child you're still reliant on the home, the only one you have, for physical survival. Three: no one threatens to kill you if you talk about Vietnam. And it is in essence, socially acceptable to talk about war. While it's reinforced, often, if you talk about the cult you'll end up like, say, the four murdered defectors in Salida, California. And, it hasn't exactly been socially acceptable to talk about the ritual abuse in too many circles so far.

Given the nature of all these threatening dynamics, isn't it wholly conceivable that a computer-like "vast, oscillating network of brain cells" is sophisticated enough to totally transfer this cult data, so to speak, into a hidden file for a while?

MEDIA DISTORTION

On January 7, 1993, the ABC show Prime Time devoted one of the segments to the phenomenon of satanic ritual abuse. Jay Schadler interviewed people reporting having been exposed to satanic ritual abuse, therapists who work with them, a therapist that disputes the phenomenon, several patients reporting that they had been duped by therapists into believing they had been victims of satanic ritual abuse, and, at one point toward the end of the segment, an interview was shown where Schadler interviewed a mother and father in Texas who had been accused by their daughter of sexually abusing her during satanic rituals.

This segment began as a camera panned in on the couple sitting at a piano in the house singing a church song. As the parents are singing, the voice of Prime Time's reporter Schadler comes in: "Lee Brady is not a satanic high priest. He's a small town Texas preacher. His wife Jean is not a child abuser. She's a Bible teacher."

The strongly definitive, and just as glaringly subjective "...They're not satanists, etc." statements break every rule of sound journalism.

(This section is being written during the preliminaries of the O.J. Simpson case. Schadler's "they're not satanists" statement would be analogous to hearing a reporter, at this stage in the Simpson proceedings, naively saying: "O.J. Simpson is not a murderer. He's a football player we all love.")

In the Salida, California, cult case, a cult informant told investigators, a local minister and a respected town dentist were involved with the cult. In the 1989 Matamoros cult case in Mexico, that included the grisly murder/sacrifices of 13 people, 24-year-old, drug cult, high priestess Sara Maria Aldrete Villarreal lured a number of young men to their deaths. By day, top student Villarreal was a member of the faculty-nominated "Who's Who" at Texas

Southmost College. And what's more, she was also president of the college's Soccer Booster Club.

Before the Matamoros case broke, what could we have expected from a Schadler/Prime Time piece? Maybe the camera panning in on a bubbly Sara Maria singing a rousing version of Texas Southmost College's alma mater before a soccer match. Then, perhaps, we would hear: "Sara Maria is not a drug-smuggling satanist. She's a top student. And if she has a 'jones' for anything, it's not drugs, it's not cold-blooded murder — it's soccer..."

When Mexican police raided Villarreal's home, they found a room with a ritualistic altar standing against a blood-splattered wall. The grisly human sacrifices to the cult's version of satan were partially for supernatural protection in their drug smuggling efforts. On May 5, 1994, Villarreal was sentenced to 62 years in prison. She was convicted of multiple homicide, drug possession, gang association and impersonating federal officers, according to an Associated Press article.

Prime Time producer, Steve Reiner, approached one of the ritual abuse survivors to be featured on the show. He said his intention was to do a "sensitive, non-exploitive" story, said the survivor.

"Finally, I thought we were going to get a chance to really be heard," said "Vanessa."

Vanessa said she was horrified when she saw the show. She said the segments used that involved her were, in her opinion, selectively cut and run together to make her story seem not credible. "They had edited my tape to distort everything Randy [Noblitt, a therapist] stood for and all we had accomplished. I couldn't believe how they had manipulated the use of tape," said Vanessa. What's more, she said she continually emphasized that her sister was having the same ritual abuse memories — but that was never mentioned.

Outraged, Vanessa called reporter Jay Schadler the day after the story ran.

"I trusted you guys..." she said.

"That was your first mistake..." she says Schadler replied.

Vanessa went to the library, got some information on lawsuits, and sued ABC — on her own. They offered to settle with her out of court, she said.

While the Prime Time piece, by any measure of legitimate journalism standards, was anything but serious reporting (more like slanted "infotainment," at best), the tragic thing is probably millions of people uninitiated to the subject bought Schadler's assessment at face value. Just as many probably bought the following story at face value as well:

KATHY'S STORY: THE MEDIA

To go back to "Kathy's Story." A writer for Mother Jones, Ethan Watters, did initial interviews with Kathy's parents, then Kathy and Matthew.

In a follow-up interview, Matthew said Watters asked him: "Do you really believe the stories [about satanic ritual abuse] your wife is telling?"

Matthew answered he did.

Then Matthew said Watters responded incredulously: "If you believe that... you believe people are abducted by aliens as well."

The first eight-tenths of the Mother Jones piece was even-handed. Both sides were represented quite fairly. Then came the twist, or rather, spin.

During the interviews, Matthew told Watters their daughter Sarah had spent a lot of time at Kathy's parents' house in her early years. At age seven, Sarah started having pronounced emotional problems.

Watter's article picks up:

> For help, the family again turned to the therapy community. They chose a child therapist, who evaluated Sarah for several weeks.
> "I'm 90 percent convinced," the therapist proclaimed at the end of the evaluation period, "that your daughter has been sexually abused." "I asked, 'By whom?'" Matthew remembers.
> "We don't know yet," said the therapist.
> It took another nine months of coaxing for Sarah to tell her own story of being sexually > assaulted by her grandparents... "They made me watch dirty movies and take showers with them," she claimed. "They said they would cut my arms off if I told."

That reporting, except for the word "coaxing" (Watters never interviewed the therapist), would have been close, except that the paragraph that proceeded this last section read as follows:

> With her mother routinely suicidal and her father working all the time, Sarah must have found home to be an unhappy place and worst of all, she was no longer able to visit the one sanctuary she knew from the pain in her life. [Watters never even interviewed Sarah.] In Sarah's mind, her grandparents had been slowly transformed into monsters.

Ethan Watters' article, again, ran in the January 1993 edition of Mother Jones Magazine. (In regard to the end of the Watters piece, Matthew said: "I'm enraged at the gross misrepresentation of what happened with that story!" Matthew said immediately after it ran, he called Watters to voice his displeasure. Watters never returned the call.)

Society Magazine's March/April 1993 edition carried a decidedly one-sided story about "false recovered memories" and how they are "...devastating thousands of lives." The title was "Making Monsters." The authors of "Making Monsters" were False Memory Syndrome Foundation advisory board member Richard Ofshe and Ethan Watters.

A footnote at the end of the article states, "The [article] authors are currently working on a book about the false memory epidemic and its implications for the mental health professions in America."

I contacted Watters to get his response to some of this. He said he first started working on this subject in connection with a 1991

Mother Jones piece he did around the "Olympia, Washington-Paul Ingram" case involving claims of sexual and satanic ritual abuse.

And while Watters claims he hadn't contracted to do the Society Magazine piece, or the book with Ofshe, prior to the 1993 Mother Jones piece, he admitted he definitely had a "point of view" going into the writing of that article — which he said he believes magazines allow for, much more than newspapers. Watters said his "point of view" going into Kathy's story was that it was a typical, representative, case scenario of false memories.

Note: Kathy said what had been represented to her by Watters at the outset, was he was just trying to be objective. She said she never would have agreed to do the story, if Watters had been up front with her about the slant he was taking. What's more: "I felt a lot of rage as well about the things he wrote about my daughter that were simply not true!"

Watters acknowledged he never interviewed the daughter.

Watters said Ofshe and his book will be out in October 1994. The title: Making Monsters. The subheading: False Memories, PsychoHeresy and Sexual Hysteria.

Note: A little later the same night of my interview with Watters, CNN News (7/25/94) reported that in Riverside, New York, court proceedings had just concluded around the case of John Espisito. The report said Espisito had kidnapped a ten-year-old girl and held her hostage in a minuscule underground "dungeon" cell (the size of perhaps two small closets) where he was reported to have repeatedly raped the young girl.

As Espisito stood before the bench prior to his sentencing, he told the judge: "I'm not a monster..."

THE REST OF KATHY'S STORY

The whole story about Matthew and Kathy's daughter Sarah did not appear in the Mother Jones article. And it seems only fair the parents had a chance to really tell their unabridged side of the story.

As mentioned earlier, Matthew and Kathy lived right around the corner from Kathy's parents. And in the early years, Sarah would spend a lot of time at her grandparents' home. There were four other children, but the grandparents spent, by far, the most time with Sarah.

"When I look back," said Matthew, "it was as if they were culling her from the flock."

Matthew admits, also at this time he was a workaholic, for which he is now in recovery. And Kathy was experiencing a lot of pronounced mood swings (switching) as part of the scars from her own abuse. So, there was tension in the home. (However, Matthew adamantly maintains, there was no sexual abuse.)

On May 20, 1989, Kathy was admitted to a psychiatric hospital just before memories of sexual abuse/ritual abuse, reportedly at the hands of her parents, began to surface.

Note: It's often the case just prior to these types of extreme memories surfacing that a ritual abuse survivor, or a war veteran, will "decompensate." That is, as the horrific memories are nearing the surface, all types of internal alarms, defenses, and so on, will collide almost out of control in the unconscious for a time, throwing the person into crisis. This will sometimes result in the need for a supervised setting to help get the survivor through this acute and dangerous period.

While Kathy hadn't had the memories yet, she did have a strong premonition. Just before Matthew left the hospital that day in May, Kathy implored, "Please don't leave the children with my parents."

Shortly thereafter, Kathy started having the memories. And, while the parents didn't allow the children over to their grandparents' anymore, after the memories started, Matthew said he hadn't told Sarah any of the specifics of the heinous nature of the abuse her mother was remembering. "She was too young to hear all that," said Matthew.

During that summer, Kathy's parents met with Matthew's parents, protesting it wasn't fair they couldn't see the grandchildren. Matthew's parents reported Kathy's parents said specifically they really wanted to see Sarah more than any of the others, because they had established such a "good" rapport with her.

In November of that same year, Sarah started experiencing pronounced behavioral problems, and was starting to have suicidal thoughts as well.

"We called her school and told them we had a child in trouble," said Matthew. A therapist was recommended.

After a five-session evaluation period, said Matthew, because of some of Sarah's behavioral patterns, lack of emotional affect, and so on (Matthew said Sarah had been inexplicably acting out sexually with adults, dancing in a sexually explicit manner.) "Sometimes she was acting almost like a little 'Lolita, said Mathew.'" The therapist told Kathy and Matthew: "I've been in the therapy field for 20 years, and based on what I'm seeing, I'm pretty sure your child has been sexually abused."

But the therapist also said a bit more that day, Matthew recalled.

He said she informed him the laws in Texas required her to say that if she discovered it was Matthew that had sexually abused Sarah, she would turn the information over to the authorities. And the result might well be Sarah would be taken out of the home and he would be sent to jail. Matthew told her to go ahead with the therapy. Six months later, the memories started to surface. And the first reportings of the sexual abuse memories didn't even come in a therapy office, or the child's home. Matthew said it came at Matthew's parents' home, when, at dinner, the little girl told these grandparents they were different than her other grandparents. The other grandparents, she said: would make her get undressed, would make her take showers with them, would make her have sex with them. And they had threatened to kill her if she ever told, she said.

Matthew said Sarah then told a school counselor, then a teacher, and the last people she told were Matthew and Kathy. Her reason, Matthew said: "I don't want Mommy to cry and go back to the hospital again."

For another couple of years Sarah worked through the repressed pain and memories of abuse, her self-esteem gradually being restored.

"I finally got my daughter back," said Matthew. "It's as if a rose had been dropped in a mud puddle — then picked up and washed off."

"He pretty easy to talk to?"

One of Matthew's assessments was writer Ethan Watter's agenda was to show patients are sometimes systematically being misled by the therapeutic community in regard to some sexual and ritual abuse reporting. Schadler's Prime Time piece, alluded to earlier, for instance, featured therapist Randy Noblitt, who is the president of the International Council on Cultism and Ritual Trauma.

Prior to the on-camera interview, Schadler attended a professional lecture by Noblitt, then spent another several hours being briefed on any number of ritual abuse dynamics, including information on multiple personalities in connection with extreme trauma.

Note: One dynamic, for instance, is if a child is being forced by cult members to help torture, kill, or cannibalize, they need a harsh, impervious alter personality to carry out what they are naturally almost incapable of doing, and are actually horrified by. Because there is no physical way out, the unconscious will take over and create such a personality for survival's sake. Sometimes these personalities will have demon names, even the name "satan." There are any number of other reasons for these types of personalities as well.

Noblitt allowed Prime Time to film a counseling session in which one of the alter personalities that came up in a woman survivor was named "satan."

Schadler addresses the following questions to Noblitt:

> Schadler: You even called up satan?
> Noblitt: Yes.
> Schadler [facetiously]: He pretty easy to talk to?
> Noblitt [referring to the alter personality]: Vanessa's satan seemed to be a pretty easy guy to talk to.

The scene switches. Schadler is now addressing a "false memory" advocate/spokesperson.

> Schadler: I hate to be so blunt about it, but some of these therapists may be sicker than their patients...

Randy Noblitt, Ph.D., graduated cum laude (undergraduate) from North Texas State University, has taught graduate courses in abnormal and neuropsychology for Vanderbilt University, was a clinical psychologist for the U.S. Air Force, and now works in private practice specializing in post-traumatic stress afflictions, multiple personality, substance abuse/dependency. He has counseled many patients reporting ritual abuse. Much of this wasn't mentioned during the Prime Time show.

I have interviewed a significant number of therapists around the country who work with people who report being SRA survivors. And it is my assessment, so far, that a majority are professional, dedicated people who are extending themselves way beyond the therapeutic call of duty, if you will, to help.

For example, a significant percentage of cult ritual abuse patients are barely getting by in life, emotionally and financially. And many therapists I've talked to have incorporated sliding fee scales where they treat these people, sometimes for next to nothing.

What's more, because some of the alter personalities are programmed to act out violently against the host person, therapist, or anyone else getting close to the cult secrets, therapists are doing this work at tangible risk to themselves. (I've interviewed a number of therapists that have been attacked in various ways during sessions.)

Noblitt, for instance, reports he has found weapons on several of his patients, and his office actually now uses a metal detector. And, therapists aren't just worried about retaliation from their patients' alter personalities. The following is a quite telling passage from the spring, 1994 Journal of Psychohistory. Edited by Lloyd DeMause, this particular journal was devoted to sadistic ritual abuse:

> It was not, however, until word began to get around the psychiatric community that I was editing an issue of my journal on "Cult Abuse of > Children" that I began to realize the full extent of cult activity in America today. Phone calls from all over the country poured into my editorial office from psychotherapists who told me that they would like to read the cult abuse issue because they had treated cult abuse victims.

> When I then asked them if they wished to contribute somehow to the [journal] issue, they often said they couldn't — they were afraid to talk in print about their clients, even anonymously, because the cults had threatened them, or their families, with violence. Phone threats, dead cats on doorsteps, burning crosses on lawns and other convincing communications made them understandably reluctant to write anything about cults.

On top of all this, treating a ritual abuse survivor is very seldom a "standard hour" a week.

Calls come in at all hours, with the patient threatening suicide, again, because the cult programming includes a self-destruct mode if they ever tell the "secrets." Most sadistic cult survivors, again, display multiple personalities, because of the extremity of the abuse. And it takes quite skilled, intensive therapeutic work to deal effectively with each of the personalities in the painstaking process of trying to help integrate the system.

What's more, there's quite a different therapeutic strain, or taxing, between, say, working with someone who's experiencing a couple of minor relationship problems, and working with a sadistic cult abuse victim. Where a therapist will spend an hour, in effect, casually chatting through some cognitive behavior changes with the person experiencing minor relationship issues, it's entirely different with a sadistic abuse survivor.

For them to be free, they have to repeatedly go back into the past — as Kathy did — to unearth repressed memories, repressed feelings from the abuse. This entails therapists having to skillfully help a survivor's child alter, curled in a fetal position on the floor, work through the stark terror of watching a sacrifice — again. Or it is a therapist trying desperately to encourage the emoting of a survivor's repressed rage, as the patient storms around the office beating a rubberized bat and screaming until they virtually lose their voice.

Or, it is a therapist sitting, sometimes for hours, with a patient as they convulsively cry, retch, and so on, reliving yet other memories. It is a therapist in their office at midnight, their hand on the survivor's shoulder, as the rage, the convulsive crying, the retching has turned into an exhausted whimper. And it is these therapists, with a tear in their eyes now, who sit dazed, long after the patient has left.

The Prime Time piece "poignantly" ended at night with a camera pulling back from a lighted upstairs window. Mr. Grady, with a longing in his voice, explains every night they leave the light on for their daughter to come home.

It might have been more appropriate for Prime Time to have ended their segment with a camera panning back from one of these therapists' "lighted" offices late at night.

Based on my interviews with therapists across the country, it is my assessment a majority continue to work in this area because they believe the survivor dysfunction and pain are real. And what's more — and it's a shame this can't be quantified more for the general public — but they also do it because they often see the survivors significantly heal as a result of the work.

DENIAL

As the debate rages, many well-meaning therapists will get caught in the crossfire. And some ritual abuse survivors, who desperately need the help, will probably stay away from therapy because of Prime Time and similar pieces. Also, because of the legal liability now, some therapists are backing away from doing work around sexual and/or ritual abuse.

One therapist recently told me he fears at some point sexual abuse and/or ritual abuse survivors will hear from some therapists: "Sorry, your memories are just too unreliable. We can't explore those issues." So the survivor then lives out the rest of his/her life continually hurting, damaged and steeped in old dysfunctional patterns.

When I refer to legal liability for therapists, I'm referring to people who have been in therapy for a while and start to have, say, sexual/ritual abuse memories, then drop out of therapy. They then, sometimes, turn around and sue the therapist for malpractice, claiming "false memories" were implanted.

I'm a licensed counselor, and have also been in my own therapy and other recovery groups for quite some time. I've seen people in all stages of recovery. And people who have been in recovery for a while, sometimes get to some pretty traumatic repressed memories, repressed feelings — and back out because of the pain. And what's more, they go back into denial. You see it quite often in codependency recovery, sexual abuse recovery, ritual abuse recovery... And for some, part of going back into denial starts to include vocal indictments all this codependency stuff, for instance, is just "psycho-babble"; or these memories of cult orgies, and whatever, were just "planted" in their mind; "My parents are great people." (Accepting the reality of the abuse, may also precipitate the reality of having to separate from the abusive parents. Which is also, for some, too painful.)

In some of these circumstances, the therapist is then blamed; the 12 Step programs are then looked at as inherently flawed; and so on.

Yet this is sometimes someone who has gone back into denial because they're afraid of the pain. And in order to further con themselves into thinking they're right, they lash out at the therapist, these recovery groups, etc.

"MAKING MEANING"

At one point in the Prime Time piece during a therapy session Randy Noblitt was conducting, it appears he may have gotten too leading with a couple of questions. This occasionally happens with the most well-meaning of therapists. It's a new, complex field. Therapists are working overtime getting new training, experimenting with new methods to help. And as the mind may occasionally suggest detail to fill in the blanks around the solid flashbacks to prematurely complete the abuse "storyboard," a therapist might occasionally be too presumptuous. It's a mistake that happens at times.

But to use one "apparent" mistake, to invalidate a whole series of survivor flashbacks, or for that matter, the whole issue, is needlessly polarizing.

Clinicians Karen Olio and William Connell, who refute many of Richard Ofshe and Ethan Watters' arguments, say there should be a middle ground in looking at these issues. They write:

> "Researchers and clinicians need to combine their expertise for a thoughtful exploration of the important questions regarding suggestibility, memory and trauma... Ofshe, Watters and others who advocate a simplistic, extremist view do a disservice to everyone by polarizing and obscuring these issues. All too often these concerns are co-opted by a political movement whose objective appears to be the creation of a climate of disbelief in survivors' stories rather than a thoughtful exploration of memory function."

MORE EVIDENCE

I was recently interviewed by a production team from New Zealand in connection with a documentary they are doing on satanic ritual abuse. The producers explained they have been amazed at the information that has been surfacing since they began investigating the subject...

At the time of this writing, the FBI's official "law enforcement perspective," is that organized satanic ritual abuse doesn't exist.

A report, often cited by the media, was issued out of the FBI Academy's National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime, Quantico, Virginia, in October 1989. The report: Satanic, Occult, Ritualistic Crime: A Law Enforcement Perspective was written by Kenneth V. Lanning, M.S. The following is a brief excerpt:

> Rather, a satanic murder can be defined as one committed by two or more individuals who rationally plan the crime and whose primary motivation is to fulfill a prescribed satanic ritual calling for the murder. By this definition, the author has been unable to identify even one documented satanic murder in the United States...

(A similar January 1992 update report by Lanning out of the FBI's Quantico unit, echoed this statement.)

NEW YORK SACRIFICE

The following is taken from a Newsday article, a reprint of which ran in the Fort Worth Star Telegram February 18, 1992:

> New York — Members of a cult here killed ballerina Monika Beerle in August, 1989, and then dismembered her and fed her flesh to the homeless as part of a satanic ritual, law enforcement sources said yesterday after arresting a cult member in Pennsylvania in connection with the slaying.
> After a 29-month search by New York detectives, Randy Eastherday was arrested Friday on charges that he and several others helped Daniel Rakowitz, "The Butcher of Tompkins Square Park," stab Beerle and dissect the corpse.

Dr. Judianne Densen-Gerber is a New York psychiatrist, who also has a law degree from Columbia University, and is the founder of P.A.C.T. (Protect America's Children Today). She is also founder and former chief of psychiatry for Odyssey Institute International, which has drug (and other addictions) treatment programs around the world.

She treated her first ritual abuse client in 1980, and has treated many more since.

"The stories [about different aspects of the cult rituals] are very much the same, whether it's someone from Melbourne, Australia or Vermont, Utah... This leads me to believe, not only are the cults all over, but because of the similarities, many are also networked," said Dr. Densen-Gerber.

She also said commonalities among ritual abuse survivors include, as discussed in the last chapter, amnesia. And many also are drawn to the "helping professions" (counseling, nursing, etc.) said Dr. Densen-Gerber. One of the unconscious reasons for this, said the psychiatrist, is because some ritual abuse survivors were forced to kill during some of the ceremonies, or stand by and watch helplessly during the killings. As a result, they are afflicted with "survivor's guilt," as are some war victims, for instance, and they have a strong unconscious need to atone by now trying to help save lives.

Some ritual abuse survivor reports include, as children, being forced to help kill. For instance, it is sometimes reported a cult member will put a knife in a young child's hand, then put their hand over the top, and force the knife down into a baby that is being sacrificed. The child knows nothing of "...coercion to commit a crime," and starts to believe they are actually a murderer too.

This is a mind-control technique to get the child to identify on a deeper level with the cult, and encodes the code-of-silence programming even that much deeper.

GOING TO THE SOURCE?

To go back to the FBI "Law Enforcement Perspective" by Lanning. In the updated 1992 version he writes: "Many of the police officers who lecture on satanic or occult crime do not even investigate such cases." (That's not true of the ones I've interviewed. And besides Randy Cerny, a couple other ritual crime investigator/lecturers' extensive work is featured in later chapters.)

Conversely, and rather ironically, according to a June 1993 Vanity Fair Magazine article, writer Leslie Bennets writes of the FBI agent who, supposedly, has his finger directly on the pulse of this whole issue:

> To my surprise he [Lanning] admits he has never talked to a ritual abuse survivor. It turns out that through all the years he's been investigating the phenomenon, his contact has been solely with other law enforcement professionals and with therapists; he has never gone to the source of these reports... (Several weeks later, Lanning revised his story to say that he had spoken with "several dozen" survivors on an unofficial basis.)

REPORTS INCREASE

Looking Up, founded as initially a support/referral program for incest survivors, services approximately 15,000 people a year — 40 percent of whom are now reporting they are dealing with ritualistic, or cult-related abuse.

JUSTUS Unlimited, a non-profit referral and resource center in Denver, Colorado, reports receiving more than 7,000 ritual abuse related calls a year. What's more, they are also hearing from all over the world: Australia, England, The Netherlands, Germany, Israel, Canada, Brazil...

BRAZILIAN SATANIC CULT MURDER(S)

Again, part of Kathy's story appeared in Mother Jones Magazine's January 1993 edition. What also appeared was the following analysis by free-lance writer Ethan Watters: "Critics note... many patients from fundamentalist Christian backgrounds, for instance, have memories of abuse at the hands of satanic cults, despite no evidence that such cults even exist."

The following story ran five months before the Mother Jones article. It is based on a July 28, 1992, CNN report/transcript.

The story is not only about an extremely dangerous satanic cult, but is another graphic example of how "good" a satanist(s) can look on the outside. And in this case, how politically connected some can be as well. It also underscores how a satanist's quest for power can apparently drive her/him to do anything.

> International Correspondent*: In the small town of Guaratuba on the south coast of Brazil, angry residents demand justice in a bizarre murder case that has shocked the country. The body of seven-year-old Evandro Caetano was found horribly mutilated. Police say he was tortured and sacrificed in a satanic ritual.

The boy's arms and legs had been dismembered, his internal organs cut out. Ritual implements used during the ceremony were also found near the body. Police investigations eventually implicated the family of the mayor of Guaratuba. (The CNN report showed enraged citizens storming the mayor's house to exact their own justice. However, the mayor wasn't there at the time, and the mayor's wife narrowly got away.)

The transcript goes on:

> [According to investigator] Jose Moscic Favetti: We believe the mayor's wife and daughter were involved with a satanic cult, that other children may have been murdered, and some children may have been taken to Argentina for rituals done there. CNN Reporter: Five cult members who were allegedly paid by the mayor's wife to sacrifice Evandro have been arrested... while police continue looking for other cult members, anxious parents here are on their guard, keeping watch over their children.

Also, according to the report, ten other children had come up missing in the area since January of that year, and while police currently had no evidence linking them to this case "...many here fear they, too, may have been sacrificed in satanic rituals," said the CNN reporter.

Note: Ten children come up missing in the Guaratuba area at the same time that a deadly satanic cult is exposed. Is there a connection? Scores of children come up missing every year, and ritual abuse survivors consistently report things like remembering child kidnapping and murders.

"The public isn't generating enough momentum to get police mobilized around this [ritual abuse] issue at this point. Right now they are crying out for us to deal with drug abuse, sexual abuse, drunk driving..." said Akron, Ohio, Police Captain Jerry Foys.

Foys said he believes the cult/ritual abuse situation is widespread and extremely dangerous. However, the public hasn't expressed concern yet because it's not going on out in the open, said Foys, and many people merely believe most people involved with cults are benign, harmless "kooks."

"Hopefully, Waco changed some of that for people," said Foys. He alluded, for instance, to a report that had come out detailing how adult Branch Davidian cult members were teaching the children how to commit suicide by showing them where to position the barrel of a gun in their mouths to be most effective.

To continue with the missing children phenomenon, former Nebraska State Senator John W. DeCamp interviewed 28-year veteran FBI agent Ted Gunderson for his book: The Franklin Cover-Up: Child Abuse, Satanism and Murder in Nebraska. Gunderson is the former special agent-in-charge of the Bureau's Los Angeles Division. He also worked extensively on the highly publicized McMartin Pre-School case in California. In that case, 460 families issued complaints to the Manhattan Beach Police around children's claims of being exposed to ritualistic sexual abuse, animal sacrifice, baby sacrifice, and so on, at the pre-school.

As far as missing children in general, DeCamp writes in The Franklin Cover-Up:

> Evidence from Gunderson's investigations has convinced him tens of thousands of children or young people disappear from their homes each year, and that many are ritualistically sacrificed. ...Nobody knows what the true figure is, because the FBI does not keep count. Gunderson observes: "The FBI has an accurate count on the number of automobiles stolen every year. It knows the number of homicides, rapes and robberies, but the FBI has no idea of the number of children that disappear every year. They simply do not ask for the statistics... I am convinced that the FBI does not ask for these statistics because they do not want to see them. They would be confronted with an instant public outcry for action, because the figures would show a major social problem that would demand action."

(A detailed report on the Franklin case will be presented in a later chapter.)

SATANIC MOTIVATION

Again, as skewed as the ideology may seem, there is rationale for a satanist's behavior beyond merely satisfying some sadistic impulses. A farmer, who is also a satanist in, say, the Midwest, will perform a sacrificial murder for a good crop the next year. If you're a broker/satanist on Wall Street, you may perform a sacrificial murder for a better portfolio...

According to an Associated Press article, also about the Guaratuba case:

> Police have traced his [the seven-year-old boy's] death to the wife of Guaratuba's mayor who they say allegedly turned to a satanic cult to try to improve her husband's sagging political and business fortunes. Celina Abagge allegedly paid cult members $2,000 to kill the boy in a good luck ritual.

EVIL SORCERY

It doesn't seem that just the mayoral political strata is using occult rituals. Deposed Panamanian leader Gen. Manuel Noriega was apparently practicing "evil magic" and other occult rituals to help himself politically and personally, said agent James R. Dibble, a specialist on "cults and deviant movements" in the U.S. Army's Criminal Investigation Division.

According to a December 26, 1989, Washington Post article, Noriega used a variety of elaborate rituals to cast black magic spells on numerous political enemies. Also, according to other news accounts that came out at the same time, Noriega was said to have had a ritual altar at his headquarters and it was also reported he regularly consulted with witches.

This included a Brazilian sorceress, whose photographs hung on the walls of Noriega's home and office. Dibble said the woman practiced Candomble, a Brazilian offshoot of the Latin American religion known as Santeria.

Santeria includes a synthesis of some saints and tribal gods and is practiced widely in Latin America. It is similar to, but not the same as, voodoo.

THE WARRIOR

I opened the book with a song about ritual abuse from Joan Baez's album: Play Me Backwards. There was another album released about the same time, that also includes a song about ritual abuse. The album is The Warrior (A Project of Recovery). The song: The Saints Will No Longer Allow You To Die by "tres."

Tres said the song was written about a memory given to him by his inner child. While in a treatment center for what was diagnosed as post-traumatic stress disorder, he began chanting in his sleep.

"One of my roommates was an insomniac and wrote down what I was saying as best he could," said tres. "What I was speaking was Latin. I had never studied Latin before in my life."

Tres then started having memories of the nannies who took care of him as a child, practicing Santeria around him. Tres had the chant he was doing in his sleep deciphered by a Catholic priest. What he was chanting was: "The saints will no longer allow you to die."

"The Saints Will No Longer Allow You To Die"

As I look back on my childhood years
I can recall the times I was so full of fear
I had nannies that took care of me
They were Santeria queens, I think they worshipped me.

Oh how they would chant to the saints as they washed my small feet
I remember what they said as they dried with their hair the blood they put on me

They would sing to me.

The Saints will no longer allow you to die
that's what my nannies told me.
The Saints will no longer allow you to die
that's what the Santeria queens would say.

The Saints will no longer allow you to die
no te dejan murir mi diosesito.
The Saints will no longer allow you to die
they used to sing it every night and day.

What was it they were trying to save me from?
Was it the devil in me or was it something I'd done?
I can remember their cries in the night as they gathered 'round me in the pale candle light...

The Saints will no longer allow you to die...

MINNESOTA MANIA

In Breaking the Circle of Satanic Ritual Abuse, I write about a 23-year-veteran of the Minneapolis Police Department who helped start a ground-breaking task force called "MINNARA," Minnesota Awareness of Ritual Abuse.

Jon Hinchliff has been involved with ritual crime investigation since 1981, when he came across a case that really piqued his interest. A woman in the Minneapolis area had been convicted of murder. She had been involved in the practice of Santeria, said Hinchliff.

In the Minnesota case, the woman drove "blessed stakes" through her young grandson's heart because she felt he was possessed by evil spirits, said Hinchliff.

In the winter of 1988, Hinchliff and two other counselors from Minneapolis's Sexual Assault Center formed MINNARA. The membership quickly grew and included counselors, lawyers, teachers, ritual abuse survivors, other law enforcement officials...

Over the years, Hinchliff said he has developed sources in the occult world. He said that one of the biggest aids to him is that he has been able to gain insight into how cult members think.

One of the major obstacles in this field of investigation is the general tendency to just pass the whole thing off as unbelievable, Hinchliff said, because at first glance it appears so bizarre. However, he said, once you understand some of the rationale, then not only does cult activity become believable, but people are actually able to approach the subject with some measure of objectivity.

MURDER AT MATAMOROS

Some ritual abuse survivors report witnessing sexual abuse, torture, sacrifice in covert ceremonies sometimes within the context of such belief systems as Druidism, witchcraft, and again, such Afro-Caribbean religions as Santeria and Palo Mayombe. Palo Mayombe is a "dark" religion that requires the use of human body parts and blood.

It was Santeria and Palo Mayombe that was being practiced by a cult on an isolated ranch 20 miles west of Matamoros, Mexico, in 1989. And it would be these cult members that would sacrificially kill a Texas college student — and 13 others — in one of the most highly publicized cult ritual abuse cases yet.

Twenty-one-year-old Mark Kilroy was in his third year of college and anticipating medical school when he was abducted off the streets of Brownsville, Texas, during spring break. He was taken across the border to that isolated ranch outside of Matamoros — and he was sacrificed.

The following is an excerpt from the book: Sacrifice, which is about the Matamoros case:

> Constanzo sacrificed Mark Kilroy with a series of machete blows to the top of the head. The high priest then scooped the brains from the college student's skull and added them to the black kettle... Quickly blood was drained from Mark's body into the cast iron pot.
> Now, according to the tradition of Palo Mayombe, the nganga [dark spirit] had been refreshed with the sacrifice of human blood, even a human life. The group would have power and good luck. The men would have intelligence... They petitioned the spirit for strength, riches, and protection from the police while smuggling drugs.

After his death, Kilroy's body was mutilated. Even the spine was actually cut free so the cult could use it as a necklace. It would be several weeks later that authorities would make the grisly discovery of Kilroy's body, as well as 13 other sacrificial victims at the ranch.

In the book People of the Lie (mentioned earlier), author Peck, talks at length about the psychology of evil, including some people's abilities to spin webs of lies, or facades, around their exterior to cover the evils they may be perpetrating. Also, at times, the lies become so convincing, people often start to believe the evil they are carrying out is actually good. That is, for a higher purpose.

One of the Matamoros murderers, Elio Hernandez Rivera, bragged he could keep a victim alive long enough to split the chest and rip the beating heart out — just as his forefathers, the ancient Aztecs, had done while sacrificing to pagan gods.

Another of the Matamoros cult members, Serafin Hernandez Garcia Jr., was actually majoring in law enforcement at Texas Southmost College at the time he was arrested.

Note: Likewise, Stanislaus County, California, cult member Tamara Smith had been taking law enforcement classes at a community college. Ritual crime investigator Randy Cerny said she was using this to befriend certain police, have sex with them, and glean information the police might be compiling, say, against the cult. This may have also been part of the grooming process, in regard to placing cult members in strategic professions. Some ritual abuse survivors report remembering being abused during the ceremonies by cult members that were also involved with law enforcement.

According to U.S. Customs agent-in-charge in Brownsville, Texas, Oran Neck: "These people [Matamoros cult members] don't seem to know right from wrong. They're convinced that anything they do is right." Also in the book Sacrifice, authorities described the suspects as being cavalier about what they had done. There was no apparent remorse, or fear.

This cult, like the one in California, had a rigid leader, 26-year-old Adolfo Constanzo, who ordered the kidnappings and killings. Constanzo was also, apparently trans-generationally influenced by occultic practices. He was an American of Cuban descent, born in Miami, Florida. Growing up, neighbors sometimes complained of dead animals on their doorstep after somehow offending his family, according to the book Sacrifice.

Note(s): Several months after the initial reports of the satanic cult killing in Brazil, reporter Tod Lewan filed a story with the Associated Press that provides a more in-depth look at the whole picture.

Guaratuba, Brazil — It was 7 p.m., the killing hour. Evandro Caetano, 7 years old, lay gagged and bound to a wooden table in the dark sawmill. Outside, devil worshippers prepared an altar for the sacrifice.

Osvaldo Marcineiro, the cult's "high priest," who later revealed the details of the secret ritual in a videotaped confession, nodded to his followers.

Inside the mill seven masked figures in red and black circled Evandro. The black and white candles they held filled the room with light. (Marcineiro recalled that the boy wriggled and tried to scream.)

As the cult leader chanted softly, two women pinned Evandro's arms. A man gripped his throat squeezing until the boy went limp.

Another cult member slit Evandro's throat with a kitchen knife and collected his blood in a bowl.

With a handsaw, Marcineiro cut off the hands, ears, toes and genitals, then removed the eyes, heart...

"A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim." — Aleister Crowley.

Imagine the stark terror of the little boy struggling for his life that night. As he looked up imploringly at the two women who approached him first, what did the young child think? Like his mother, the women would comfort him, help ease his fear, his pain?

Instead of comforting looks, what did he see as they reached to hold his arms down? Were the women smiling? Laughing hysterically? Staring coldly?

What if it had only been a cult torture session, like so many ritual abuse survivors describe? What if, instead of his throat being slit, the ritual had ended with the high priest folding back the child's eyelid, for instance, and partially slitting the inside? (A survivor describes this exact torture in my first book, Breaking the Circle of Satanic Ritual Abuse.)

Would that be enough terror for Evandro's unconscious to repress the memory, had he lived? And years later, if the memory came flooding back, would that same Evandro be curled in the corner of a therapist's office somewhere, spontaneous bruises, like what happened with Kathy, appearing on his arms where the women brutally held him down, and screaming uncontrollably that scream that was muffled that night, so long ago? (Just like so many other cult survivors whose screams didn't come out — until years later.)

How many? Work is still being done on that. But the investigation into Evandro's case yields some more clues.

The people who killed Evandro were part of a cult called "Superior Universal Light," as, for example, Aleister Crowley's group is called "Ordo Templi Orientis." And, like Crowley's group, the Superior Universal Light cult is networked, according to Joao Noranha, who is a federal investigator in Panama.

According to Lewan's article, Noranha said this particular cult has about 2,000 members and gets donations from around the world — including the United States, South Korea, France, Chile and Argentina — to commit human sacrifices.

What's even more amazing about the Brazil ritual saga is that a group of Guaratuba residents, on their own, infiltrated the cult, and not only learned of Evandro's killing, but also learned another seven-year-old had been abducted and was being prepared for another sacrifice. According to the article, an Argentina couple had paid cult kidnappers $2,000 for this boy. This couple subsequently fled, and a search of their house turned up cult registers and satanist publications.

One of the cult infiltrators was Evandro's 36-year-old uncle Diogenes Caetano dos Santos. "It was chilling," he said. "It was so crazy, we didn't even know if the police would believe us."

One other thing: the high priest that killed Evandro — by day, he administered grade schools and day-care centers for the city.

DAY-CARE RITUAL ABUSE

There's been an increasing number of reports of ritual abuse in some day-care centers and schools. In Breaking the Circle, there is an interview with a therapist in northern California who reported being referred 24 children between the ages of approximately three and six over a period of a year and a half. (The therapist, Pamela Hudson, LCSW, was employed at a county children's protective service.) Each child was exhibiting, to one degree or another, sadistic impulses, night terror, extreme abandonment issues, sexual acting out behavior... And besides all these commonalities, there was one other. All the children had attended the same day-care center. And what's more, reportedly none of the parents had talked to each other until after they had brought the children in for help.

This case was taken to the District Attorney's office, said Hudson, but they made a decision not to attempt prosecution. Hudson said she attributes that decision to the lack of physical evidence, the young ages of the children, and the difficulty of making emotionally traumatizing evidence credible to a jury.

However, similar cases around the country have now gone to litigation.

TEXAS TRAUMA

Fran's Day-Care Center case bears many similarities to the northern California case. And what's more, day-care center operators Frances and Dan Keller have already received 48-year prison sentences for child sexual abuse charges.

According to a Cox News Service story:

> "Slowly and painfully the terrible secrets of what happened at the charming day-care home are > being revealed. The little children are talking and telling tales of being buried alive with animals, painting pictures with bones dipped in blood, being 'shot' and resurrected, digging up a body in a cemetery and nailing it together, having giant germs implanted in their bodies, and making pornographic movies at gun point."

The article went on to explain that police reported some of the children from the day-care center were exhibiting such symptoms as persistent nightmares, acting out sexually, sadistic behavior, and so on.

The initial conviction of the day-care center operators helped empower other parents to come forward and share their children's stories. Again, according to the Cox News Service article, these stories have included:

> [The children, eight of whom are now in therapy] being forced to close their eyes while the Kellers took a meat cleaver and pretended to chop off their fingers. One child peeked and saw Dan Keller pull a bone from a bag and smear it with blood from a jar. The child was forced to paint a picture with "Satan's arm" dipped in blood.
> Watching the Kellers place infants in the back yard swimming pool and letting them sink. Frances Keller would then remove the body from the bottom of the pool, baptize it with blood, and offer it to Satan.
> The Kellers killing a baby named Rachel by cutting her heart out...
> One boy said a gun was held to his head while he was forced to molest his infant sister. When the pornographic movie was replayed for him, the > gun was not visible and he realized he had been tricked.

The prosecutor's office had contacted Austin therapist Pam Monday to serve as an expert witness in the case. While she wasn't called, she followed the case closely. (Monday has worked with many ritual abuse survivors.)

In a recent interview, Monday said of the case: "What was amazing was there was a conviction. The children were believed. And there will be more. These cases aren't going away."

The Cox News Service story, which was written by Denise Gamino and Pamela Ward, also quoted Texas ranger Johnny Waldrip who helped out on the investigation. "I believe the kids wholeheartedly," Waldrip says. "It's something I've seen before. It's a purposely done thing."

> He [Waldrip] says that he believes they [the children] were subjected to ritualistic acts such as graveyard rituals "so when kids start talking about babies being killed and bodies dug up it discredits them so much no one believes them..."

Just like, perhaps, no one believed a group of children in southern California when they started talking about a secret underground tunnel where the most heinous abuse imaginable was reported to be taking place.

McMARTIN EVIDENCE IGNORED

The longest trial in American history, California's McMartin Pre-School case, was one of the first day-care center cases involving satanic ritual abuse. Some 460 separate reports were filed at the Manhattan Beach police department.

The children's stories included sexual abuse, torture, animal sacrifices, baby sacrifices and being prostituted in private homes and businesses throughout the community...

Jackie McGauley's daughter attended the McMartin Pre-School for five months. The girl told of being stripped, tied up, and left in a closet. She talked of watching a man kill a baby. She eventually began experiencing abandonment fears and nightmares where she'd wake screaming, terrified.

Variations of these types of stories were told over and over by the children connected to the case. Yet, in the end, the jury didn't convict.

However, some of the parents wouldn't let the issue rest, continuing to try to search out the truth.

"...where the children said it would be."

During the McMartin trial, many of the children would consistently talk about underground tunnels and rooms below the pre-school, where a lot of the abuse supposedly went on.

A highly qualified archaeologist was hired by the children's families to search for the illusive tunnels.

Dr. Gary Stickel, Ph.D., has worked extensively in the United States and Europe, including heading up the largest underwater archeological sonar survey ever conducted in Europe. In addition, he has been a consultant to Lucas Films in the development of the Indiana Jones movie series. He is also past professor of archeology at the University of California at Long Beach.

Stickel reiterated the children had continually talked of the tunnels. So the defense initially hired a private investigator, who in turn, went out to the site and did some preliminary informal digging. It is reported, said Stickel, that this investigator found some rabbit bones in the soil. (The children talked about rabbits being sacrificed.) However, the day before he was to testify, the private investigator was found dead from a gunshot wound, said Stickel. It was determined a suicide. But Stickel said the determination was questioned by more than a few people, given the timing, etc.

After this, the parents went out and did some informal digging, finding more animal bones. The bones were analyzed, and showed evidence of trauma (violent death), said Stickel. Shortly after, the site was sealed off.

Eventually, an archeological firm dug seven pits — clustered outside the building. (This was curious, said Stickel, because the children were reporting some of the major abuse had gone on in tunnels below the building.) Stickel said the firm only dug exploratory pits down six inches a piece. What's more, they did find a couple anomalies, which they wanted to pursue, but Stickel said they were curtailed from going any further with these. They also did attempt to use a remote sensing device to check below the school. However, Stickel said the type of device used would be totally ineffective when used within the confines of the building they were working from.

"To say it was an incomplete job, is to put it mildly," Stickel said.

That all happened in 1985. Five years later, a developer who owned a lot adjacent to the McMartin Pre-School, bought the school property. He allowed the children's parents access to the site.

Under the recommendation of UCLA's archeology department, Stickel's firm was then hired by the parents.

Using sophisticated ground-penetrating radar, Stickel said a tunnel was found — right where some of the children had told his staff it would be.

The tunnel extended from near Ray Buckey's (one of the accused) classroom, said Stickel. It was about three feet wide, except at one point where it was nine feet across. (The children had said there was a "room" in the tunnels where some of the abuse had gone on.)

However, even though evidence of the tunnel was found in May of 1990, while the trial was still in progress — the prosecution, surprisingly, never even introduced this in court.

"Finding such a tunnel was highly relevant [to the case]," said Stickel. "Because it [prior lack of physical evidence of a tunnel] was a major thing used to discredit the children."

Stickel, again, said it is "very questionable" why this wasn't introduced in court. Many of the parents felt the same, said McGauley.

"This really has a tendency to affect your opinion of how objective the legal system is in presenting a case," Stickel added.

The following are some excerpts from a preliminary report about the tunnel findings:

— Nine-foot-wide subterranean entrance found under the west wall of Ray Buckey's classroom.

— Second [possible] tunnel [appears to] extend from the bathroom off the office and classroom #1, to the front yard of the triplex next door. Front yard concealed from street by three-car garage.

— Tunnel features made it evident [at least one tunnel] was hand-dug.

PEDOPHILE ACTIVISTS

There is another quite interesting peripheral note about the McMartin case. After the case was completed, the book Pity the Little Children: The Politics of Child Abuse and the Abuse of Innocence: The McMartin Pre-School Trial was released.

In it, authors Shirley and Paul Eberle indicate, among other things, that the reports of child sexual/ritual abuse in the case were unfounded, and the children had been coerced into reporting the abuse by hysterical mothers and overzealous social workers.

The book has been widely cited, seriously reviewed. However, something seems to have been omitted from the About the Authors blurb.

According to an article in the spring, 1994, Journal of Psychohistory, Paul and Shirley Eberle were publishers of an underground child pornography journal in Los Angeles called Finger.

Also, according to the article:

> ...the Eberles have been called "the most prolific publishers of child pornography in the United States" by Sgt. Toby Tyler, a San Bernadino, CA., deputy sheriff who is a nationally recognized expert on child pornography. Their kiddie porn material I have seen and the articles they have published such as I Was a Sexpot at 5 and Little Lolitas included illustrations of children involved in sodomy and oral copulation, and featured pornographic photos of the Eberles.

I contacted Sgt. Tyler to verify the statement. Tyler said during the mid-1970s the Eberles were the most prolific publishers of child pornography in the United States. He said they not only published the magazine Finger, but also Love Magazine and the LA Star. Each periodical, said Tyler, contained child pornography.

"When the Eberles say they have knowledge and expertise in the field of child sexual abuse, I'd have to say I believe them — that is, they've had so much experience exploiting children," said Sgt. Tyler.

CHILD PROSTITUTION

In some day-care center cases, children talk about being taken off-site and into the community to be prostituted for sex. It's important to note here, there's been an explosion of child prostitution around the world in recent years, both behind closed doors — and right out in the open.

According to a June 21, 1993, Time magazine report, child prostitution in Russia and Eastern European countries is dramatically rising. And in the Third World some of the staggering estimates include: 800,000 underage prostitutes in Thailand, 400,000 in India, 250,000 in Brazil... What's more, in recent years Europeans, Australians, Japanese and Americans have flocked to, for instance, Southeast Asia by the thousands to legally engage in sex acts with youngsters. One of the Time magazine stories was about a Russian man that was pimping for several children. He would even dress up one of his young boys as a girl to increase his appeal to deviants.

It's important to note here that in the scheme of normal human development, for the first ten years, or so, children have an inbred aversion to sex. They see their parents passionately kissing, and a natural response is a stereotypical "...yuk." They see an explicit sex scene on TV, for instance, and get disgusted. They are developmentally and biologically set up that way.

Thus, if adults force them to have sex, it dramatically violates their natural physical and psychological boundaries. And consequently, adverse feelings explode inside a child: anger, nausea, deep sadness, shame. However, at the time of the abuse it is often not safe to express these feelings and, like the memories, they often get repressed.

(That's why, years later when the traumatic memories are being recalled, these waves of painful repressed feelings surface as well, often making parts of the recovery gut-retchingly horrendous.)

Also, repeated sexual and/or ritual abuse, destroys a child's self-esteem, as it did with Kathy. This lack of self-esteem sets up the worst possible "Catch-22" situation for the victim. The lower the self-esteem, the more dependent a child/teen will be on a parent — who may also be the perpetrator.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS

Ritual abuse is not just inherent to day-care settings. It also apparently happens in some elementary schools. The following is an excerpt from Breaking the Circle of Satanic Ritual Abuse:

> I am an adult survivor of childhood ritual abuse. I wasn't raised by a cult, but was abused by members of a highly organized satanic cult operating out of a rural elementary school. [Population of the Midwestern town was 10,000.] The abuse took place over approximately a one year period when I was five and a half to six and a half years old.

Years later in therapy, Victoria Light (pseudonym) had memories of being penetrated with a wooden wand while being restrained on a table in the school medical office. (She said the school doctor was the head of the cult.)

Her report goes on:

> This was not a group of people dabbling in the occult, but an established cult that employed > torture, programming, along with animal and human sacrifice. Besides being taken to the school medical office for rituals, I was taken out of school to the doctor's home, to the local mortuary, or to the local cemetery... A member of the local police was involved. The town was infested.

FLORIDA FINDINGS

The McMartin Pre-School children weren't the only ones talking about tunnels. Across the country, in Stuart, Florida, children who had attended a Montessori school there were also starting to report sexual abuse, torture, animal sacrifice, baby sacrifice... some of this also reported to be going on in tunnels below the school.

The case in Florida involves the Glendale Montessori School, and was investigated by Technology Strategic Planning Inc. The firm deals primarily with espionage, perpetration, and theft — and has been a consultant for members of Congress, the CIA, the FBI... Technology Strategic Planning is made up of a number of ex-CIA agents, ex-Drug Enforcement Agency agents, and so on. Henry (Skip) Clements Jr., Vice President of Strategic Operations, headed up the Montessori school investigation.

FIGURES MUSHROOM

As in the McMartin case, the horrific stories of abuse started to surface slowly and steadily in Stuart, Florida, eventually mushrooming into a phenomenon that involved as many as 300 children — and perhaps many more around the state, and even the country.

James Toward and his wife Rosario ran the Glendale Montessori School in Stuart from 1980 to 1987. In 1987, six children who had attended the school came forward with stories of sexual abuse. This allegedly at the hands of Toward, his wife, and a school secretary.

The children's stories were so compelling, said Clements, that a plea bargain was struck. James Toward pled guilty to four counts of sexual abuse and one count of kidnapping. The secretary pled guilty to one count of kidnapping, and intent to commit lewd, lascivious, indecent assault. In return, the rest of the investigation was dropped, said Clements.

But that's not where the story ended.

In the next few years, all types of things started going haywire with some of the town's children, said Clements. Youth suicides, and attempted suicides were way up. There were incidents of youth trying to kill each other. Some children were being confined to psychiatric units, said Clements.

The parents of the six original complainants had formed a support group, and as the youth problem kept multiplying, they put together a symposium for parents whose children had attended the Glendale Montessori School. Therapists, teachers, law enforcement and other concerned adults in the community were also invited. Some 900 people came, said Clements.

Clements said he went "...and was simply blown away," in regards to the details of how heinous the abuse had apparently been, how many children may have been affected and why more wasn't being done to follow up.

After the symposium, Clements said he went to the state attorney general's office to ask why the investigation had been abandoned. He said he was told that because of the plea bargain agreement, investigations had been stopped.

Clement's firm then voluntarily picked up the investigation. "And what we soon discovered was our school, or community, is part of a nationwide cult organization targeting small children," said Clements.

The firm read over thousands of pages of documents of the children telling about what had happened. (This information had been gathered initially by the state attorney's investigator, Larry Lawson.) The children talked of sexual abuse, animal sacrifice, underground "rooms," being taken off-site and being sexually abused by Toward, as well as other community members...

A number of children, said Clements, talked about the killing and dismemberment of babies. This was used as part of the code-of-silence programming to keep the children from telling their parents — because it might happen to them if they told the secrets, said Clements.

Clements said his firm also analyzed thousands of pages of phone calls made from the Glendale Montessori School during the seven years the Towards ran the school.

One of the things they found, said Clements, was a significant, and quite curious, number of phone calls to abortion clinics around the state. Clements said he surmised that's where some of the "dismembered babies" came from.

Note: I recently viewed a picture of a dismembered 21-week-old fetus after a D&E (Dilation and Evacuation) abortion procedure. His arms and legs had been dismembered, apparently as part of the procedure. If such a fetus/baby were doctored, and if it were staged right, it appears you could fool young children in a ritual setting.

Clements also said his firm found a substantial amount of phone traffic from the school to Mexico, Puerto Rico, Canada, and the Netherlands. Clements said a reporter for one of the Miami newspapers traced one of the calls to a publishing company in Canada that produced some pornographic materials. Clements also said a number of children talked about being photographed naked. Based on this data, Clements said he believes Toward may have been part of a pornographic ring. However, he said he believes Toward had been warned before the warrants were served, and if there was evidence of pornography, it had been taken from the school prior to investigators showing up.

Technology Strategic Planning noted numerous calls to other Montessori schools around the state. The firm also obtained records of Toward's Mastercard receipts and was able to track him to these other schools.

One such school, said Clements, is in Ormond Beach, Florida. Clements said Toward had apparently been visiting the school and staying overnight. (There were calls to the owner of this school.) As the firm investigated further, Clements said they discovered some 30 children in Ormond Beach, who had attended the same Montessori school there — were experiencing the same extreme abuse symptomology and telling some of the same stories as the children in Stuart.

Children in both Florida schools, said Clements, talked about underground tunnels and rooms below the foundation of the schools, just like in the McMartin case. Clements said Toward went to prison in 1989, and his firm didn't pick up the investigation until 1992. He said they are currently trying to get federal help to have access to do a search for the tunnels.

Clements said one day, in the midst of the investigation, he was visited by an FBI agent who wanted all the information the firm had gathered in the case. Clements said he refused, then inquired of the agent why the FBI hadn't followed up on the case themselves.

According to Clements, the FBI agent said that because the "official" agency stance is ritual abuse of this sort doesn't exist (based on an often-cited report by the FBI's Ken Lanning mentioned earlier), the agency seldom follows up on such cases. Because of that report, said Clements, agents coming out of the FBI Academy in Quantico don't get any training in this form of ritual abuse, and, he believes, are subsequently at a distinct disadvantage when a case like this comes up.

Note: Lanning's 1992 FBI report states: "Until hard evidence is obtained and corroborated, the public should not be frightened into believing that babies are being bred and eaten, that 50,000 missing children are being murdered in human sacrifices, or that satanists are taking over America's day-care centers or institutions..."

California's Monarch Resources reports that a recent University of New Hampshire research study shows for a one-year period there had been 270 day-care center sexual abuse cases reported just in the United States, involving 1,600 children. Some 15 percent of these cases also involved allegations of ritual abuse.

"This is so bizarre," said an exasperated Clements. "Here we are with this big problem, countless children are being hurt, and no one will help."

During the course of his firm's investigation, Clements said he consulted with a U.S. Customs agent. Clements said this agent is considered extremely knowledgeable about ritual abuse issues. During their talks, Clements said the agent relayed that his department had been investigating similar ritual abuse reports from schools in Kentucky and Mississippi. Children connected to these schools were also reporting secret tunnels, sexual abuse, animal sacrifice, mind control... said Clements. Some of the children were also reporting being flown to jungle areas in places like the Bahamas and photographed for pornography.

Before the department finished the investigation, it was disbanded, added Clements.

FEDERAL COMMISSION

Clements said there is no federal agency that is currently targeting looking into ritual abuse of children. In the pornography area (including child pornography), Clements said the only agency having success in curtailing the flow is the U.S. Postal Service, which he said claims they have cut down pornography some 85 percent in recent years.

Clements explained child pornography had been largely produced overseas, yet a substantial amount is consumed in the United States. (Child pornography is now a multi-billion dollar business. Also according to the June 21, 1993, Time magazine article: In Germany (for instance), annual sales of "kiddie porn" are estimated at $250 million, and the number of consumers between 30,000 and 40,000.)

Clements added, while U.S. Postal might have cut the importation of pornography dramatically to America — the demand hasn't been curtailed. So now, he said he believes much of the pornography is being generated domestically. And he cites the childrens' stories surfacing all over the country about being used in pornography as examples.

Clements believes that child abuse must be targeted at the federal level. He has recently written to members of Congress trying to generate interest in establishing an office in Washington that would oversee and coordinate efforts among the FBI, U.S. Postal, CIA, Department of Justice, and any other agencies that could have an impact on helping investigate and stop all forms of child abuse, including ritual abuse.

"How many children have died already?" asked Clements.

Clements said he vows to keep fighting this, and is not intimidated by what he believes he's up against as far as a ruthless, sophisticated, organized crime (cult) ring. "If they want a war — we'll give them one," said Clements.

Clements said since his firm has taken up the investigation, he's had conversations with a number of U.S. Customs field agents that have also come across similar cases. "And they keep encouraging me to keep going on this..."

MORE CASES

In the late '80s, Pamela Hudson, LCSW, became a pioneer in working with child ritual abuse victims. She devised a questionnaire and polled a group of parents involved in litigation in cases of purported ritual abuse around the country.

Using her questionnaire, Hudson did telephone interviews with parents whose children were involved in the McMartin case, and in similar cases in San Francisco and New Jersey, and in a satanic ritual abuse case in California involving a babysitter. She also talked with parents in Texas and Oregon. In all, she interviewed one set of parents from ten cases across the country. In the findings, she also included data from the case she had worked with.

No matter where in the country the abuse had taken place, the children demonstrated many of the same post-traumatic stress symptoms — night terrors, fear of the dark, extreme abandonment fear... Many reported being photographed during the ceremonies. Of the 11 alleged victims, ten reported being threatened with guns and knives, and nine reported watching people killed as part of the ceremonies. (A full report on these findings is included in Hudson's book Ritual Child Abuse.)

Hudson also said the similarities in these cases across the country are not only alarming, but an indication that perpetrators actually follow prescribed rituals that are fairly consistent and calculated. What's more, she said the types of torture and mind control reported to her by the children derive from conditioned response techniques reportedly developed for use with political prisoners, or prisoners of war. These include sensory deprivation and physical tortures, such as electric shock or forced drug-induced states.

PRESIDIO PROBLEMS

Investigative journalist Roy Blake in his book Objective Evil: Satanic Cults in U.S. Intelligence chronicles reports of day-care sexual/ritual abuse at San Francisco's Presidio army base. According to Blake's research, there were 59 alleged child victims claiming various forms of sexual abuse, being forced to consume urine and feces, having blood smeared on their bodies...

In some cases, reports Blake, children said that guns had been pointed at their heads, and the lives of their parents and other loved ones had been threatened if they talked.

A three-year-old boy, who was the first to report the abuse, was taken to San Francisco General Hospital where a doctor examined him and concluded the boy's anus had been traumatized in a manner consistent with penetration, Blake reported.

"The doctor's conclusion precipitated a number of meetings at the Presidio which were characterized later by some sources as more concerned with damage containment than an effort to protect the children still in the Presidio child-care center. Indeed it was nearly a month after the incident before the Army saw fit to notify parents whose children were still being seen at the Presidio child-care center," wrote Blake.

In this particular case, as the children started to come forward, they also talked of being prostituted in houses on and off-base — one of the homes being that of Temple of Set (satan) leader Col. Michael Aquino, reports Blake. Among the more bizarre findings at Aquino's house, said Blake, was a room with all black walls, and another room that was soundproof.

Blake also notes San Jose Mercury News reporter Linda Goldston found evidence that satanic activities were not new to the Presidio.

According to Blake's book:

> In the early 1980s a then Military Policeman stationed at the Presidio recalled he received a call from the Portola McArthur housing area where witnesses reported a man dressed in black was leading a little girl somewhere. The witnesses > apparently became concerned when they heard screams nearby. Although they were unable to locate either the girl or the man dressed in black, while in hot pursuit the MPs kicked open the door of a gardener's shack and discovered a huge pentagram painted on the floor and such bizarre accessories as a mannequin with a gun pointed at the door, and the heads of the dolls.

Note: Again, as mentioned in "Kathy's Story," ritual abuse investigative experts say besides the authentic torture and killings, there also might be a lot of "smoke-and-mirror" tactics used by the cult to intimidate children. A mannequin pointing a gun at a doll's head in the shadows would look awfully real to a child as would, say, a knife buried in a baby-doll smeared with animal blood.

NEW ZEALAND NIGHTMARE

Several years later, and thousands of miles away from San Francisco, children at a day-care center in Christchurch, New Zealand, were reporting much the same sexual/ritual abuse stories as the children from the Presidio.

Day-care staff member Peter Ellis, 35, was eventually sentenced to ten years in prison for sexual violation and indecency involving seven of the children who attended the day-care center between 1986 and 1992.

As in other day-care cases, the parents banded together for support. And the conviction in no way ended the saga. The scars cut deep.

One of the parents, in fact, started an End Ritual Abuse Newsletter to give affected parents a forum to air their feelings, and to warn others. According to one grandmother, when the stories initially started to surface:

> ...we felt confident that Mary [her granddaughter] could not have been involved, for we surely would have known. That was before we knew of the > threats which would ensure that the children remain silent.

> I will always remember the shock of being told... I was sickened, angry beyond imagining at the abuse itself, and by the betrayal of trust by everyone at the creche [day-care center].
> In successive months I too lost my innocence. As more and more details came to light I learned more about sexual abuse of children, ritual abuse, child pornography rings, and sex tourism...

If this relative, and others were "shocked" at all this, imagine some of their feelings when New Zealand's Sunday Star-Times ran a front-page article on June 5, 1994, about Peter Ellis now writing children's books from his prison cell.

According to the article:

> The parents of one of the children found to have been abused by Ellis are furious over the books — especially Pretty Flowers, which is about an evil witch who captures a group of young children.
> "It's dangerous material because it's full of triggers and reminders for the children that have been abused," said one mother.
> "It's art imitating his real life, the sick childish ramblings of a convicted pedophile," a father of an abuse victim added. "...It would take a brave publisher to publish the books."

To go back to the End Ritual Abuse Newsletter, the grandmother went on to say:

> However, when I spent a horrendous evening watching videos of TV programs on child abuse and pornography... and saw how similar this Christchurch case was to others in this country and overseas, I discovered again the anger I needed to start writing. For me it is terribly important that the children's stories are not just believed, but also told to the world...

Chapter 7

TEEN INVOLVEMENT

More and more youth are being drawn toward all types of sadistic hate groups: Ku Klux Klan, Neo-Nazis, satanic cults...

According to a June 3, 1988, Fort Worth Star Telegram article:

> Cult activity is on the increase in Mansfield and southeast Tarrant County, police and school officials said yesterday.
> [Mansfield police officer, Bill] Parish said dabblers in the occult are adolescents who have just become involved in satanism. It's the first stage of satan worship, typified by stealing from churches, burning Bibles and desecrating cemeteries. He said it also may involve sacrificing small animals.

And in some cases, it may involve much more.

May 5, 1993 — Three eight-year-old boys were riding their bikes down a country road in West Memphis, Arkansas. Suddenly, they were forced off the road and horribly killed.

One of the suspects accused in the murder, Jessie Lloyd Misskelley Jr., 17, according to wire service reports, told police that the murders were tied to a satanic cult.

> Misskelley said the children were lured into a wooded area of West Memphis known as Robin Hood Park, choked until they were unconscious and then brutalized in various ways, including > rape. He said he ran off into the woods and threw up after watching Jason Baldwin (16), mutilate one unconscious youngster. Police have said the boys died from blows to the head, but have refused to say if they were sexually mutilated.

Misskelley also told police the cult held orgies in the woods, and that to join, members had to kill dogs and eat their back legs.

According to a USA Today article at the time, another suspect, Michael Echols, 18, who calls himself "Damien" (from the movie Omen, about the anti-christ), once told a pastor he couldn't go to heaven because he was already committed — to going to hell. The article also said Echols is described by acquaintances as someone who carried a cat skull, wrote satanic poems and favored wearing all black.

Shortly after the murders, I was asked to do the CNN talk show Sonya Live, which was to focus on this incident. At the beginning of the show, there was a telephone link-up with an attorney for one of the suspects, who said he had followed the media reports and had read some 30 pages of depositions around the case. And when asked to comment on the cult-related aspects of the case, he responded that "...at this time, they [officials] aren't characterizing it as a cult killing."

Two of the accused eventually got life, another was sentenced to death. According to a summary article of the trials in Memphis, Tennessee's The Commercial Appeal newspaper, reporter John Beifuss noted:

> But prosecutors made little mention of occult connection to the crime beyond the few references in Misskelley's statement to police... the defense ridiculed the lack of hard evidence presented in court, and the University of California social psychologist, Richard J. Ofshe, attributed police allegations to "satanic hysteria."

Brittenten, Arkansas, chief juvenile officer Jerry Driver was also involved with the case. He said Michael "Damien" Echols was heavily involved in the occult, there were satanic cult ceremonies, and that the incident happened near a satanic high holy day. But he said he wasn't certain if these particular killings were tied to a formalized cult ceremony.

Driver said satanic graffiti continues to crop up in the area and there are rumors of other occult criminal activity. But at this point he said nothing more has been found.

Ohio ritual crime investigator Dale Griffis was called as an expert witness in the case. He said based on his research the killings were a ritualized event. Griffis said, for example, all three boys were tied in a similar fashion and each was brutalized far beyond what it would take to simply kill them.

"My concern in this particular case is more whether they got all the group," said Griffis.

COVERING THEIR TRACKS

In the Arkansas case, People magazine reported West Memphis authorities began looking into reports of ritualistic activities in the area almost a year prior. Among the sites they investigated was "Stonehenge," a decaying local cotton gin painted with satanic graffiti and strewn with animal carcasses, which a friend said one of the suspects visited. Also, according to the article, teens "...called up demons [there] as a joke."

John Hunt, a ritual crime investigator and also a crime prevention officer at Austin College in Texas, has been actively investigating ritual crime sites since 1989. During this time, he said he has also developed ritual crime seminars/trainings to educate law enforcement.

He said the training has evolved because the issue is coming up more and more. "More police officers have been trained [in ritualistic crime] because, before when there was a crime scene with these ritualistic components, they were merely treated as other things."

Hunt said he knew there was a lot of ritual crime being perpetrated in Grayson County, Texas, and decided to start to actively investigate — even though this would often take him out of his physical jurisdiction. He has actually become somewhat of a ritual crime investigator maverick, investigating on his own, and turning the information over to whatever law enforcement agency was responsible for a particular area.

He said sometimes the information has been accepted gratefully, while other law enforcement agencies didn't want anything to do with it. He explained he believes that some agencies are simply in denial any of this ritual crime activity exists.

Hunt has seen satanic altars, dogs "cut and blooded," sacrificed calves, even a 2,000 pound bull that had been ritually killed, the testicles and penis removed.

One of the ritual sites Hunt discovered was an abandoned home in rural Grayson County. He and another officer were led there by an informant. The home sat on a small knoll off by itself. They found walls, windows and floors draped in heavy black plastic. "The plastic is used to keep people from seeing in and to keep the blood from staining," said Hunt. There were also imprints of a pentagram and 666 in the plaster, a candle holder, and a butcher knife with blood stains.

Three weeks after Hunt and the other officer were there, the house burned down. Curiously, no gas or electric went to the house at the time. And the fire was so hot, said Hunt, it left no charred wood, just ash.

Similar to the warehouse/ritual site that burned down in California, Hunt said that this was the third ritual site he had investigated that subsequently burned down. Hunt said many of the cults are masters at covering their tracks and "...when the heat gets too hot, they simply go underground for a while."

Hunt has presented seminars on the occult to churches, service organizations, law enforcement agencies, even at an Indian reservation. He is also in the process of helping start "RIOT," Ritual Investigators of Texas.

NATIONAL SOCIETY

The International Council on Cultism and Ritual Trauma was established in 1993. Based in Richardson, Texas, its goal is to promote ongoing networking, advocacy and research. Council President Randy Noblitt, Ph.D., said he has observed a marked increase in criminal and civil legal actions associated with allegations of ritual abuse. And he said he believes there needs to be standardized, non-oppressive police and judicial procedures, so the survivor doesn't feel traumatized again by the system — the same as, for instance, some rape victims have felt in the legal system over the years.

RITUAL ABUSE GOES TO COURT

Some ritual abuse survivors are, in fact, starting to stand up for their rights legally.

For instance, a Geauga County, Ohio, common pleas judge awarded a $10 million default judgment to a Hiram, Ohio, woman who charged that her father and other men raped her as a child during cult activities, according to a Cleveland Plain Dealer news report.

The lawsuit contended the abuse occurred in Russel Township, Mantua and Hiram from 1963 to 1971. Jamie Ann Sitko, 37, claimed in psychotherapy sessions she "vividly recalled incidents which involved men, including her father, standing in a circle around a fire with hoods, cat's blood, live cats, dead cats, candles, chants and threats of violence, to force her compliance, some of which were carried out," according to lawsuit papers.

James West Pou, the father, who lives out of state, did not respond to the lawsuit or the Plain Dealer's interview requests. According to the article, Sitko brought the suit because: "People need to know that this does happen. If everyone spoke up about it, it would help others in the long run."

FANTASY ROLE?

Some cult researchers, and cult members talk about the game Dungeons and Dragons as a stepping stone to satanism, and sometimes murder. That might be the case for an Austin, Texas, man. According to a December 9, 1992, Austin American Statesman article:

> Dungeons and Dragons paraphernalia, pornographic magazines, and black robes, horns and guns were found in the home of a man charged with fatally shooting a woman 13 times...

Austin homicide detective Sgt. Dan Zahara said the suspect, James Noer, 23, told him he frequently played fantasy role playing games.

"His [Noer's] letters talk about demons and he dabbled in Dungeons and Dragons," said Zahara. "Lots of people play the game and don't kill people, but he carried this fantasy land too far."

Noer was charged with killing Rhonda Gail Lewis, 28, who was a topless dancer. According to the Austin American Statesman article, police found more than 200 computer discs, magazine pictures of women in bondage and articles with captions like: "Satan Escapes from Hell."

The Statesman article said friends told police Noer had perverted sexual contacts with women over a computer network. Apparently, from reports, he was into masochism and bondage. The article also noted Noer had picked the role of "assassin" in several of the games. And:

> ...one friend told police that Noer, who worked in the computer room at Austin Community College, participated in computer bulletin boards "to sublimate his desire to kill people."

MERELY CULTURAL BELIEF?

Skeptics sometimes refer to talk about dangerous satanic cults as merely the paranoid product of "cultural beliefs." Apparently, not reality-based. However, for Shawn Sellars, who was sentenced to death row in Oklahoma State Prison, the whole satanism phenomenon was quite reality-based. And, in fact, his involvement in satanism was actually a calculated, methodical process.

According to the book Cults That Kill, a friend testified Sellars had formed a satanic group called "The Elimination." The friend testified he and Sellars wore black robes and drank blood. During the trial, Sellars said he actually wrote in his own blood: "I renounce God. I renounce Christ. I will serve Satan."

He eventually killed his parents and a convenience store owner as sacrifices to satan. "Thou shalt not kill" was the only one of the Judeo-Christian Ten Commandments he hadn't broken yet, Sellars said. In October 1986 he was convicted of three counts of murder.

As a lead-up to the satanism and the murders, Sellars said he was heavily involved in the game Dungeons and Dragons, was fascinated with ouija boards, horror films, black metal music.

One black metal band, Venom, sings:

Candles glowing, altars burn
Virgin's death is needed there
Sacrifice to Lucifer my master.

Bring the chalice, raise the knife
Welcome to my sacrifice...

Sgt. Ray Rast of the Independence Missouri Police Department worked with ritual crime for 15 years. He said he's worked with numerous cases involving, primarily, teen "dabblers" in Satanism. However, he said several of the youth had gone so far as to write "death contracts" to Satan in their own blood. They would also sometimes self-mutilate with knives.

I interviewed Sgt. Rast in 1996. He said he's observed an increase in teenage experimentation with Satanism the past five years, although he said he's watched it "ebb and flow" over the 15 years he's been involved working with it.

Sgt. Rast also said it's been his observation many of the kids who get involved with Satanism come from troubled homes with little structure, and are looking for a sense of belonging.

One would have to ask what was going on with a group of teens at Troy High School in Orange County, California. In June of 1996, I was in California to give a lecture in Orange County. The day I arrived, newspapers there were running front page stories on some graduating seniors who had cut several animals in half and nailed them to trees outside the school. They also spray painted the name of the black metal band Slayer on a wall of the school near the animals. (Slayer was the band it was reported the California Satanic cult was listening to the night they killed the four defectors.)

I contacted an editor at the Orange County Register, a newspaper that has won a number of prestigious journalistic awards, and offered to give him at least one perspective of what might be going on behind the scenes.

He told me a reporter had already talked to the kids involved and determined it was merely a "prank" and they weren't going to do anymore with the story.

One would have to wonder if merely "talking to the kids," in this case, would really yield the whole truth, or for that matter, constitute very thorough reporting.

What would the kids in Arkansas had said if they were caught killing animals and spray painting at Stonehenge Park, say, a month prior to killing the eight-year-olds?

SATANIC HYSTERIA?

A PARENT'S NIGHTMARE?

Ethan Watters said he initially started writing about the subject of satanic ritual abuse in connection with the Olympia, Washington-Paul Ingram case. Paul Ingram claimed, as had members of his family, that he had abused them as part of satanic rituals. According to a May 1993 New Yorker Magazine article, the prosecution flew Richard Ofshe in to consult. Prior to Ofshe's arrival, according to the article, some of the children's and father's stories of the cult ritual abuse weren't matching up.

Ofshe set up a "little experiment" for his first meeting with Ingram. Although Ofshe had yet to talk with Ingram's daughters, he told Ingram he had. What's more, he said the daughters said they remembered he had forced them to have sex with each other.

Ingram said he didn't remember that. But after thinking about it awhile, he told Ofshe he could remember that.

According to the New Yorker article, after later supposedly reviewing reports, interview data gathered, etc., Ofshe contacted Ingram by phone and urged him to withdraw his guilty plea before the sentencing. The magazine reported on how part of that conversation supposedly went. (At the time, according to the magazine piece, Ingram was having some doubts about the validity of his memories, and he was hopeful more would come.)

"I'll tell you something, Paul — you are never going to get them," Ofshe said. "There is no way that you are going to be able to remember anything that is going to reconcile all the lies that have been told about this in the last few months..."

Then later in the conversation: "Maybe somebody can blank out one event that was just life-threatening to them, terrifying, disgusting, beyond belief," Ofshe concluded. "Nobody can blank out as many events as you blanked out. It has never happened."

Skeptics began pointing to this case, and this article series, as one of the bench marks for the validity of false memory claims, and the continued debunking of the existence of satanic ritual abuse. The New Yorker article writer, Lawrence Wright, went on to write a book about the case called Remembering Satan: A Case of Recovered Memory and the Shattering of an American Family. A review of the book in an April 4, 1994, Newsweek starts out:

> Paul Ingram's daughters are every parent's worst nightmare. Erika and Julie were obedient responsible girls and faithful to their family's fundamentalist religion... Then, in the fall of 1988, when Erika was 22 and Julie 18, both daughters suddenly moved out of their parents' house in Olympia, Washington. Several weeks later, they told their mother and the authorities that their father had been sexually molesting them for years. Before long they were embellishing their accusations with descriptions of satan worship that included rape and the slaughter of babies.

These young women were every parent's "nightmare" and they were "embellishing" the stories, writes the Newsweek reviewer, who, incidentally, probably never interviewed the daughters. But he concurred they were "embellishing," just like Ethan Watters knew the inside of young Sarah's mind, even though he had never talked to her.

In my interview with Watters, he said he could approach the Mother Jones article about Kathy with a "point of view" because magazine articles allow that type of subjective latitude. And while journalists are aware of the difference, I asked Watters how many people in the general public know there's this sort of unwritten rule with magazines. He told me a lot of people understood that.

One has to ask, do they? One has to also ask, because Ingram was going through a series of apparently fragmented remembrances about his perpetration, was he more susceptible at that point to somewhat tacitly taking a suggestion of a memory from Ofshe because it just seemed to fit the general scenario? And for that matter, the New Yorker article even states: "None of the investigators would have been surprised if Ingram had orchestrated sex among his children." Knowing about other ritual abuse survivor accounts of things like forced sex between siblings, couldn't a questioner cleverly manipulate the situation to make the whole scenario appear not credible?

One has to also ask, if Ingram was in the early stages of having real flashbacks — as Harvard researcher Stephen Kosslyn postulates about brain functioning — was Ingram's imagination kicking in to prematurely fill out the rest of the storyboard? And did Ofshe's suggestion merely fit into that equation? (One has to also ask, again, if Ofshe knows nobody can blank out as many events as Ingram purported he had, why are Harvard researchers like Dr. Van der Kolk, Judith Herman, and others, finding strong indications you can?)

Another couple crucial questions one has to ask about this case are: Why have Ingram's daughters never backed down from their stories? And why was Ingram still sentenced to 20 years in prison for the charges?

Of course, though, according to the New Yorker article, even going to prison may have been part of Ingram's motivation. The article states four years after Ingram's sentencing: "He works as an editor of the prison's newspaper and as a clerk in the prison's law library. He has always been drawn to the simple, regimented life, and prison is particularly agreeable to him."

PANIC IN PENNSYLVANIA

A 12-year-old girl fled from a house in Johnstown, Pennsylvania telling of extreme ritual torture and other forms of abuse perpetrated on her, and her six siblings, by parents and neighbors. According to an Associated Press article:

> Police say the mistreatment included beatings, cultish bloodlettings, exorcisms, sodomy, > stretchings, heated needles under the fingernails... Neighbors also participated... They [the children] told of satanic rituals, of Rickie Gaddis [the father] using ceremonial knives to draw blood from adults and children alike...

"They [the children] were terrified of him, absolutely terrified," Detective Yvonee Krug said. "They believed he had super-human powers."

Court documents indicated Rickie Gaddis and his wife began sexually abusing two of their girls around January 1990, some 18 months before they moved into a three-story building where the abuse intensified, and other residents were drawn into the torturing, according to the article.

HISTORICAL CHILD SACRIFICE

People sometimes express skepticism at even the concept of parents torturing and sacrificing their children. And for some it is sheerly unbelievable it would ever occur on a wide scale.

Wisconsin cult researcher Jack Roper lectures on "Historical Child Sacrifice," and is currently working on a book on the same subject. Roper said the world has a long history of child (and adult) sacrifice.

He cited Carthage, North Africa, from the eighth century BC to the second century BC, as a graphic example. This was a culture that worshipped the god Baal and goddess Tanit. [Baal was that era's label for satan.] Children were regularly sacrificed to these gods. A University of Chicago archeological team recently found a sacrificial site 64,000 square feet wide, and nine levels deep, with small burial urns with the bones of sacrificed children, said Roper.

HARASSMENT

To have stayed as covert as they have for so long, some sadistic cults have had to be highly connected, highly thorough and highly sophisticated. The following story indicates, perhaps, some of just how thorough and sophisticated. (The story also indicates the type of extensive investigation some of these cases entail.)

It was written by Akron, Ohio, police detective and ritual crime expert Andrew Kasarda. Kasarda is a 23-year veteran of the Akron police department who also teaches about ritual crime in criminology courses at Akron University. Prior to his police work, during a three-year tour in Vietnam, he was awarded two Bronze Stars and an Army Commendation for Valor and Heroism.

SATANIC CULT MURDER?

by Andrew Kasarda

An average of 130 reports a day come into the Akron Police Department. As was my practice, I took one off the Felonious Assault Board to work on. The victim was a white, 37-year-old female. There was something unusual about this report as I read it. Two men and one woman entered the victim's home, burned her with acid, cut her, then ritualistically drank the blood that ran from a cut above the pubic area.

To follow up on the report, I spoke to the victim, Susan, who at the time was confined to the psychiatric ward at the local hospital. Due to her early association with the satanic cult, she displayed multiple personality disorder. To escape the horror of what was happening to her in the cult, she would revert to another personality. Sue's medical records documented 125 distinct personalities developed because she was born into the cult and abused by parents and grandparents who were also involved.

When I met with Sue, she relayed to me things that sounded insane, but she named names, times, and vaguely, places. Sue was permitted to leave the hospital accompanied by her therapist Grace. Grace said that if I had any questions, she would ask them of Sue, and Sue would in turn write out the answers. When I got the answers on a piece of paper, they made no sense and looked like a jumbled mess. The therapist then told me to hold the paper with the answers on it upside-down and backwards against the windshield. There before me in the reflection on the windshield were my answers perfectly written. The hair on the back of my neck stood up, as the sergeant who was driving the car looked startled.

Sue directed us to abandoned mines where she claimed sacrificial bodies were disposed of. She stated the satanists would put the bodies into wood chippers that would pulverize the body and expel the fragments into the mine shafts. As a safety precaution, the shafts were cemented closed and the Ohio Bureau of Natural Resources, although helpful, would not permit us to enter because of the danger.

After taking Sue back to the hospital, I started checking into some of the names she had given me. One was a minister in charge of a small church in town. I visited the church which had no windows or other way to see in. I went to the minister's house. He seemed a bit nervous at my visit. He explained his church was a "touchy-feely" church, where each individual did whatever they thought was proper.

Other names mentioned by Sue included judges, attorneys, policemen and other prominent people.

I contacted the FBI in Quantico, Virginia, because I had no one to turn to who was experienced at this type of case. I spoke to an agent who suggested some reading material. When I began reading, I started to understand Sue's situation. I understood the victimization and means used to force unwilling members to participate. The nature of the rituals became clearer also, and seemed to fit what Sue was telling me.

At about the same time, the minister I'd visited was seen at the hospital with a name tag bearing a different name than his own. Sue clammed up and stated that she was not safe. Shortly after, Sue was discharged from the hospital and sent home to her husband and children. The husband assured me that he was not cult involved, and would keep an eye on her.

Sue then started claiming that the satanists were entering her home at night. Drugging her family, they could do with her as they wished. Although a watch was put on the house, none of this was ever substantiated. She claimed they used acid to burn her, cut her. She claimed they put wine into her vagina and drank it. A major problem with her injuries was that it was possible they could have been self-inflicted.

I was at a dead end and could neither prove, nor disprove, any of her claims. I then talked to her doctor who stated that all she was saying seemed to him to be true. Her psychiatrist was so convinced, along with her nurses and psychologist of these truths, that they put the pressure on for some results. I performed every logical sequence to a normal investigation. However, scenes of supposed cult activity were void of any evidence.

On one occasion, we traveled to a site deep in the woods of a town in southern Ohio. We followed Sue's directions and didn't realize it was a site until we came within a few feet of it. The site was triangular shaped, formed with vine, and could hold approximately 20 people. It held a pit where there had been a fire and a freshly cut Christmas tree was by the entrance to the triangle, by the apex. There was also, what at first appeared to be a hitching post between two trees fastened to the tree with vine. The post was singed and moved freely up and down about a foot.

When I showed Sue the pictures of the site and asked about the hitching post, she explained that females were strapped to it, sexually penetrated, then their bodies licked with flame. The Christmas tree was for the purpose of desecration. Although there were no fir trees in the area, I just could not picture someone going to all this trouble of carrying the tree into the area, engraving ankhs and pentagrams on it and connecting all that vine, if what she said happened here, didn't. Something happened.

A second spot was checked where she claimed we would find a house with a corn field next to it, where many sacrifices took place. The floors would be soaked with human blood and the corn field would contain crushed bone and teeth. We went there on a Saturday and parked in front of the house, and took a quick look around. It appeared to be abandoned, but secure. Upon our return two days later, the house was gone. A neighbor stated that it had burned down on Saturday, and that it was bulldozed Sunday. We did a foot search of the cornfield looking for anything; a tooth or fragment of bone. We did find some bones which appeared to be too easy to locate. The bones were sent to the coroner's office, who in turn sent them to the Smithsonian. The Smithsonian later identified them as pig bones.

On and on it went. Every turn we took, we came to a dead end. During these so many months, Sue called me telling me how satanists were coming and getting her, taking her to ceremonies, killing the family pets and threatening to kill her and her children if she didn't stop talking. The husband could neither confirm, nor deny, her stories. He just didn't know. Every lead was followed, every name checked out, those that could be talked to, were. At times, I believed the validity of her claims, but then thinking how bizarre her stories were, and my inability to prove her claims, doubt reigned.

During the interim, I was having meetings with the hospital staff, giving them information and explaining what evidence was needed for prosecution. They in turn gave me material on multiple personality disorder (MPD) and Sue's progress. In my readings, I discovered that MPD was caused when a person goes through physical and psychological trauma in early childhood and splits the present personality he or she has and reverts to another personality that can cope with the pain of the abuse. The new personality may be of the opposite sex, younger, older, uneducated, or even speaking a foreign language. The number of personalities and types are only restricted to the person's mind. I've found MPD to be prevalent among over half of the ritual abuse survivors I've worked with.

When word got out of my investigations, I received 20 new cases, all giving me basically the same scenario. Again, all coming to a dead end. Every available investigative tool was used; polygraph, crime scene searches, crime lab, etc. Nothing, not a shred of evidence that pointed anywhere. All of the victims were giving me the same names and more places that sounded the same, or places of the same general description.

Sue's cooperation diminished with my inability to bring anyone to justice. During this time, the Rape Crisis Center counseled Sue. The chief case-worker took Sue's case because of the difficulty of the case. The case-worker told me she was getting harassing, chanting phone calls, and was being followed by a white male, even in the courthouse. Just as suddenly as that started, it stopped.

The stories kept coming in from Sue of sacrifices in the valley in the Peninsula Road area. There were stories of heads being in a fireplace, children being bred for sacrifice in Youngstown, their bodies burned, broken and scattered in the fields, streams and woods; women being beaten and sexually mistreated, then being filmed, and the films being sold for a profit. Every devious crime was conveyed to me.

Her recollection of how she was transported to some of the ceremonies and where they took place was very vague, because she said she was drugged at home, before leaving for the site. Sue was convinced that her days were numbered and the cult would eventually get her. It wasn't until I talked to her for long durations of time, did I convince her that she was safe if she kept helping me expose them. Satanists apparently had instilled the fear of death in her so severely that to get her active in talking with me took more and more effort on my part.

Sue was readmitted to the hospital because she claimed to have been ritualistically abused, cut, bruised, and burned. The doctors once again felt she was not doing it to herself unless it was a personality she had within her they were not familiar with, or had not discovered.

When I would ask her how these people were getting in, she said they would call on the phone and trigger her by some means which would bring a cult-loyal, alter personality forward. That personality would open the door for them, and once inside they would do what they wanted with her. They would come while her husband was at work, it just always worked out that no one saw anything but Sue. All along she kept stating they would kill her and make it look like a natural death.

It took a great deal of time to regain Sue's confidence. During this time, she moved to another neighborhood, thinking that this would keep the cult away. It didn't. She became less and less talkative, and seemed to fear me. Since she eventually stopped complaining about the cult bothering her and was getting along with her therapists, I moved on to other cases which gave me more probability of an arrest. You can't spin your wheels on a non-productive case, which her case had become.

I was hearing from other survivors that Sue was in danger. Therapists began to worry that she was not doing well. Therapists and doctors could not understand why I could not go out and arrest these people. I tried to explain that this type of investigation is difficult due to the nature of the underlying problem; not to mention dealing with someone who had MPD with little concrete information.

Sue did show us an actual site, and gave some good information. However, was she truly in danger? Would the cult be foolish enough to harm someone who was by now well known to the police? I did not think that they could pull it off, since we knew too much about her for them to try to take her life in any manner. In addition, she was writing a daily journal, and her husband was, supposedly, keeping a constant eye on her.

Time went on and it got to the point that I heard nothing from her, and less about her from other survivors and therapists. Her case seemed to fade into obscurity. New cases were taking more and more of my time. Then, the unexpected happened.

I had just gone to bed on February 4, 1991, when my daughter came in and said there was someone on the phone. It was Sue's therapist, who stated bluntly that Sue was dead. I was very shocked, and many thoughts went through my mind. How could this be? Did I miss these warnings she was giving me? Had I blown it off too easily? Could I have prevented her death? I laid silently thinking a thousand thoughts. All I kept thinking was what people that knew her had said, "They're going to kill her, and you'll never prove it." At this time, her children and her husband were in therapy and her husband always seemed cooperative on the phone, but could never seem to find the time to talk to me.

Let me state that the first thing drilled into your head is: ...you don't run into a crime scene, especially a homicide; you don't touch anything; you secure the scene and call the coroner. No police officer has the authority to declare death.

After talking to the therapist, I called the detective bureau desk man and asked if a call had come in from the coroner's office about a death at Sue's address. He stated that there hadn't been any call. I asked him to send a cruiser and let me know as soon as possible. Within an hour, he had called me back and said the coroner was on the scene with the husband, and the body was transported to a local hospital. Never in my career have I had a coroner's investigator move a body without at least having a police cruiser present. This meant that the death scene was completely destroyed, the husband cleaned the room and straightened everything up. Conflicting statements came from the husband. He stated to the coroner's investigator that he knew Sue was alive because he heard her walking around. Later he told a second investigator that he knew she was alive because he heard her snoring when he went by the bedroom. The therapist stated he told her he could tell she was alive because when he was outside getting into the car he could hear her. The therapist asked, "How could you hear her inside the house?" He said he saw the bathroom light on.

There was talk that the cult had injected her vaginal wall with a substance that would make her heart stop. This was not found in the autopsy, which was insisted on by me. The coroner's office stated that she died of natural causes. A white female, 39 years of age? It appeared as if the coroner's investigator was pushing for a quick solution.

It was explained to me by the coroner's office that Sue was on self-prescribed laxatives and Fleet enemas, and this had depleted her body of potassium causing an electrolyte imbalance, that in turn caused her heart to stop.

She wrote in her journal, "You sought help, all of us have favored you and granted your great need of my counsel, you invoked me, now you will serve me Lucifuge. Satanchia, Agaliarept, Fleortly, Sacragatana, Rebilious Bael Agares, Marbas, Barbatos, Buer Gusoyn Boyis and all other demons come join us, watch our Empower Lucifer have you [sic]. Come on Bathim, Pursan, Abigar, Loray Valefar, Foranu, Ayperos, Numerus, Glasya, Folas come now. You now have what you want. We already have Tamara, now we have your soul, your time has come. Don't fight it, you will enjoy it, Tamara."

This was her last journal entry. The writing is in the handwriting of Tamara, one of her alter personalities that was satanically involved. It seems as though she knew something was coming. All of her journals are in the hands of coroner's investigators who are frantically trying to make sense of this death and all its tangents. If she was using laxatives and enemas, her potassium and electrolyte levels would be low — they were not. A sample of the vitreous humor from her eye has been sent away, along with her blood, tissue and stomach contents. The vitreous humor shows that her potassium level was high, but she was not taking potassium supplements. It is still not known when this last entry was made in her journal.

The more this case is studied, the less things make sense. Why did her husband change his story so many times? Would a puncture wound into the uterus show? What chemical would stop the heart and leave no trace? These, and many more questions, come to mind. My commanders have been more than supportive of this and other investigations I've had. These are very difficult cases.

The coroner is convinced it is a natural death and is going to rule it as such. Other cult victims are convinced that Sue was murdered by the particular cult she belonged to. I'm not firmly convinced either way. In the state of Ohio, the coroner is the top law enforcement official, and his decision is final. So, it lies as stated: the coroner's office and myself are still looking at the journals, and the husband.

I would have felt a lot better if people wouldn't have told me it was going to happen, and for it to happen exactly as Sue stated.

Chapter 10

MORE HARASSMENT

SELF-INFLICTED INJURIES?

At one point in the previous chapter, Detective Kasarda talked of Sue being readmitted to the hospital, claiming she had again been ritualistically cut, bruised and burned by the cult. However, he also stated: "A major problem with her injuries was that it was possible they were self-inflicted."

Note: If a person is getting close to the cult memories, or starting to tell the secrets, some cult-loyal alter personalities are sometimes programmed to take over and somehow cut, burn, or do other things to the body that will unconsciously evoke the code-of-silence programming.

However, given a lot of the circumstances of the Akron case, it is quite possible the cult was indeed trying to intimidate Sue — as another cult was apparently trying to do with a woman in Texas recently.

"TRAITOR"

In Breaking the Circle of Satanic Ritual Abuse, I wrote about the courageous story of a family in Texas that took in cult survivor Gina (pseudonym), who was on the run from a cult in Oklahoma. And for the following year and a half Janice and Dick Lord kept Gina and her young daughter in their home, doing everything possible to help and keep them protected.

Note: As a result of this experience, Mrs. Lord, who is also a licensed social worker and national director of victims' services for Mothers Against Drunk Driving, started a non-profit Christian foundation called "Jireh." The organization is attempting to set up a national network of "transitional living care homes" for people breaking away from cults. (In 1993, Mrs. Lord received an award from the U.S. Department of Justice, presented by Janet Reno, for her work in the victim field.)

In January of 1993, several years after Gina had broken away from the cult, she reports being grabbed while walking to a friend's apartment complex by several Oklahoma satanic cult members. She said she was shoved in a van, blindfolded and driven to her daughter's elementary school.

"They did this to let me know they knew where my daughter was," said Gina. (Gina said she had been raised in a cult complex similar to the one in California. She had also been married to the cult's high priest.)

After going to the elementary school, Gina said she was stripped, and cult members used a small metal box with coals and a branding iron designed as an upside-down cross, to mark an area on her abdomen.

"While they were doing this they were saying things like: 'You're a traitor... You left your group... You deserve this...,'" said Gina. They then continued the torture by pushing two nails up into her vagina, she said.

Nicole Davis was an Arlington, Texas, police officer who had been involved with the case for three years. After the abduction incident, she talked with doctors who had worked on Gina, and was shown x-rays that showed where the nails had been imbedded. Davis said they had been inserted in the vagina so far up (into the cervix) that the doctor said definitively that it had to have been done by someone other than Gina, in his opinion.

This hadn't been the first alleged assault either. During an earlier one, Gina said she had also been branded on the abdomen with another upside-down broken cross (sometimes used to label a "traitor"). Likewise, letters and tape-recorded, alleged cult phone threats had been filed as evidence. In addition, a plastic bag with body parts was left in the Lords' mail box one day, as, they surmise, another cult threat. Davis said the body parts were sent to a lab, and determined to be animal parts.

BEING FOLLOWED?

In Breaking the Circle 2 (in progress), I write about a woman from northern California who has been speaking out in public about her own ritual abuse, and has been actively working to establish a Ritual Abuse Task Force in the school system she teaches in.

Since she has been speaking out, she believes satanists in the area are harassing her to keep her quiet.

She has kept a written record as the events have unfolded, and the following are some excerpts from her journaling: "...In April, prior to my presentation to the school district, I was receiving harassing phone calls with some frequency. I now believe they [the cult] were attempting to access one of my alter personalities."

Note: Cindy is in therapy, and in one session an alter personality revealed the messages seemed intended to "trigger" and manipulate her. And on another level, Cindy also believes the calls were being used merely to scare her into not talking.

Yesterday I went to the dentist for an appointment at 9:40 a.m. The only people who knew I had an appointment were my children, the dentist's office and a friend. (I suspect may telephones may be bugged.)

At approximately 10:45 I was leaving the dentist's office when I saw a woman sitting in the waiting room. She was approximately 5'5", age 35-42, salt and pepper [graying] short hair. I said hello, and realized she was the same woman who had been at my door [at home] previously, as a "Jehovah's Witness."

[Earlier, this woman and another "Jehovah's Witness" (they had claimed) had come to Cindy's house. At one point, Cindy reached out to take a book from one of the women with her left arm. Cindy began feeling a sharp sensation in the upper inside of that arm. Shortly after that, she began feeling drugged and nauseated.]

I realized this [that the woman in the dentist's office was the same person who had been at her door], then thought: "Boy, they've got [nerve]!" As I left the office, I proceeded to the stairwell. There was a younger woman sitting on about the third step down from the top of the stairs. She was approximately 20 years old, wearing a blue sun dress and shoulder-length hair. She was reading a small Bible. As I started down the stairs I said "Excuse me." I don't remember what happened next. I can't remember if she moved or stood up. As I went down the stairs... she would have been on my right side. At the base of the stairs I suddenly had the feeling I had been poked (again), a sharp sensation in the inside of my upper right arm. I had a sense that something was wrong.

I locked the truck and drove home. By the time I got home I was feeling nauseous, dizzy and shaky. I went outside, looked at my arm, and noticed a distinct hole in my arm...

I believe I had been drugged. My physical state was not good. I felt disorientated, dizzy, tired, unable to think clearly. I don't remember anything that happened.

Note: Sometimes people engaged in sadistic abuse and mind control, will drug subjects to make them more malleable for programming suggestions, and in this state, it is often easier to work with the internal alter personality system in general.

I returned to the dentist's office at approximately 3 p.m. The same woman was there. She was standing at the counter. She did not see me. I went into the office... I asked some specific questions. I was informed the woman was a Jehovah's Witness, and had "all of a sudden" shown up in the office to have her teeth cleaned. She had not called for an appointment prior to her showing up in the office. She also had not been in the dentist's office in approximately three years.

Questions: Why would this woman all of a sudden show up off the street to have her teeth cleaned? Is it just a coincidence that she is the same woman who happened to be at my door when I felt as if I had been drugged before? Is it possible she followed me to the dentist's office?

Individuals may choose to believe that I am paranoid. However, I don't believe I have ever been so clear. There is an evil in our midst. It may take serious turns, perhaps even my death, to cause people to see this ugly slime. But I will hold onto my truth. I am not crazy. Harassment is happening. The intent, I believe, is to frighten me into silence.

I will not be silenced. Good is more powerful than evil.

"I relate all this because survivors speaking out have to be aware of their [the cult's] tactics," said Cindy during a follow-up interview.

And, again, it's not just ritual abuse survivors that seem to be experiencing the harassment.

POISONED

It seems some therapists and ritual abuse survivors have been the target of highly covert, systematic poisoning. This phenomenon started to surface in late 1991 for Catherine Gould, a licensed clinical psychologist in Encino, California, specializing in the diagnosis and treatment of child and adult victims of ritual abuse. She has conducted training throughout the United States and Canada, and has authored a number of papers on the subject.

In late 1991, Gould had a therapist come to her for consultation on a ritual abuse case. During the consult, the therapist shared she was getting sick a lot of late: blurred vision, dry mouth, swollen lymph nodes, physical weakness, decreased coordination...

Oddly, every time she would get sick like this, her dog would also get sick.

The woman eventually went for help, and the medical tests clearly indicated she was suffering from organophosphate poisoning, said Gould. Gould is involved with a consultation/support group of some 30 therapists in the L.A. area working with ritual abuse survivors. And within a short period of time after the first poisoning diagnosis, two other therapists came up with the same symptoms, as did a vocal ritual abuse child advocate, and two adult ritual abuse survivors, said Gould. (The two adult survivors also obtained documented medical records showing the poison in their systems, said Gould.)

Gould explained this type of poisoning is insidious and slow. It gradually breaks down the immune system and causes any number of symptoms. Besides the ones mentioned earlier, some other symptoms include: chest pain pressure; labored breathing; feeling nervous, jumpy; generalized fatigue; confusion in thinking; vertigo or dizziness... Gould also said she has learned this type of poisoning is actually used in some chemical warfare strategies. It apparently accumulates in the body, slowly disrupting the immune system, similar, said Gould, to what some farm workers experience with repeated exposure to pesticides.

Los Angeles County has a Ritual Abuse Task Force that meets regularly. And at one meeting, Gould brought up the reports of the poisoning. Shortly after, she started to become a target for the poisoning as well. For a time, she said, there were break-ins to her office, where toxins had been sprayed all over. After the office locks were upgraded, the toxins were sprayed into her car through an air vent, she said.

This then apparently started happening with most of the 30 therapists in the L.A. ritual abuse consultation/support group. Many of them, said Gould, also started to come down with organophosphate poisoning symptoms.

Gould said she was initially surprised that after the poisoning tactic was made public, the cult, instead of backing off, had stepped up this form of harassment. She said she surmised it was the cult's intention to break up the therapist consultation group, and get the therapists to back off in general from working with ritual abuse survivors.

Note: The network of therapists had become quite cohesive, and they were doing some extremely advanced work that was being used as a model in other places.

However, only one therapist in the group backed off from working with ritual abuse survivors after the poisoning was talked about publicly. Gould said the group consulted with a number of people in various medical professions, and were able to come up with a natural herbal candle oil blend, that when burned, neutralized the toxins.

When Gould initially started talking about the poisoning, she was put under investigation by the Medical Board of California in conjunction with the California Board of Psychology. Undaunted, she continued to speak out. And what's more, she started calling around to other regions to see if this tactic was being used.

She contacted a colleague in Canada who said, amazingly, the same thing had been happening there. Gould said this person said there were at least seven therapists and survivors that were reporting similar symptoms.

Gould took it a step further, and drafted a survey questionnaire, that explained what had been happening in California, and included a list of organophosphate poisoning symptoms. She sent this initially to 70 therapists, survivors of ritual abuse, ritual abuse survivor advocates... most of whom Gould knew throughout the United States and Canada.

The initial results were astounding. Out of 62 responses, 45 believed they actually were suffering from organophosphate poisoning, and 40 had already gone for various forms of treatment for the pesticide poisoning.

Note: It's interesting to note, the same harassment strategy is apparently being employed in all these regions, lending more credence to the supposition of the widespread cult networking of strategies.

Also, 47 survey respondents said they had experienced other types of harassment which some attribute primarily to their work with ritual abuse survivors: telephone harassment; being followed, stalked; death or other threats; break-ins and/or theft...

Gould was asked if she thought about backing off from her ritual abuse work when it started becoming apparent what was happening with the poisoning.

"When I found out they were poisoning me, I became enraged," said Gould, who also said she had no intention of backing down. "The violation of me made me absolutely determined to fight back."

Gould said this also gave her even more empathy for the overall plight of the ritual abuse survivors who have had to deal with this type of highly covert manipulation their whole life. And in no way was she going to back off from trying to help them.

Gould, like Cindy in the last section, hopes the information that is surfacing about the poisoning will help alert others about the threat.

RITUAL ABUSE TASK FORCE

In 1988 therapist Myra Riddell spearheaded a movement to establish a Ritual Abuse Task Force in the L.A. area under the umbrella of the Los Angeles County Commission for Women. The task force was established primarily to research and disseminate information about cult ritual abuse.

The task force has also developed ritual abuse education and training programs for mental health workers, teachers, attorneys and law enforcement officials. The membership includes ritual abuse survivors, therapists, attorneys, police officers, teachers, clergy, parents of survivors...

At the beginning of the chapter, I mentioned Attorney General Janet Reno giving an award to Janice Lord for her work with victims in general. According to the nationwide ritual abuse awareness newsletter SURVIVORSHIP:

> Janet Reno's district attorney's office in Florida successfully prosecuted one of the first cases involving ritual abuse allegations. Her current special assistant, John Hogan, was the successful prosecutor in the case, which is described in detail in the book Unspeakable Acts. In order to give the Attorney General information to pursue the problem at a national level, survivors of ritual abuse and their advocates are sending letters describing their experiences to Mr. Hogan and to Tom Birch, Director of National Child Abuse Coalition. Send letters to Tom Birch, Director, National Child Abuse Coalition, 733 15th Street NW, Suite 938, Washington, D.C. 20005, and John Hogan, Assistant to the Attorney General, Department of Justice, 10th Street and Constitution Avenue, NW, Washington, D.C. 20530.

MORE EVIDENCE

MICHIGAN CASE

Macomb County, Michigan, prosecuting attorney Carl Marlinga called it the worst murder he'd ever seen. And, as the Matamoros cult members had been characterized, one of the Michigan murderers was characterized as "thoroughly evil." What's more, the case was punctuated by all types of occult references...

Stephanie Dubay, 15, met Augustan ("Augi") Pena, 16, at a party one night in July of 1990. Dubay was a runaway, and Pena talked her into moving into his home with his mother and 19-year-old cousin Jamie Rodriguez. (Some of the runaways in the missing children statistics are lured by people in the occult. Some are never found again. Or, as you are about to see, some are found — dead.)

On the exterior, the home looked like one of any number of homes in the quiet, middle-class suburb of Warren, Michigan. However, there were problems. Marlinga said Augi's mother would be gone weeks at a time, sometimes turning tricks as a prostitute. When she was home, she would also sleep with the 19-year-old Rodriguez, "...in exchange for rent," said Marlinga. The mother was gone this particular time. And Stephanie had been in the home a week and a half, when one morning, said Marlinga, Rodriguez and Augi apparently decided to kill Stephanie.

Marlinga said there had been reports Rodriguez had told Augi he'd killed a person before "...as part of a devil worship sacrifice." This allegedly took place in the woods in the northern part of Michigan's Lower Peninsula, said Marlinga. (Although this was never proved.)

Part of Marlinga's argument was that Augi had become fascinated with Rodriguez's talk of satanism and black magic, which would precipitate what happened next.

What the prosecutor presented to the jury was that Augi and Rodriguez laid newspaper down all over the floor and set a stool in the middle. They woke Stephanie and sat her on the stool. Marlinga said Rodriguez then put his hands on the young girl's shoulders and told her to think of something pleasant ...like a scene out in the woods. Just then, Marlinga argued, Augi stepped up and stabbed Stephanie in the back. She let out a scream and flew up into Rodriguez's arms. Marlinga said Augi allegedly stabbed her ten more times.

They then reportedly dismembered her, cut off her head and skinned the skull. Augi cut off one of her fingers to keep as a "charm," said Marlinga. The eyes were left in the skull, and it was placed in the freezer. The rest of the body parts were put in a plastic bag.

(Marlinga pointed out the defense argued that Rodriguez had killed Stephanie by himself, and Augi came across the murder after the fact.)

Later that day, a friend of Rodriguez's named Valerie, came by to cut his hair. Investigators were later to find Valerie practiced "white witchcraft," and Rodriguez claimed to have saved the skull to give to Valerie for her own occultic use. Rodriguez took Valerie to the freezer and showed her the skull. (She would later testify she recognized it was Stephanie because of Stephanie's bright blue eyes, said Marlinga.)

Later, when Rodriguez wasn't looking, Valerie took the skull and dashed out of the house to the Warren police department.

Marlinga said when the home was searched, investigators found all types of satanic and other occult paraphernalia including pentagrams, books on witchcraft, ritual knives, satanic altar accessories...

On the stand, Marlinga said Valerie testified Rodriguez was into a lot of black magic and she said he had power to control people. She also testified, at times his personality would shift dramatically, becoming very dark, very scary. She testified the color of his eyes would even seem to change in this state.

Marlinga said Valerie testified that she was convinced Rodriguez probably performed some dark-side rituals leading up to the murder. But Rodriguez left any mention of the occult out of his statement, he surmised, because he wanted to keep this area as secret as possible.

The defense claimed because of his fascination and involvement in the occult, Rodriguez was actually insane. And while Marlinga acknowledged Rodriguez had, indeed, been caught up in the occult, he was far from insane. As in other cases, Marlinga said he downplayed the occult aspects of the crime so the jury wouldn't buy into the insanity strategy.

"Sometimes this type of thing happens, not because someone is insane, but rather, because they are evil," said Marlinga.

Circuit Judge Frederick K. Balkwell apparently agreed. In his closing comments in the Rodriguez trial, Balkwell said: "Your monstrous murder of a young and innocent child will leave lasting scars... Even the court has been shocked by the depth and depravity of [this] evil, horrible crime."

Rodriguez was found guilty and was sentenced to life imprisonment. Augi was tried as an adult and also received life imprisonment.

POSSESSION?

In the case in Michigan, a witness testified Rodriguez's eyes would actually change dramatically. The young girls in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, told police they were petrified of their father because they thought he had "super-human" power.

I was called in to consult on a case in Dallas, Texas. Newspapers reported 29-year-old Myra Obasi's eyes were literally gouged out, possibly by her sisters, because they believed she was possessed by demonic spirits. Newspaper accounts also indicated the sisters might have panicked when seeing, whatever it was, manifest in Myra's eyes that day.

One of the consistent behavior "oddities" for some children exposed to ritual abuse, is they will often gouge at eyes in magazine pictures, and so on, with scissors, knives... What have they perhaps seen in their perpetrators' eyes? Are they frantically trying to tell us something they don't know how to, or can't, verbalize?

Note: One of the reported components in satanic ceremonies is cult members will call on demons to enter them for more wisdom, more power. Authors M. Scott Peck, M.D., Malachi Martin, and many others, believe the phenomenon of demonic possession.

All this does certainly beg the question(s): How much of the cult workings, if any, are demonically driven? And if demons are involved, does this mean there is heightened intelligence that would add to the sophistication?

Note: Based on my research, I personally believe it's a key component.

ESTABLISHING A TASK FORCE

In the summer of 1994, Patricia Thomley spearheaded the formation of a multi-disciplinary task force in Michigan to lobby for legislation against ritual abuse. Thomley assembled a team of professionals that included therapists, researchers, doctors, law enforcement officers, pastors, attorneys, members of advocacy groups and parents of ritual abuse survivors. "You want to find people willing to roll up their sleeves and do the work," said Thomley. The team then prepared a formal package for legislators that included a definition of ritual abuse, statistics and educational material.

"They [legislators] need to be shown what's going on in their state," said Thomley.

Besides the Stephanie Dubay case, the task force cites a Niles, Michigan case, for instance, where 172 children from the Small World Preschool came forward claiming sexual and ritual abuse. Small World co-owner Allan Barkman was convicted on one of the charges and was sentenced to 50 years in prison, said Thomley.

NATIONWIDE

On a 1994-95 investigative swing through the South, Midwest and East Coast, I came across story after story of satanic activity:

OKLAHOMA

Former satanist Shawn Sellars was sentenced to death row just up the road from the site of another gruesome, apparently occult-driven incident. At Lake Eufaula in McAlester, Oklahoma, the bodies of Lisa Gregston, 17, and James Caldwell, 22, were found naked, surrounded by a circle of candles. Gregston had several pieces of pentagram jewelry and a pentagram tatoo.

According to a September 3, 1994, Associated Press article, family and friends said the two were involved in the occult. Authorities ruled it an apparent double suicide.

Pittsburgh County Sheriff Don Hass said apparently Gregston lay down and placed the butt of a semi-automatic rifle against the tire of their vehicle, with the barrel against her temple. He said Caldwell then lay on top of her and put the left side of his head against hers. According to the article, Gregston then pulled the trigger and the bullet went through her head into Caldwell's, killing both.

A life offering to satan? Perhaps. Some cult defectors who were being made an example of, like the ones in California? Maybe. Whatever the case, the occult aspects in this incident were hard for authorities to overlook.

SOUTH CAROLINA

In South Carolina, a police chief was called into a neighboring county to assist in exploring a purported satanic ritual site in some backwoods. Among the reports, said the chief, cult members were believed to have guarded the periphery of the site with semi-automatic weapons.

A police raid was staged late one night. No cult members were spotted. However, the chief said they did find an abandoned building spray-painted with a pentagram on the floor, candle drippings and upside-down crosses.

Based on reports he's been exposed to over the years, this police chief said he's convinced satanic ritual activity exists, and is quite dangerous.

I also interviewed Detective Lewis Marshall who has investigated reports of criminal satanic activity throughout Columbia, South Carolina. He had recently been called to an abandoned church in some backwoods. He also found a pentagram painted on the floor. A human hip bone, and a rib bone were found within the pentagram. Nearby, he said he found a grave that had recently been dug up.

Note: To some in the occult, the points of the pentagram star are considered "power cones." Rituals will be done to attempt to channel demons, or the "spirit" of the deceased into the pentagram, where they will be trapped in the power cones and, supposedly, forced to transfer power to the ones performing the rituals.

While in Columbia, I also interviewed a radio personality who explained he had been approached about joining a satanic cult in 1976. He said a neighbor invited him over and took him to a back room that was painted completely black. He was then invited to a satanic cult meeting. He said the cult member told him he would have to be willing to be naked during the ceremonies, and he would also have to curse God. He declined.

MARYLAND

Arlie and Roxie Watson, at Salisbury Counseling Center in Salisbury, Maryland, counsel ritual abuse survivors from all parts of the country. They also train therapists from around the world. And they said the stories emerging about the rituals, the torture, the mind control... are so similar it's scary.

The survivor reports took on a decidedly more real dimension for the Watsons in 1989. During a counseling session, one of their SRA survivors drew a series of pictures of some of the paraphernalia used during the rituals she'd been exposed to. This included a torture rack, a base for a ritual altar, and some other items.

About eight weeks after the drawings had been done, friends of the Watsons bought an old farm house in Wicomico County, Maryland.

While going through the house, they found a small metal casket-like box with air holes, a torture rack (just like the survivor had drawn, and similar to the one Detective Kasarda had found in the backwoods of southern Ohio), and a set of wooden legs that also looked exactly the same as the satanic altar legs the survivor had drawn.

What's more, upon further exploration, a hollowed out rectangle was found hidden below some insulation in the attic floor. It was covered with a hinged trap door. The small, metal casket-like box fit perfectly.

"Satanic baptisms" are sometimes staged during the ceremonies. A child, for instance, will be put in a coffin, buried with an air tube, then brought back — and told he or she is now the son or daughter of satan. If the ceremony is being held in an attic, a burial in the rafters would serve the same purpose.

Note: On September 18, 1992, Illinois Governor Jim Edgar signed Public Act #87-1167, allowing for the definition, investigation and prosecution of ritual crimes against children. Item 6 of this bill states a person is guilty of ritualized abuse when they "place a living child into a coffin or open grave containing a human corpse or remains."

Awhile after finding these items, another ritual abuse survivor told the Watsons of an isolated cemetery in Pittsville, Maryland, where she said she had been exposed to a number of rituals. The Watsons went to the site. Nothing. Neatly cut grass, graves, intact grave stones.

They went back a week later. Six graves had been dug up. Fresh, overturned dirt marked the rectangular spots. Summer Solstice, a satanic high holy day, had fallen in between the seven days, said Arlie. The Watsons even rented a plane to take some aerial shots of the fresh diggings, to contrast them with the pictures of the intact cemetery they had found the week before.

Note: Ritual crime investigator Dale Griffis said cemeteries are consecrated ground, so satanists will do all types of things to defile the sites. Also, besides the satanic baptisms, the use of body parts is also necessary for some of the rituals.

The Watsons said they have decided to become proactive with the information and designed a slide show for local police, prayer groups, and anyone else who will listen.

"The initial reaction from the police was shock," said Arlie. "That is, that this activity was going on in this county right under their noses."

MASSACHUSETTS

The Northeast Ritual Crime Intelligence Association was formed on January 13, 1995. Headquartered in Boston, the organization is made up of law enforcement officers, and others throughout the northeastern states, for the purpose of accumulation, evaluation and dissemination of intelligence around ritual criminal activity. The association was designed to help victims of ritual crime; provide assistance to law enforcement and social service agencies; offer trainings...

TEXAS

A 17-year-old girl disappeared on a rainy night in 1992 in the small town of Gilmer, Texas (population 4,500). Eventually, eight people were charged with killing the girl as part of a satanic ritual. Her body was never found.

Two adults had come forward saying they had witnessed the murder as part of a cult ceremony, then recanted. (There were also multiple allegations of a group of Gilmer neighbors perpetrating sexual and ritual abuse on children.) The indictments were eventually dismissed, however, after the Texas attorney general's office took over the case.

Some citizens were outraged with the dismissal and formed a "Justice for Kelly Wilson" committee. In not letting the issue rest, they started their own investigation, putting together "fact sheets," news releases, and so on. They approached legislators, the news media, friends, neighbors...

On Sunday afternoon, August 21, 1994, they drew some 300 people, and all kinds of media, to the Gilmer courthouse lawn for a rally that included talks by advocates, authors, a therapist who works with SRA survivors... The rally received so much attention, the organizers began talking of planning a State House rally in Austin.

CANADA

Meanwhile, a similar neighborhood saga was unfolding in Prescott, Ontario (population 4,200). However here, nothing was dismissed. A team of police, social workers and prosecutors uncovered a child sexual/ritual abuse ring. And of the 52 people that have gone to trial at the time of this writing, 90 percent have been convicted.

The story started to unfold with three children's disclosures in 1989. And by the close of 1993, 225 alleged victims had come forward.

Among some of the stories of sexual and ritual abuse, according to an April 3, 1995, Winnipeg Free Press article:

> The children claimed they had been abused during monster games in the basement that featured adult relatives dressed in sheets and masks. They said they were raped, cut with knives, forced to drink blood and mud, and locked in a dungeon with a trap door.

Journalist Judy Steed wrote the book Our Little Secret based on this case. An excerpt reads:

> Linked by kinship and friendship ties, Prescott's perpetrators abused their own children, their neighbours' children and their grandchildren in a multi-generational network that was staggering in its reach and its routine violation of hundreds of victims. Some were terrorized in nightmarish ways that can only be termed ritual abuse.

As an example, Steed explains one perpetrator dug up graveyard bodies, pulling the heads off skeletons and engaging in basement rites where adults dressed in different costumes, terrorized and sexually and ritually abused children. Some of the abuse was video taped.

Steed interviewed Pam Gummer, the child abuse project coordinator with Family and Children's Services. Gummer said: "This is not a unique situation in terms of abuse. Prescott is unique in terms of outcome."

The Jericho team, a joint police-social worker team, was organized to investigate. At one point, there were four police officers, eight social workers and a team of child-care workers involved with the case. With that extensive a team, ample time to investigate, and a highly creative series of interventions, a thorough mosaic of the extent of the abuse surfaced.

Police, for instance, often met with child victims several times, taking time to gain their trust. They played floor hockey with the children, discussed super heroes, and shunned their uniforms and guns for less intimidating street clothes, according to the Winnipeg Free Press article.

Also, closed-circuit TV testimony was allowed for the children so they wouldn't have to face the suspects for whom they often have a mixture of fear, love and dread.

Among some of the testimony that emerged: masses of animal bones were found in shallow graves on one alleged perpetrator's property. The children talked of having to drink animal blood, and, at one point, said they witnessed a baby being murdered. Steed wrote that police speculated one of the convicted female perpetrators may have been a cult breeder, but the defense lawyer didn't pursue this. (The body of the alleged baby victim has yet to be found.) The children also talked of being put in a hole below a house for extended periods. Police found a trap door under the floor of one of the houses, with a six-foot-deep hole beneath it, littered with scraps of food.

One perpetrator was found guilty of sexually assaulting 13 Prescott children, ranging from a 12-month-old baby girl, to a two-year-old boy, to teenagers. A nine-year-old girl testified, for instance, this man, and a woman, tied her hands behind her back, taped her mouth and repeatedly raped her.

Steed interviewed the foster mother who took this young victim in. She said the girl was extremely polite and acquiescent; however: "without a self, underneath, there was nobody there," she said. "It was as if we looked inside her soul and nothing was alive."

According to the book, several years after being in quality therapy, in a loving home environment, and so on, this young girl was able to have friends with girls her own age for the first time, has developed some confidence, and is learning what it's like to simply be a young girl.

MORE UNITED STATES CASES

Two teenage babysitters at the First Presbyterian Church in Mansfield, Ohio, were convicted of sexually abusing children while the victims' parents attended church services. Lawrence Rohde, 19, was convicted in 1992 on seven counts of gross sexual imposition and sentenced to 14 years in prison. Scott Butner, 17, pled guilty to five counts of rape and received a five-to ten-year prison sentence.

According to a November 29, 1992, Cleveland Plain Dealer newspaper story, as many as 50 children described being sexually abused and taken from the church to wooded areas where they were forced to participate in child pornography, infanticide and mutilation of corpses. Victims' parents demanded that charges be filed against adult church members who allegedly were involved, but only Rohde and Butner were indicted.

Ed Gallup Sr., Mary Lou Gallup and their son, Ed "Chip" Gallup Jr., who together ran three Gallup Christian Day-Care Centers in Roseburg, Oregon, were accused by over a hundred children of sexual molestation and ritual abuse. Children described animal killings, pornography, and sexual abuse performed by adults wearing robes.

Ed Gallup Jr. was convicted on three charges of child sexual abuse involving two children. Ed Gallup Sr., a Nazarene minister, was convicted on the testimony of a five-year-old girl. In November 1989 Mary Lou Gallup's conviction was reversed because of a discovery violation. Ed Gallup Sr. and Ed Gallup Jr. are serving life sentences.

Meanwhile in Santa Rosa, California, Darryl Ball and Charlotte Thriaikill plea bargained on molestation charges and were sentenced to substantial prison terms. The prosecutor's opening statement referred to the ritual aspect of the crimes, and child victims described satanic ceremonies which included ritual murders.

Note: The last three items were taken from the summer, 1994 Believe The Children newsletter article: "A Decade of Disclosures: Ritual Child Abuse in the United States." Based in Chicago, Believe The Children is a grassroots non-profit organization founded in 1986 by parents of children victimized in extra-familial, multi-victim, multi-perpetrator settings. They represent parents and professionals throughout the world addressing the sexual and ritual exploitation of children.

MORE BURNING

Cleveland radio broadcaster Pastor Ernie Sanders said a satanic ritual abuse survivor told him of being tortured in the basement of a church in mid-Ohio several decades ago as part of ongoing cult ceremonies. She said the ceremonies were done at night under the light of torches positioned in the wall. Sanders drove to the site with the survivor. A new pastor had just taken over, and gave them access to the basement. Tearing down some relatively new paneling, Sanders said they found three holes cemented in, with char marks above the holes.

Several years ago, Sanders said he was informed about an abandoned barn in Parkman, Ohio that appeared to be a ritual site. Upon investigation, Sanders said the barn loft displayed an inverted pentagram, black candles, a goat's head, blood sprinkled about... Sanders said he left a message for the sheriff on an answering machine at the department.

The barn burned down at 1:00 a.m. that morning.

NATIONAL RITUAL ABUSE AWARENESS COALITION

In March 1996, the National Ritual Abuse Awareness Coalition formed to join the ritual abuse field in a unified voice. The coalition will be made up of representatives of groups in the areas of ritual crime, survivor collectives, task forces, therapist collectives, cult research...

The coalition will serve as a hub to funnel the latest in survivor support/recovery developments, new therapeutic protocol and innovative ritual crime investigation techniques. It is developing a newsletter, a speakers bureau and a lobbying voice.

INDIANA

A woman in mid-Indiana discovered a barn just beyond her property line saturated with evidence of satanic activity. She said there was a rope hanging from the rafters with blood on it, candles, pentagrams, 666's, a graphic that said: Devil's Den. The woman said the artwork looked professionally done.

The woman has young children, and decided to contact a police officer on a local S.W.A.T. team. He checked out the barn. She said he surmised it probably hadn't been used in a year. He also said police had been uncovering similar sites around the area. But, he said, once one is found, the cult moves to another.

In 1992, Christopher Kamil, 23, pled guilty to four child molestation counts in Kokomo, Indiana. He was accused of using occultic beliefs to lure youngsters to his home. He was sentenced to 18 years in prison.

On March 3, 1994, Liberty Baptist Church in Tipton County, Indiana burned to the ground. Satanic graffiti was spray-painted over one of the brick walls left standing. Eight churches burned in Indiana in 1994. (Again, satanic agenda includes desecrating things affiliated with Christianity.)

C.A.R.E., Inc., a nationwide non-profit Christian advocacy group, was started in Kokomo, Indiana in 1993. It has a network of contacts and resources in some 20 states to help SRA survivors.

C.A.R.E. also provides safe-housing for survivors on ritual nights in two states and provides information for others interested in setting up safe-housing nights. It has sponsored state-wide community open forums in the Midwest on the reality of SRA, and has also developed a multi-dimensional training for churches wanting to provide "C.A.R.E." teams to help ritual abuse survivors with the healing process. (Their recently released book Care-Giving: The Cornerstone of Healing details this model.)

Besides the work C.A.R.E. has done in the United States, they have also branched out internationally. At the time of this writing, they had taken on the plight of a woman trying to find a safe haven and recovery from her satanic ritual abuse in England.

MORE FROM AROUND THE WORLD

Actually, in England they are starting to see ritual abuse as a serious problem as well. A comprehensive book titled Treating Survivors of Satanist Abuse was released in London in 1994. Some 38 contributors from the areas of psychology, mental health management, media, victims and advocates write extensively about the emerging phenomenon of satanic ritual abuse in that country.

According to author/editor Valerie Sinason, a child psychotherapist and honorary lecturer at University College London, the aim of the book is "...to change the international climate of intellectual opinion by offering a thoughtful reflection on unbearable events."

According to a newspaper article out of Australia:

SYDNEY — Children are being subjected to ritualistic torture by satanists, sometimes in churches and child care centers, according to an official government report.

The New South Wales Sexual Assault Committee said it had heard evidence of children being beaten, cut, locked in cages or cupboards, given electric shocks, submerged in water or deprived of food and sleep.

Sometimes they were subjected to psychological abuse involving mind control techniques...

Data from this survey was published in Australia's Medical Observer magazine. And the newspaper article went on to say:

Although the ritualistic abuse it describes has often been reported with skepticism in Australia... the committee is the first to acknowledge it as a genuine and serious problem.

According to a March 8, 1996, EP News Service report: "A [Palermo] Sicilian prosecutor has asked that five men — including a Catholic priest — be tried for allegedly holding orgies and satanic rituals in a monastery. Mario Amato said the men are suspected of violating various laws, including obscenity and desecration of tombs. The Italian news reports say the group practiced black masses inside a church."

Also, I just interviewed a therapist from Johannesburg, South Africa. (She requested anonymity for safety reasons.) The therapist said she has worked with eight ritual abuse survivors since 1989, and the ritual abuse stories, survivor symptoms, and so on, correlate with some of the other ritual abuse cases she's heard reported in other parts of the world. She said she has also been to SRA recovery trainings in the United States, Germany, and the Netherlands.

"THE CHOSEN"

This chapter is based on a series of interviews with a woman who reports being an extremely "connected" satanic cult member. She recently broke away, and provides more information about the inner workings and networking of the more sophisticated satanic cults.

Dominique D., 40, reports being the oldest child of a satanic high priest in South Carolina. By virtue of the birth order, she was indoctrinated as "the chosen" in this particular trans-generational cult. She reports being involved in countless cult ceremonies, and because of her status, was also privy to a lot of inside information.

In addition, she reports one of her uncles is a satanic high priest for a cult in North Carolina. And what's more, she said the uncle would sometimes take her along on "training" trips all over the United States and Canada — where he would typically address anywhere from 15 to 20 cult high priests/priestesses at a time.

Dominique said the training topics included such things as generating money for the cult through pornography; breeding babies for sacrifice, and for sale; kidnapping and recruitment techniques; torture and programming techniques; prostitution; money laundering... (Dominique is in hiding in another state. The names of members from her cult have been given to several law enforcement representatives.)

SNUFF FILMS

Dominique said the satanic cults she was exposed to were into a lot of areas of pornography. They generated material for child pornography, for the sado-masochistic market, the most extreme level of the latter being "snuff" films. (These are films where a victim is actually being killed on-screen.)

Dominique said she was involved with the making of three snuff films, one in which she was designated to do the killing. She had been eight years old at the time. She recounted parts of that.

She said she was first put through a series of cleansing rituals, with douches and enemas. She was then marked with an upside-down satanic cross lightly cut into the skin in the groin area. Also, prior to the ritual, she said she was given something to drink that was drugged.

At this point, she said a lot of cult member chanting started up, and she was programmed to respond to everything the cult members would tell her. Which, one of the cult members told her, was also "...everything satan wanted her to do" as well. At this point, they also reinforced the satanic belief "pain is pleasurable," said Dominique.

She was dressed in a white dress with imprinted satanic symbols. The white was to symbolize purity, and that you were technically married to satan.

The victim in this ceremony was a three-year-old boy. Dominique said part of the photographer's purpose in a snuff film is to capture the expressions on the victim's face, and young children, as opposed to babies, are generally used because of this.

Dominique said the child to be sacrificed that day was somewhat drugged. That was so the child wouldn't struggle as much. But he wasn't too drugged, in order not to totally blunt the emotional expression at the time of the killing.

The child was laid naked on a satanic altar. Then Dominique was instructed to mark the child with a "holy knife." Light trace marks of upside-down crosses were made in three areas. They were made on each side of the groin area, and on the forehead an inch from the hairline. (While this was going on, cult members were beginning to chant to satan in the background.)

Then Dominique was led to a nearby fire where she and a high priest mutually gripped the knife handle, holding the blade over the flame. They reaffirmed all this was being done for satan, their ruler...

Dominique was then led back, the chanting growing louder. The camera zoomed in on her facial expression, the knife poised above the child. "I am focused now. There is marked determination on my face. And I'm smiling. I believe it is for a better good. I believe it is right." (Bad has become good. Real bad has become good.)

The camera moved to the young child's face. There's terror now. Eyes darting about for help (as Evandro's probably had). None came.

The knife plunged into the young child's chest.

The final scene showed the heart being taken out of the child.

Blood was then drained from the heart into a "holy chalice," and passed around, said Dominique. Likewise, the heart was cut into pieces and eaten. (Satanism is, again, the antithesis of Christianity. And this type of thing is sometimes their version of "communion.")

Dominique then related the child sacrifice that night — had been her brother. He had been "bred" specifically for sacrifice. At this point in the interview, Dominique broke down sobbing.

Copies of the films, said Dominique, would be sold to other satanic covens, and used, for instance, to show to children as part of the code-of-silence programming. That is, if they ever talked, they too, would end up like the child on the screen. The films, said Dominique, were also sold to pornographers in the United States, and internationally.

One of the cult connections, said Dominique, was with an art gallery owner in New York City. Dominique said the gallery owner's distribution sources included Mafia contacts, underground sado-masochistic groups, and so on.

PORNOGRAPHIC INDOCTRINATION

Dominique said sexual indoctrination and use in pornographic material often starts at an extremely early age. Infants, for instance, are photographed with objects in their orifices for pedophile magazines, and the like. Children and teens are forced to perform all types of sexual acts for the camera, said Dominique, including things like having sex with animals (these are both cult member children and those who have been kidnapped).

Dominique said she was flown to the Baja, in Mexico, for some of the pornographic "shoots." These, she said, would often include a heavy emphasis on sado-masochistic themes: restraints were used, beatings with "cat-of-nine tails," films showing actual controlled rapes...

PROSTITUTION

Another lucrative area for the cult is prostitution, said Dominique. And that, too, starts at an extremely early age.

As early as four years old, a child begins to be trained, she said. They are, for instance, given drug injections to induce heightened suggestibility. Then they are taught how to perform sexual acts, such as oral sex. And they are also taught through demonstration all the possible sexual things that can be done to them — including some pretty violent abuse. However, part of the desensitization process is to keep encoding the concept "pain is pleasure," so they can psychologically, and physically, endure.

Once the child was ready, said Dominique, they would be, for instance, taken to the homes of people in the community who had contracted with the cult for sexual services. (Some of the children from the day-care settings consistently reported being taken off-site for the same thing.) Dominique said the children would be taken to individual pedophiles, couples, and so on. Sometimes children would be taken along with these people on vacations. Over time, the child would progressively be exposed to more and more pedophiles.

In addition, said Dominique, the cult would also arrange parties where the children, and teens, would be used sexually. These parties would sometimes include people the cult was trying to influence, whether law enforcement officials, judges, state representatives.

Also, teen and adult prostitutes would have quotas on how much money they needed to generate a week on the "outside." Dominique said in her particular cult, this would range anywhere from $250 to $400 a week.

BREEDERS

Another report that comes up consistently among cult survivors is the existence of "breeders" within the cults. That is, women who are designated to have babies for the cult. Some, said Dominique, are used for sacrifice, while others are clandestinely sold to families wanting children. And some are bred specifically to carry on the trans-generational cult bloodline.

The babies born of breeders in her cult, said Dominique, were never born in a hospital — so there was no birth record. Also, she said, her cult had a doctor who took care of those who were pregnant.

RECRUITMENT

Dominique said she, and others, were used as recruiters. They were taken to other communities to get to know "latchkey kids." These were youths from dysfunctional families who were having difficulty at home, in school. Some were rebellious, or loners, and so on.

Dominique said her job was to target such youth and befriend them. Eventually, they would be told about this "group" they could go to where they could experience unlimited power, unlimited sex.

A young child, Dominique said, might be lured with the promise of getting a pet, or another type of gift. They would be taken immediately. Some teens would also be transported immediately back by the cult, while others, said Dominique, would be given money for a bus ticket and told someone would be there to pick them up at the community where the cult was.

When they arrived, they'd be taken to rural settings where cult members had homes. There they would be prepared for sacrifice, or forced indoctrination procedures would be initiated.

DISPOSAL OF BODIES

Dominique said there were a number of ways the sacrificial victims' bodies were disposed of. She said this was taken very seriously, and was the responsibility of the "upper members" in the cult.

First, she said the heart would be removed, then the blood drained. (Both essential to some ceremonies.) Then the victim's body was often dismembered. Sometimes the body would then be put into a pit of fire, if the ceremony was being conducted outside. (There are also reports small, portable crematoriums are used.)

Minneapolis Sgt. Jon HinchCliff said another disposal method he's heard of is mixing victims' bones with farm animal feed.

Dominique said cult members also filled the bottoms of large metal drums with body parts and concrete, and hid them on rural property owned by members. In other instances, Dominique said her uncle would sometimes take the remains out to sea in his boat.

Yet, another way to destroy a body is with a strong acid solution.

HORROR IN THE NETHERLANDS

According to a series of May 1993 The Press Association Limited stories, Zurich computer businessman Rene Osterwalder and his law student girlfriend Augusta Schoenenberger were charged with torture and sexual abuse of a six-month-old girl and a two-year-old girl, among perhaps others, for child porn films. An extradition request said the torture of infants included "...application of electric shocks, induction of suffocation by lengthy immersions in a bathtub and covering with plastic bags." It also said the children were bound, smeared with feces, and needles were applied to the genital areas. Authorities also accused the couple of driving through the Dutch countryside in search of victims. It was reported they had in their car a large ventilated suitcase, handcuffs and a gag.

According to a January 27, 1993, Associated Newspaper Limited story, police found a torture chamber and two barrels of acid, one containing dissolved flesh, at the couple's holiday chalet near Saint Ursanne, northwest Switzerland. "Osterwalder's flat was in a building known locally as the 'Satanic Church,' which specialized in depraved live sex and orgies..." said the article.

SERIAL CULT KILLINGS

A cult survivor now living in New Mexico, said her father was involved in both satanism and random serial killing of women. "Rose" said her father would abduct and kill women from states in the Northwest and bring them home where he and other cult members would cannibalize the flesh. She said her mother would actually cook the flesh, and sausages would be made from some of the body parts. What's more, Rose said her father actually demonstrated a craving for blood. (Confessed satanic killer Shawn Sellars said he acquired a craving for blood. And he would actually carry around a vial with his blood as a "fix.")

Besides flesh and other body parts, Rose said her father would keep many of the skulls of his victims. (Satanists also believe the power of the intellect is supreme, and since the skull is the container for the brain, it is held in reverence. That's one of the reasons it is used as such a consistent symbol by cult groups. And may have been the reason, for instance, that the cult in Norwalk, Ohio, had broken into the cemetery to steal the skulls.)

After the various human parts were used, Rose said her father would then take the remains and place them in a box with other garbage. He would then take the boxes to the city incinerator. "He used to laugh, 'If they only knew what they were burning...'" said Rose.

DON'T TALK

Rose tried to tell someone. When she was eight years old, stories of the serial killings were all over the papers and the FBI was investigating. Rose sent a letter to a disc jockey of a children's radio station asking him to forward the letter to the FBI. (She didn't know how to contact the FBI directly.)

The disc jockey instead contacted her parents. The man, said Rose, came to the house, and the parents, of course, said everything was fine, and their child was just a bit "disturbed." After this, said Rose, she was tortured extensively and threatened with going to the "children's electric chair" if she ever tried to tell anyone else.

What's more, a situation was set up to give her identification with the perpetrators, encoding the code-of-silence even deeper.

Rose's family lived in a rural area near railroad tracks. Rose said her father hired a "hobo" to dig a hole, etc., for a septic tank system. It took about a month, and during this time, Rose made friends with the man.

However, when the job was done, Rose said her father drove her and the man far back into the woods. Rose had been taught to shoot as a child. And the father, holding a gun to her head, told her to shoot the man. "Shoot him, or I'll kill you!" she said her father threatened. She shot him.

Note: Ritual abuse victims often report being put in "double-bind" situations, like being forced to help with the killing. This increases the overwhelming sense of powerlessness in the victim, introduces a profound element of guilt, and increases the victim's identification with the perpetrators, said ritual abuse awareness advocate Caryn StarDancer.

NETWORKING

Dominique's uncle, the North Carolina high priest, trained satanists in the United States and Canada in different workings of the cult. As mentioned in the beginning of the book, concern is mounting regarding the increase of indications of networking between the different sadistic hate groups.

Northern California ritual crime investigator Randy Cerny said some of these groups may be sharing techniques of abuse, propaganda, and infiltration. And he too believes some may be joining forces.

As an example of this kind of crossover, Cerny said he was once a clandestine observer at a stake-out of a Ku Klux Klan outdoor ceremony in Stanislaus County, California, where known satanists, with reported ties to a "skinhead" group, were in attendance.

In an interview for the Breaking the Circle book, a therapist and researcher at the Menninger Foundation Psychiatric Hospital in Topeka, Kansas, also talked about an indication of some crossover links. One of Carolyn Grame's ritual abuse patients talked of being drawn into a satanic cult comprised of a mix of teens and adults. The person reported he eventually left this cult, got involved with the Ku Klux Klan, and later with the Neo-Nazis.

A COVER-UP IN NEBRASKA?

Omaha, Nebraska's Franklin Community Federal Credit Union is shut down in 1988. Some $40 million is missing. A legislative committee, the "Franklin Committee," is appointed to investigate. The trail soon leads beyond missing money to what appears to be a national, and perhaps even international, organized crime syndicate engaged in satanic ritual murder, pedophilia, pornography, drugs, money laundering...

Former Nebraska Senator John DeCamp served on the Franklin Committee. (A highly decorated Vietnam war veteran, he now practices law in Lincoln, Nebraska.) Through extensive research, DeCamp is convinced this satanic syndicate exists and that the syndicate went to extraordinary lengths to harass, discredit, and perhaps even murder, those trying to bring this to justice. DeCamp characterizes it as perhaps the biggest cover-up since the Warren Commission. And it is also another possible example of how far, and high up, satanists may have woven themselves into the fabric of modern society.

The following are excerpts from DeCamp's book The Franklin Cover-Up, combined with a series of supplemental interviews.

EXPLOSION IN THE AIR?

Gary Caradori was one of the chief investigators for the Franklin Committee. That is, until July 11, 1990. That day Caradori was flying back to Nebraska with his eight-year-old son in a private plane. They had been to the All-Star baseball game in Chicago.

At 2.30 a.m., a farmer in Lee County, Illinois, reported he saw a flash of light, heard an explosion, and saw a plane plunge to the ground. Caradori and his son were dead. The report of the explosion in the air made the early edition of one Nebraska TV news station, said DeCamp, but was pulled from subsequent reports. The later reports, said DeCamp, indicated the plane exploded on impact.

DeCamp said Caradori had received numerous threats on his life, believed to be because during the Franklin investigation, Caradori had obtained information some of those tied to the Franklin case had perpetrated any number of child sexual abuse crimes and were practicing satanism.

"From 1988, when the [Franklin] case first broke into public view, until mid-1991, at least 15 people associated with the case as investigators, alleged perpetrators, or potential witnesses, died sudden deaths — many of them violent," said DeCamp.

A major target of the investigation was Larry King, who was the head of the Franklin Community Federal Credit Union. As the story unraveled, allegations would surface he was tied to pornography, sex rings, satanism...

Stories of child pornography started to surface from reports made by young girls from the North Omaha Girls' Club. DeCamp said some of the girls told social worker Julie Waters they had been taken to parties where they, and other children, had been abused sexually and were forced to comply with the making of pornography. The girls also talked about being flown to other parts of the country at times to similar parties — even to Washington, D.C. They also alleged King had often been involved, said DeCamp.

One of the girls was admitted to a hospital, and as she began to trust the staff, she revealed more. Not only was there sexual abuse with middle-aged men, some of the "parties" would get more intense — as elements of devil worship were introduced, said DeCamp.

According to hospital reports chronicled in Decamp's book:

> ...she was locked in a room with a little girl which she described as a Caucasian infant. At about midnight Loretta indicated the men came into the room, took the little girl away from her and told her that she could achieve power by killing something she really loved. Loretta described that > they then cut the little girl's head off, stuck it on the wall, and made her sit in front of it.

She would go on to describe other satanic sacrifices, and also the nature of threats used to keep the girls quiet:

> Loretta indicated that the men would try to scare the girls by having them watch animals being mutilated, and also the men would threaten them by saying that instead of killing them, that they would just cut off parts of their bodies.

According to DeCamp's research, Loretta's story was also starting to match up with several other youths' reports about the same perpetrators.

In this case (as with others that have been described earlier), a pattern of suppression apparently started to kick in. Even though Loretta was revealing more and more, neither the hospital, nor DeCamp, could get the police to come out for follow-up interviews with the girl. And the officer who had performed the initial interview and had initially expressed interest in following up — was transferred to another department, said DeCamp.

According to Franklin investigative committee member Senator Ernie Chambers, "I felt he'd [the officer] been transferred because he was getting too close to something, and his superiors did not want him to continue." (The officer would later testify before the Franklin Committee that he thought Loretta's charges were "credible," and he thought they deserved to be followed up on.)

Since there was no follow-up response from local law enforcement, Carol Stitt went directly to Nebraska Governor Kay Orr, who told her to "do whatever is necessary" to secure an investigation, said DeCamp. Stitt then went to the state attorney general's office with testimony from the girls claiming abuse. Shortly after, said DeCamp, several boys from Nebraska's Boys' Town also came forward reporting sexual abuse, murder and satanism in connection with Larry King and his group. (Both the girls from the Girls' Club and these boys were wards of the state.)

However, the attorney general's office, according to DeCamp, was extremely slow in acting, which led to Stitt saying to the Franklin Committee: "I'd like to say if the state continues to handle the case the way they've handled it, everything this perpetrator has told them is being reinforced. That he has the power, there's nothing they can do, nobody's going to help them."

Jerry Lowe had been hired before Caradori as the first Franklin Committee investigator. On February 15, 1989, Lowe sent a memo to the committee on the results of his first comprehensive evaluation of the cases. DeCamp cites the memo:

> This matter is indeed a complex and complicated one, commencing with the closing of the Franklin Credit Union... and mushrooming into a situation where additional allegations [other than the financial improprieties] have arisen, including influence peddling, child abuse and neglect, child sexual abuse, pornography, substance abuse, homicide, and inaction and possibly malfeasance on the part of the law enforcement agencies, public agencies and public officials for events dating several years back. More importantly, there seems to be a growing public perception that many of the affected agencies, and/or officials are participating in a cover-up.
> The allegations regarding the exploitation of children are indeed disturbing. What appears to be documented cases of child abuse and sexual abuse dating back several years with no enforcement action being taken by the appropriate agencies is on its face, mind-boggling.

Lowe did extensive taped interviews with alleged victims. They talked consistently of sexual abuse, satanic activity, being transported as part of sex rings...

Note: As hard as it is for many to believe children could be exploited covertly like this — it's going on in proverbial broad daylight these days in society as well. Again, according to the June 21, 1993, Time magazine article on global child prostitution:

> The exploitation... exemplifies the single most unsavory element of worldwide growth in the sex trade: an explosion in child prostitution...
> Estimates of the number of U.S. prostitutes under the age of 18 range from 90,000 to 300,000...
> Pederasts in particular have lots of help finding a good time in Asia, Africa, or Latin America. Numerous gay-market publications and computer networks provide information. One of the most notorious guides to world sex spas for homosexuals seeking boys is called the Spartacus International Gay Guide; available since the 1970s, it is now published in Germany in several languages.

PROGRAM OF DECEPTION

The World Herald is Nebraska's biggest newspaper. DeCamp alleges its integrity and credibility "went on the chopping block," for the sake of suppressing the truth about the Franklin case. Over and over, claimed DeCamp, the article slants were that the Franklin sex scandal, pedophilia and drug abuse stories were trumped up.

DeCamp referred to what he perceived the World Herald was doing as a "program of deception." (Incidentally, World Herald publisher Harold Andersen was also on the Franklin Community Federal Credit Union advisory board, said DeCamp.)

VERDICT

Franklin investigators came across another victim-witness, who, as a youth, claimed to have been taken as a child prostitute on numerous trips to places like Washington D.C., Des Moines, Minneapolis, Houston, St. Louis, Pasadena, Grand Island... by some of the same alleged perpetrators. He also reported being forced to be involved with a snuff film, said DeCamp.

On July 23, 1990, 12 days after the sudden death of Gary Caradori, the Douglas County Grand Jury ruled: "We found no credible evidence of child sexual abuse, interstate transportation of minors, drug trafficking, or participation in a pornography ring by [Larry] King or other Franklin [Credit Union] officials..."

Yes, Larry King had diverted credit union funds, the grand jury said. And it also ruled he used some of the money to entice men in their late teens and early 20s to engage in acts of prostitution — committing merely the crime of pandering, said DeCamp.

Everyone else was cleared.

However, victim-witnesses Alisha Owen and Paul Bonacci were indicted for lying to the grand jury about the abuse. At the time of the indictment, Owen was 19 years old, and Bonacci was 18 years old.

The case also included testimony from children claiming they had been abused in a foster home. They claimed extreme sexual and satanic ritual abuse at the hands of the parents in 1985. The father, Jarett Webb, said DeCamp, was a board member of the Franklin Credit Union and his wife, Barbara, is Larry King's cousin. (This had been the first red flag in the overall Franklin case, said DeCamp.)

While the children were taken out of the home by social service workers in 1985, the grand jury offered its opinion, said DeCamp, that it was unfortunate that so much time had elapsed between the first allegations of abuse and the time the children were removed from the home. DeCamp also said the grand jury report contained such gratuitous pronouncements as: "...children do have the right to expect that if they exhibit reasonable behavior, they will not be abused."

DeCamp also said the grand jury referred to the social service caseworkers as "rumor mongers."

Trish Lamphier, head of the Concerned Parents Group, blasted the indictments of the victim-witnesses. "This is a sick jury. Turning the victim into the perpetrator. This is so classic."

Dr. Judianne Densen-Gerber, who had been brought in as an expert consultant by the Franklin Committee, had found the victims credible and had just as incredulous a response to the indictments. "This is unprecedented, probably in the history of the United States," said Densen-Gerber, a lawyer, psychiatrist and prominent specialist on child abuse. "If the children are not telling the truth, particularly if they have been abused, they need help, medical attention. You don't throw them in jail."

DeCamp said the grand jury has said one of the witnesses, Paul Bonacci, had been a "pathetic" witness who had been diagnosed with MPD. He was being viewed by them as being "crazy," said DeCamp. "They didn't know anything about multiplicity, didn't have the remotest idea what they were dealing with." DeCamp said he believed this also demonstrated the "overwhelming influence" the prosecutor was able to exert in trying to discredit Bonacci.

DeCamp filed a civil suit against the grand jury in retaliation.

The basis for the suit, said DeCamp, was he believed in this case the grand jury had acted as the grand jury for Watergate had acted. That is, said DeCamp, they found out who knew what beforehand, then a strategy was crafted to discredit the victims.

OMAHA BUSINESS COMMUNITY

According to Franklin Committee member Senator Ernie Chambers: "What Larry King is doing is the tip of an iceberg, and he's not doing it by himself." DeCamp contends behind King's rise stood some of the most powerful figures in Nebraska politics and finance.

The following is an excerpt from The Franklin Cover-Up:

> In Gary Caradori's files is the transcript of a Feb. 12, 1989 phone conversation with Sheila McGuire, aka Sheila Calder, former manager of the French Cafe... This night spot, partly owned by Larry King, was named by victim-witnesses as a center for sexual abuse.

> The following is what Caradori wrote Calder had said: We had parties in my apartment above the French Cafe. Larry King would wine and dine potential investors downstairs at the Cafe. When the French Cafe closed about 1 a.m., King and his man called Parking Lot Bob — who worked for him (and was our coke connection) — would bring people upstairs to my place. If Larry King investors wanted drugs, booze, children or hookers (male or female) we'd get them. While these guests of King's took their pleasures — with the kids or whoever — King would sit and watch — while he drank, did coke and played with his young boys...
> King took good care of the local and out of town high rollers. If you had the money to invest at Franklin, King would cater to your most deranged perversion. And let me tell you another thing. The boys in the boardrooms around Omaha are s——ing in the Brogans. If this case gets cracked open the list of involved will read like Who's Who. King and his crew have ruined a lot of childrens' lives.

For over a century, said DeCamp, the Omaha business community has been organized around the Knights of Ak-Sar-Ben, a quasi-Freemasonic social organization, centered on a race track and fairgrounds in Omaha. (Spell Nebraska backwards and you get the name.) Founded in 1895, Ak-Sar-Ben functions as a sort of central committee of corporate elite and self-perceived oligarchy for the city, DeCamp maintains.

DeCamp also said many corporations connected to people in Ak-Sar-Ben have poured millions into the Franklin Credit Union.

DeCamp also notes Larry King got backing from Warren Buffett's socialite wife in his early rise. (In 1993, Warren Buffett was listed in Forbes Magazine's top ten billionaires in the world.) Based in Omaha, DeCamp said Buffett is the second biggest stockholder in the Washington Post and is a controlling power in ABC-TV.

WASHINGTON CONNECTION

The Franklin tentacles may have been much more far-reaching than Nebraska. DeCamp said Senator Schmitt, who was on the Franklin Committee, was warned by an anonymous caller not to pursue the case because "...it would lead to the highest levels of the Republican Party."

In a Political View Point column, November 24, 1983, Ernest E. Bryant wrote:

> Chairman [Larry] King has accepted a position in the Reagan/Bush re-election campaign. He was appointed by National Black Republican Council Chairperson LeGree Daniels, who was named Chairperson of the Black Voters for the Campaign, in the Reagan/Bush '84 re-election bid.

The article goes on to explain that King would be responsible for meeting with party officials and organizing campaign strategies within a 17-state region. In this position, King put on parties for some of these officials.

At the 1984 Dallas Republican Convention, DeCamp said King had put on a gala event at South Fork Ranch — the location where some of the TV show Dallas was filmed. DeCamp attended the party. Victim-witness Paul Bonacci also said he remembers being there. (He said he had been flown in to provide sexual favors behind the scenes for some of the guests.)

DeCamp said when he found out Bonnacci had been at the party, he questioned him about a number of things specific to that night. And after the conversation, DeCamp said he was "unequivocally convinced" Bonnacci had, indeed, been at the party.

COVER-UP PHASE III: THE FBI

DeCamp also states, "The justice department, acting through the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's office in Omaha, emerges from the record of the Franklin investigation not so much as a party to the cover-up, but as its coordinator. Rigging grand juries, harassment of witnesses, incitement to perjury and tampering with evidence — federal personnel were seen to apply all of those techniques in the Franklin case."

DeCamp cites more information from investigator Gary Caradori's notes. This an excerpt from a conversation with a confidential informant:

> G.C.: Are the federal people still putting me down, have you heard: I mean they want me off the case?
> C.I.: Well, they don't want anybody to get too close to it... This thing is way bigger than Nebraska... You get one of those dominoes to fall I think it could reach the White House and back so fast...

DeCamp's supposition is this is the main reason the harassment and cover-up attempts have been so, seemingly, intensive.

DeCamp cites more of Caradori's notes, April 20, 1990:

> At approximately 1415, this writer received a telephone call from Alisha Owen [one of the victim-witnesses]. She talked about the FBI hinting to her that if she changed her story that they would insure her they would "go after" this writer and Mike Casey for "fabricating" an investigation. She informed me she had not fabricated any part of any story and that she was sticking to the story she had told me, and that > she wished me well. For my own protection, I tape recorded the telephone conversation, which lasted approximately 30 minutes.

SATANIC AND PEDOPHILE ACTIVITY

The Douglas County Grand Jury acknowledged that the allegations in the Franklin case "necessitated our study of satanic and pedophile activity in eastern Nebraska..."

From The Franklin Cover-Up:

> According to testimony from Paul Bonacci, Larry King had been recruited to a satanic cult by Dec. 1980, at the latest. In his written history, Bonacci described how King picked him up after school one day in December, "and took me to the Triangle which is in a wooded area in Sharp County. I witnessed a sacrifice of a human baby boy. Everyone was chanting and it was a yearly ritual around the time of Christ's birth to pervert the blood of Christ. They used daggers and cut the body and filled a cup with his blood and mixed urine in it and forced all of us to drink from the cup and chant 'Satan is Lord. Lucifer our King. Realm of darkness come now and empower us your slaves.' Then they all began to chant some weird sounds and I got scared and was threatened I'd become the next sacrifice if I ever told anybody about it."

Note: Bonacci reports being taken to the "Triangle" to witness a satanic sacrifice. In Ohio, Detective Kasarda finds a triangle configuration at an alleged backwoods ritual site. According to the book Exposing and Confronting Satan and Associates, in satanism the triangle sometimes represents fire or male virility. Satanists will also use the geometric configuration of a triangle, or a circle, to call demons into.

Kathleen Sorenson became the foster parent that had taken in the children that had been taken from the Webb home in Nebraska in 1985. There were consistent claims of sexual and ritual abuse. Sorenson decided to speak out about what she was hearing from the children and went around the state giving talks, and eventually ended up on Geraldo Rivera's nationally televised show on satanism. On another television show shortly after, Sorenson said:

> As you listen to us talk about these things [ritual abuse], there will be a natural part of you which will deny much of what you hear, and believe me, we did too. I would like to share this with you, partly in childrens' [sic] words, so that you can hear the things that they said that nobody can make up, that no child could know. That's what eventually convinced me, along with the deep emotion, the grieving, screeching, damage and hurt that they cry out with as they talk...
> Many are sent to psychiatric hospitals where they are labeled psychotics, schizophrenics... I praise God that He brought so many of them into my life, and through our home, and that there are other families like ours, it is just a movement of the Holy Spirit is the only way I can explain it.

DeCamp said Kathleen Sorenson was aware it was dangerous for her to go public at the time. She was killed in a head-on car crash in 1989.

DeCamp said ritual abuse investigator Ted Gunderson investigated the accident and said there was a possibility it was a satanist contract/suicide. (In some satanic lore, according to Gunderson, a person who sacrifices his/her life like this for satan, will be reincarnated with more power.)

DeCamp explained Sorenson was driving a stretch of road between Fremont, Nebraska, and her home in Blair. At least several people, said DeCamp, knew which road she would be on, and at what time. Another car coming from the opposite direction, crossed the yellow line and rammed into Sorenson's car.

SENTENCED

DeCamp notes Larry King was sent to prison, but again, not for child abuse. Under a plea bargain arrangement finalized with federal prosecutors on June 17, 1991, King is serving a 15-year sentence for embezzlement, conspiracy and making false financial record entries. Since the Douglas County Grand Jury deferred to the federal authorities, said DeCamp, and since there was no trial of King on the federal embezzlement or any other charges — the evidence of child prostitution and abuse allegedly perpetrated by King was never presented in any court.

On August 8, 1991, however, the victim-witness Alisha Owen was sentenced to three consecutive three-to-nine-year prison terms for perjury, said DeCamp. Shortly after, the charges of perjury against Paul Bonacci were dropped.

By this time, DeCamp was legal representative for Bonacci and had put together a case including much of the evidence just described. DeCamp said he believes: "They dropped the charges so that the truth would never come out."

Besides some of the information already talked about, Bonacci has also described a network of safe-homes where the pedophile ring stored kidnapped children before selling them. He said children would be kidnapped, then taken to Las Vegas where they were auctioned at a ranch.

DeCamp now also represents Alisha Owens, free of charge. He believes strongly in the credibility of both their stories.

"If I still had the luxury of believing as I once did, that all allegations of drug abuse, child abuse, pedophilia, theft and satanic cult activity were the exaggerated imaginings of some overactive child and adult imaginations, then I would not have to do anything about Franklin. I could still be enjoying an income of $400,000 per year as a lobbyist, without having to work too hard, instead of being financially strangled as clients are intimidated away from hiring me, because of the Franklin connection.

"But I do know that it's true, and because of my upbringing, I have no choice but to plow ahead."

MAFIA DOESN'T EXIST?

It's important to put some things in context at this point, in light of the Nebraska case, and the possibility of similar conspiracies and cover-ups.

For instance, I mentioned the Mafia earlier in the book. We know unequivocally now that during the 1910s, '20s, '30s, '40s... in the United States the Mafia was (and is) a vast national, and international, organization directed by known "godfathers" of crime. They ran a multitude of "rackets," ran drugs, extorted money, murdered, bribed and blackmailed all kinds of government officials. However, incredibly, it wouldn't be until the mid-1950s that that information would finally start to be made public through the "Valachi Papers," an expose by a former La Cosa Nostra member. And this would be further supplemented in November of 1957 when a rural policeman in Apalachin, New York, came across a gathering of 63 top mobsters from 15 states. They were assembled at the palatial home of Sicilian killer, Joe Barbara, for what could be described as a "Mafia convention," Anthony Summers writes in his book Hidden Hoover.

Summers points out this incident confirmed what a lot of law enforcement officers already knew about the Mafia and its extensiveness. However, it had hardly been investigated! What's more, the high-profile head of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover, not only didn't authorize investigation of the Mafia — he said publicly it didn't even exist.

According to Summers' book, Hoover, who was the director of the FBI from 1924 until his death in 1972, may have had a long relationship with Mafia chieftain Frank Costello.

From Hidden Hoover:

> In 1990, New York mob boss Carmine Lombordozzi, 80, said Costello and Hoover "had contact on many occasions and over a long period. Hoover was very friendly toward the [Mafia] families... The families made sure he was looked after when he visited [race] tracks in California and on the East Coast. They had an understanding. He would lay off the families, turn a blind eye. It helped that he denied that we even existed."

And there was more. The Mafia, said Summers, apparently had proof of Hoover's persuasion toward homosexuality, and they apparently used this to neutralize the FBI. In addition, the Mafia apparently even catered to Hoover's preference, according to Summers.

Summers wrote one of Frank Costello's allies, Lewis Solon Resenstiel, wore the mantle of business tycoon and philanthropist. Over the years he gave $100 million to Brandeis University, the University of Notre Dame, and hospitals in New York and Florida. Secretly, wrote Summers, he was in league with the nation's top mobsters and had a corrupt relationship with Hoover. He and Hoover, moreover, reportedly took part in bizarre sex orgies.

RITUAL ABUSE DOESN'T EXIST EITHER?

Now let's jump to the late '80s. Reports of satanic ritual abuse are increasing almost exponentially. Ritual abuse task forces are starting to form to fight back, hospital treatment programs are starting to develop to help survivors, safe-houses are evolving...

Then, in October 1989 (and updated in 1992), the FBI Academy's National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime in Quantico, Virginia, releases what is to become an often-cited report, especially by those trying to debunk all this, that there is no tangible evidence to substantiate there are any trans-generational ritual abuse groups, rings, conspiracies...

I reiterate one of the excerpts from the report (a version of which was still seriously cited as recently as the April 1994 edition of Texas Monthly Magazine):

> The law enforcement perspective cannot ignore the lack of physical evidence (no bodies or even body hairs, fibers, or fluids left by violent murders).

As graphically detailed earlier, there are bodies, dismembered body parts, hairs, fluids (mostly red)... And granted, some of this evidence surfaced after the release of the initial report. What's puzzling, however, is, in the face of all the ritual abuse survivor reports surfacing, why the FBI would even release a document that, in effect, would significantly influence law enforcement agencies all over the country to minimize efforts in following up on these reports?

The FBI report goes on to say:

> ...the difficulty in successfully committing a huge scale conspiracy crime (the more people are involved in any crime conspiracy, the harder it is to get away with; and human nature, intra-group conflicts resulting in individual self-serving disclosures, would be bound to occur in any group involved in organized kidnapping, baby breeding, human sacrifice...)

The Mafia committed a large-scale "conspiracy crime" that went undetected for decades. Not only did this entail a high degree of sophistication on their part, but it also entailed "large-scale" complicity on the part of politicians, business, law enforcement... including, perhaps, even the head of the FBI — the same agency that is now releasing a report that there is no evidence satanic ritual abuse exists in groups, or as a conspiracy.

BRAINWASHING AND PROGRAMMING

As therapists continue to work with ritual abuse survivors, they are stunned at some of the sophistication of the brainwashing and programming. Electro-shock, sensory deprivation, psycho-surgery, massive doses of drugs, subliminal tapes to reshape the personality.

At first glance this all might sound like intriguing science fiction. However, a closer look shows it is anything but fiction. And what's more, not only is it utilized by cult members — but by governments all over the world.

At the First Annual Conference on Ritual Abuse/Mind Control in Richmond, Virginia, Alan W. Scheflin presented on significant events in the history of mind control. His material was intended to show, not only historical mind-control chronology, but how sophisticated the techniques have become — as well as an eye-opening look at some of the groups that are using them.

Scheflin is a professor of law at Santa Clara University in California. He has also taught at Georgetown University. Besides a law degree, he has a master's degree in counseling psychology. He has also co-authored The Mind Manipulators and Trance On Trial. (The latter won the 1991 Guttmacher Award from the American Psychiatric Association for the most outstanding publication of the year in forensic psychiatry.)

The following is based on the presentation in Virginia and a series of follow-up interviews.

MIND CONTROL HISTORY

In the late 1960s, then-Georgetown University law professor Alan Scheflin procured several documents being smuggled out of Russia by the Soviet Underground Human Rights Movement. The documents were translated in London, then passed on through Amnesty International.

They described political oppression, including the use of unethical psychiatric techniques for attempting to convert dissidents.

The documents piqued Scheflin's interest. And as he began to explore this area, he discovered parallel techniques being used in the United States. He also saw that this was a significant issue that, in his opinion, hadn't been adequately addressed by authors or the media at the time.

Scheflin's early research eventually prompted the writing of The Mind Manipulators, published in 1978. Shortly after, he returned to school to obtain a master's degree in counseling psychology.

Of the decision to get into psychology, Scheflin said:

> "I had spent a decade reading about how all of the collected wisdom on human nature by psychologists, psychiatrists and other healers was being used to pervert, convert and destroy healthy individuals [through these mind-control projects]. I began to feel I'd learned a good deal of bad. And I needed to balance it with a good deal of good. I wanted to learn how the techniques could be used to help people. And that was a really refreshing period for me, because it balanced out a lot of the absolute horror stories I was reading about."

BRAIN WARFARE

One of those stories, which Scheflin believes marks the beginning of the modern brainwashing era, was the "Moscow Show Trials" in the 1930s. Joseph Stalin's communist regime had overthrown the Bolsheviks. Stalin wanted to consolidate his power. And as usual after one of these takeovers, the regime put some of its predecessors on public trial. However, the "usual" people weren't put on trial...

Instead of prosecuting members of the old-line regime, Stalin put a number of Bolsheviks on trial who were, in essence, his friends. (These were younger Bolsheviks who had actually helped orchestrate the revolution and takeover of the czar.) In other words, some of the people who aided in the overthrow were now seeing themselves as traitors. What's more, said Scheflin, astoundingly, they readily confessed to a whole litany of war crimes historians would later determine they never committed.

This began to foster world-wide suspicion the Russians had, indeed, developed effective brainwashing/mind-control techniques.

This was underscored dramatically again during the highly publicized trial of Hungary's Catholic Cardinal Mindszenty in 1949. Mindszenty had been a staunch, outspoken anti-communist for years. However, when the communists took over Hungary, Mindszenty was arrested and jailed for six months.

He too went to trial, said Scheflin, and his whole demeanor, actually, it would even seem, his whole personality, had changed. He was now quite docile and categorically confessed to errors in most every aspect of his thinking about communism.

Scheflin said the power of torture and mind manipulation techniques is sometimes simply phenomenal in actually persuading someone to believe in the exact opposite of their ideology... no matter how seemingly skewed the new ideology is.

Note: Such is the case, for instance, with trans-generational satanism. Through a series of torture and mind-control techniques, such as promoting paradoxical thinking, victims are convinced bad is good, pain is pleasure, Hell is a desirable place to go...

"Not only were people being manipulated into believing their old political, or religious beliefs were wrong, but more, they were actually believing they were traitors, sinners — and would beg to be shot," said Scheflin.

Shortly after the Mindszenty trial, the CIA reportedly procured a secret document that detailed some of the drugs and sophisticated hypnotic techniques used on Mindszenty. Consequently, there was concern at the CIA that the Soviets were significantly out-pacing the United States in "brain warfare," said Scheflin.

"Part of the story was the fear the Soviets had made advancements in controlling the way people think and act that could not be replicated, or understood, in the West," said Scheflin. "The other part, I believe, is it unleashed the seductive zeal in people who wanted to learn how to make other people do their bidding."

In 1951, mind-control research became a documented CIA goal, said Scheflin.

And, just as a precursor to this next section, it is possible the CIA was doing some preliminary work on mind control with the help of, what would seem, the most unlikely of allies. Scheflin said it is a fact the United States clandestinely brought over Nazi rocket scientists after World War II to glean information. And there is unconfirmed conjecture, said Scheflin, that some of the Nazi doctors involved with human experiments in the concentration camps were also smuggled over to the United States and hidden, in order to get as much research data from them as possible — including data from mind-control experiments.

M.K. ULTRA PROJECT

In April 1953, the CIA's M.K. Ultra project was approved.

"This set in motion an enormous, heavily funded... thoroughly top secret program to explore all facets of mind and behavior control," said Scheflin.

M.K. Ultra became an umbrella for 149 sub-projects. There were projects to experiment, for instance, with such amnesia-producing agents as electro-shock, ultrasonics, sub-sonics, hypnosis, sensory deprivation...

Note: One of the mind-control techniques ritual abuse survivors frequently report having been exposed to is sensory deprivation. That is, they report being locked in places like small rooms, closets, coffin-like boxes... without light, sound, food or water for extended periods of time.

An environment sometimes used is a sensory deprivation floatation tank. That is, literally a soundproof black box with body-temperature water and salt solution to keep a person buoyant and in a state of, what could be considered, suspended animation.

Scheflin said what researchers were learning was, in some cases, the use of short-term sensory deprivation in breaking down the personality, could sometimes bypass months of torture and forced drug use to achieve the same effect. If sensory input is sufficiently curtailed, said Scheflin, the subject will eventually lose more and more touch with their core personality, and start to project fantasy worlds around themselves — eventually effecting the ultimate in dissociation. In this state, the person is extremely open to having their personality altered.

Another area the CIA funded and in which it monitored mind-control experiments, was the use of drugs to substantially alter brain patterning.

Note: Many ritual abuse survivors consistently recall being administered hallucinogenic, and other drugs, to heighten the cult ceremony experience and to also make it seem surrealistic. The drugs were also used to make the victim more malleable in performing some of the acts. In addition, they were used to at times make victims more susceptible to programming messages.

When mycologists went down to South America to find "magic mushrooms," and so on, said Scheflin, the CIA was there. Also, the professor said when LSD was synthesized initially, the CIA attempted to buy up a major portion of the world supply then.

When asked who the government's experimental M.K. Ultra subjects were, Scheflin responded: "Everybody."

As part of the mind-control series, the CIA funded experiments on mental patients, prisoners, students, the general population — even, it turns out, on other government employees.

Some will recall the highly publicized case of Frank Olson. Olson was employed by the armed services to work on biological warfare. One day Olson and a number of others were invited to a meeting.

At the meeting, LSD was slipped into everyone's drinks in order to monitor subsequent reactions. Olson had a bad reaction, and was flown to a specialist at a New York hospital. However, two days later, Olson "allegedly" jumped out of a 13th floor window to his death, said Scheflin.

Did Olson actually jump? Or was his death part of a cover-up attempt? According to a July 13, 1994, wire service report:

> Preliminary results of a forensic examination appear to contradict government assertions that germ-warfare researcher Frank Olson, who died in 1953 after unwittingly taking LSD in a CIA experiment, jumped to his death from a New York hotel. Multiple fractures to Olson's skull do not appear consistent with a 13 story fall, according to James E. Starrs, a George Washington University professor of law and forensic science.

Was Olson taken out as part of CIA "damage control?" This is wholly possible, given some of the other clearly unconscionable things the government has done with other mind-control and radiation experiments, to name a few.

The book Whistleblowers contains four pages of apparently declassified CIA documents from the M.K. Ultra project that allude to "disposal of subjects":

> The problem of disposal of subjects is constantly present in intelligence operations. Even with fully cooperative subjects the matter is [not] simple, but where disposal involves totally unwilling subjects, or subjects who cannot be trusted, the problem is complex, expensive and very difficult. Since disposal does not mean shooting a subject by our standards, we are faced with at least three serious issues:

1) Placing the subject somewhere (confinement, re-settlement).
2) Insuring his adherence to our views and/or
3) Preventing his giving away our secrets.

> If by some means we could create a perfect and thoroughly controlled amnesia, the matter would be simplified...

Scheflin said Sidney Gottlieb brought the LSD to the meeting where Olson was drugged and was in charge of the day-to-day operations of M.K. Ultra.

As time went on, the M.K. Ultra experiments broadened in scope to try to go beyond just altering personality — to actually replacing it altogether.

In 1978, the television show 60 Minutes did an exposé on one set of such experiments.

In the '50s and '60s, the CIA helped partially fund Canadian psychiatrist Ewen Cameron's work at Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal. Part of his work was to regress people back to infancy, and literally rebuild a new personality. (Supposedly, Cameron was using people that had some sort of "flaw" in their personality, and the stated goal appeared to be eliminating that flaw.)

People were "depatterned" through electro-shock, massive doses of chemicals (LSD, mescaline, psilocybin), and so on. After extended periods of this, attempts were then made to program in the new personality.

The initial experiments apparently left some subjects permanently damaged in any number of ways. Some were unable to work ever again. Some experienced significant memory loss. Some also experienced deep distrust of the psychiatric field in general, keeping them from getting sound psychiatric help, to help reverse what had been done.

One man, said Scheflin, had actually gone into the hospital with merely an organic leg problem, yet he was talked into submitting to a battery of psychological conditioning experiments.

Patients went to see Cameron voluntarily, and didn't realize until much later they were being used in experiments, according to a February 1993 New York Times article. The article reported on Canada finally agreeing to compensate victims of these psychiatric experiments. (The United States had already settled.)

The Canadian government agreed to pay each patient $80,000.

According to the article:

> The patients at Allan Memorial Institute at McGill [University] were put into a drugged sleep for weeks, or months. In that state, they were subjected to electroshock therapy until they were "depatterned," knowing neither who or where they were, and forced to listen repeatedly to recorded messages broadcast from speakers on the wall and under their pillows.

The article goes on to chronicle the story of Linda McDonald, now 55, who spent 86 days in the "sleep room." She was subjected to 109 shock treatments and mega-doses of barbiturates and other drugs. When she left the experiment, it is reported she could not read or write, had to be toilet-trained and could not remember her husband, her five children, or any part of the first 26 years of her life.

As Scheflin mentioned earlier, wiping out someone's personality, and then programming in one that will do the programmer's bidding is very "seductive" to some. We see this happen in cults of all kinds.

And what's even more sophisticated, is the actual systematic programming in of many alter personalities who will respond to programming cues.

A cinematic version of this is the 1950s film Manchurian Candidate. This was the story of an American P.O.W. in North Korea, who was programmed with an assassin alter personality. Every time he was shown the Queen of Diamonds playing card, the assassin personality would come up, and the personality followed whatever set of instructions were given.

When the "hit" was over, the assassin personality would recess, and the "host" personality would return — remembering nothing of what happened.

A modern-day version of this happens to the character Bridgette Fonda plays in the movie Point of No Return. In this case, the United States government fakes a woman's death, then systematically programs her to become an assassin. The code name "Nina" is used to invoke the assassin personality every time she is to carry out a hit.

One might wonder what code name the following woman was given. And one might also wonder how many like her — are out there now?

The following is from a February 18, 1977, UPI report:

> Washington, D.C. — The CIA shook the theory nice people can't be made immoral under hypnosis by getting one woman to act out a cold-blooded murder in 1951, according to declassified intelligence documents.
> The cold war era mind control experiment climaxed when the hypnotized woman, described as a peaceable sort, terrified of guns, fired a pistol point-blank at a sleeping colleague — not knowing the gun had been unloaded...

A book Scheflin recommended is John Mark's In Search of the Manchurian Candidate. This book reports at length on CIA mind-control experiments. This information finally became public after Mark's initial research and lawsuit against the government to get CIA documents released.

In In Search of the Manchurian Candidate, Mark reports that because of the secrecy of M.K. Ultra, the CIA could dispense with some of the academic red tape that bogs down researchers. There were "no stupid progress reports," recalls psychiatrist Martin Orne, who received a grant to support his Harvard research on hypnotism, noted Mark.

According to Mark's book, "We could go to Orne any time," says one of them (an M.K. Ultra official), "and say, 'Okay, here is a situation and here is a kind of a guy. What would you expect we might be able to achieve if we could hypnotize him?' Through his massive knowledge he could speculate and advise."

Mark refers to Orne as a "long-time M.K. Ultra consultant." One of the book footnotes: Martin Orne's work for the Agency

(CIA) was described in Subproject 84. He contributed a chapter to the book The Manipulation of Human Behavior.

One other thing: Martin Orne is now on the professional advisory board for the False Memory Syndrome Foundation.

Scheflin also said George H. Estabrooks, a college professor of psychology who worked with the government, said he was actually able to create a "Manchurian Candidate." Again, this is a person with other personalities that could function as couriers, assassins, and so on...

Scheflin emphasizes it is imperative people speak out about all this on as many levels as possible.

In The Mind Manipulators, Scheflin and co-author Edward Opton Jr. wrote extensively, not only about lobotomies, psychosurgery, shock treatments, electrical brain stimulation — but also about the CIA involvement in all that.

Scheflin said Congress has been notoriously ineffective in overseeing the CIA. And he said the prevailing sentiment is Congress often doesn't want to even be told what the CIA is doing. So the CIA often, said Scheflin, in essence operates with virtually no supervision — with somewhat of a carte blanche to excuse it from ethics, or even laws of the state.

In The Mind Manipulators, Scheflin, tongue in cheek, opens one of the chapters with a quote from then-CIA director Richard Helms: "You must trust us. We are all honorable men."

Scheflin believes there are still clandestine laboratories where these experiments continue. All that has changed is the techniques are probably much more sophisticated, he said.

He said he also believes on a government level there might be an international mind-control network link between such countries as the United States, Britain, Canada, Australia...

"Things point to some collaboration." For instance, Scheflin said a researcher in Australia recently sent him information on an Australian psychiatrist who was doing basically the same work as Cameron in Canada had been doing.

What's more, researcher Martin Cannon writes in the book Project M.K. Ultra: "although the documents given to Congress (and, in part, reprinted here) are sometimes startling, they probably represent a 'limited hangout' designed to satiate congressional investigators with a bowdlerized history of CIA mind-control research. The worst has been kept hidden from us."

What's more, even though the government said it's stopped those experiments, those programs, one must ask: Have they?

Now, as unbelievable as it seems, it appears the CIA funded a series of unethical and unconscionable mind-control projects. Projects that destroyed people's lives. All in search for, among other things, the perfect conscienceless operatives.

To underscore this, and as a way of further showing how unconscionable parts of the United States government are, I cite an April 20, 1994, Albuquerque Tribune story about recently released documents on government-sponsored radiation experiments:

> In Boston, it was mentally retarded teenagers who ate radioactively contaminated milk and cereal.
> In Nashville, Tenn., it was low-income pregnant women who took radioactive iron pills.
> In Oregon and Washington state, it was prison inmates whose testicles were irradiated.
> And in Memphis, Tenn., it was newborn babies who were injected with radioactive iodide.
> From the 1940s to the 1970s, government sponsored scientists conducted human radiation experiments. They often chose people who were disadvantaged, vulnerable, poor, or members of minority groups as their unwitting guinea pigs.

MARIONETTE OPERATIVES

The day I got back from the Ritual Abuse/Mind Control seminar in Virginia, I received a letter from a woman in Georgia who was writing about, of all things, some of the ultra-sophisticated levels of programming she had been indoctrinated with — as an unwitting high-level operative.

Note: A subsection of the M.K. Ultra series was reportedly code-named "MKNAOMI." Its focus, supposedly, is psychological and genetic engineering to create these Manchurian-Candidate-type operatives for work pools, sex slave rings, drug running, assassinations... It is also reported by some that the base research data for the project initially came from SS German Nazi scientists, and now psychiatrists, and others from around the world, are collaborating on the project.

Kathleen H. is 38 years old, married, and four years prior to this interview, got into recovery for codependency issues. As she was doing recovery/psychotherapy, she sequentially got in touch with past physical abuse, sexual abuse — and finally a complex alter personality system that would eventually reveal her reported long-term involvement as a sex slave, courier and assassin in conjunction with the highly secretive government mind-control projects, she said.

Kathleen's father had been an electrical engineer for a major communications company in Pennsylvania, who was also involved with trans-generational druidism and satanism, she said. Kathleen reports being indoctrinated at an early age, and over time, was sequentially involved with the Satanic Hierarchy, then Order of the Golden Dawn, and finally the Illuminati. Kathleen describes this as a three-pronged network, with the Illuminati at the top of the occultic pyramid.

MEMORY SAGA

Kathleen initially got into recovery at the Crossroads Codependency Treatment Center in Chattanooga, Tennessee in 1989. Referred to there as the "ice lady," she virtually had no childhood memories.

Eventually, she began having memories of her father sexually abusing her as a child. After the memories started to come, she confronted her father with a letter, then took a step beyond. He had married into a second family, and there was a young daughter. The new wife had also read Kathleen's letter and started to become acutely aware of sexual abuse symptoms in some of the children. She went to the sex crimes division of the county's sheriff's department.

The father was subsequently charged with three counts of child molestation. However, he died before the end of the trial. (While the death was listed as a suicide, Kathleen asserts her father was really killed at the hands of some of his underworld associates.)

Meanwhile, Kathleen started having more repressed memories and feelings surface. At this time, she was in private therapy and had begun going to a 12 Step group for incest survivors. There were now "home torture" memories that included her father performing electro-shock on her with transformer wires from a train set, the use of vice grips, insertion of objects into her orifices... She also remembered a "kiddie porn" setting in a building where she was photographed.

It would be shortly after all this, she would have the first satanic ritual abuse flashback. It was merely a quick flash to her father standing in front of her in a black robe. "Neither I, nor my therapist, had any inkling that I had occult ritual abuse in my history. We had never even discussed this possibility. I didn't want to deal with the flashback, but I had no choice," she said. "Suicide conditioning was kicking in hard and fast."

Shortly after, Kathleen went to Bethesda Psychiatric Health Institute in Denver, Colorado, where she was diagnosed with MPD. Sixteen alter personalities surfaced. More memories came.

Memories of not only being at cult ritual ceremonies, but actually officiating at some as well — and outwardly sharing the same satanic belief system.

"I was deeply in shock about the things my alter personalities were drawing and describing — in detail," said Kathleen. This included having sex with animals, cannibalizing animal parts, drinking blood, having to help kill a young child during one of the ceremonies, being a high priest apprentice... She also began remembering that she, too, had been taught and programmed by her father to program other cult children.

"This last awareness, more than any other, plunged me into deep depression. And there was a strong desire to end my life," Kathleen continued. "I simply couldn't live with the knowledge these children were living mentally and emotionally damaged lives because of what I had done to them."

When Kathleen got out of Bethesda, she continued with long-term individual therapy. During this work, many more alter personalities surfaced, along with information about the deeper layers of programming. And as these alters and programming schemes became apparent, even more simply horrendous memories started to emerge.

She remembered her father was a highly respected, valued programmer, who, she said, was also involved with the CIA joint mind-control projects. She remembered attending mind-control trainings her father put on for such groups as satanic high priests, Neo-Nazi leaders, and other occult group representatives. Kathleen realized her father had actually used her as a prototype, programming layer after layer of identities.

One of the identities was that of an assassin. She had memories of being trained to kill using such weapons as AK 47s, zip wires, knives...

HIT JOBS

Kathleen said when a "hit job" would come up, the scenario would go like this:

People in charge of taking her to the hit location were called "handlers." They would contact her, and through a series of code words, would call forth the alter personality designated to do the traveling. (She would be transported in motor homes, private planes, etc.)

En route, the assassin alter would be called up and given a dossier on the person to be eliminated. The files would often include what Kathleen now construes was fabricated material on the person to provoke the killer instinct in the assassin alter personality. She said a report may read that the target "rapes and molests" children. (Because that had been Kathleen's personal experience growing up, the primal anger she had to draw on to carry out the killing was immense.)

Kathleen said some of the killings were staged as suicides and accidents, including hangings, someone going off a bridge, pill overdoses. Others simply became unsolved homicides.

She, for instance, had a memory of being transported to another city. Then a memory of standing in front of a woman with a white dress on. A pistol is raised. Kathleen fires. And there are memories of the absolutely shocked expression on the woman's face, as a "red flower" of blood began to stain the front of the victim's dress.

Kathleen said she believes she was seldom briefed on the real reason the person was being killed. But she surmised it was sometimes, say, a local satanic high priest who was holding back money from the Illuminati, or a defector who had begun to talk... "Who knows," said Kathleen, "maybe the woman I killed was doing the same thing I'm doing today [with the interview]."

After the killing, Kathleen said she would be transported back home, the alter personality recessed, and she would have no conscious memory of what happened.

"I was taught at governmental [and other] facilities, how to kill people. I was trained, in alter personality states, how to use a number of standard and non-standard weapons," Kathleen continued. "After working through these particular memories [assassinations], I met with several men who were in Special Forces and Military Intelligence. I gave these people detailed descriptions of the techniques I was taught, and of specific types of weapons, bombs and ammunition that I also used, in alter states... Each one told me that very few civilians know about the methods of killing I describe.

They have validated my memories enough for me to be confident in sharing the truth with other people."

Kathleen ended by saying: "I know the Illuminati wants to ultimately rule the world... Talk about control freaks."

POINT OF NO RETURN

Earlier I alluded to the movie Point of No Return, written by Robert Getchell, and starring Bridgette Fonda. In the movie, Fonda's character's death is faked, and she is forced to become a trained assassin, or "marionette" if you will, for a highly secretive United States government project.

Through forced confinement, threats, psychological and physical manipulation (she is even shot in the leg by her trainer at one point), she is "broken." She is then given a code name, "Nina," and trained in martial arts, advanced weapons use, etc. She systematically becomes more skilled, and more cold — as this persona, attached to the code name, evolves.

She is eventually released from the supervised underground training location, to resume somewhat of a normal life on the outside. She gets an apartment, gets into a relationship, is again experiencing full ranges of emotions...

However, periodically she would get phone calls where the code name was invoked. With this trigger, she would move into her professional, almost conscienceless, assassin persona and carry out whatever commands she was given.

While the main character's code name was fictitious, the general scenario is far from fictitious — and is not without some pretty tangible, documented precedence.

The woman's code name was "Tania." The world knew her as newspaper heiress Patty Hearst. In 1974, she was kidnapped by the Symbionese Liberation Army (SLA), a small political terrorist group. Through sensory deprivation (being starved and locked in a dark closet for weeks), intimidation, threats, sexual abuse, and any number of other psychological and physical manipulations, Hearst apparently was "broken." Then through mind control, she was coerced to become a member of the group. She passed up chances to escape, participated in armed bank robberies, and other SLA operations.

Note: The previous chapter cites the story of a government mind-control project that turned a woman into a conscienceless assassin. That was in 1951. With the possibility of 45 more years of experimentation and research — how much more sophisticated, and effective, has the process, perhaps, become?

The following section provides some scary indicators.

ADVANCED PROGRAMMING

According to some therapists who have worked with people with this "high-level" programming, the current sophistication is staggering — and often quite consistent from operative to operative.

Licensed clinical pastoral counselor Mary Jo Schneller, Fenton, Missouri, has helped deprogram several of these operatives. She said they are encoded with a series of complex programs.

For instance, an "alpha" program is at the base of all the programs, said Schneller. Through neuron pathway stimulation, the operative can tap into such "super-human" traits as enormous increases in physical strength, a photographic memory, amazing visual acuity. This program stimulates brain output in many areas exponentially.

"Beta" programming is designed to create the "ultimate sex slave," said Schneller. These alter personalities are programmed with no sexual inhibitions and trained to perform practically any fantasy.

"Gamma" programming utilizes a series of sophisticated "blockers" to keep the programs and alter personalities totally compartmentalized.

"Delta" programming is designed to create assassin alter personalities.

"Theta" programming, said Schneller, entails tapping into psychic abilities. Since these abilities (such as extra-sensory perception) are often erratic, Schneller said methods for controlling and enhancing these abilities have been developed. The brain, for instance, is stimulated by such things as lasers and electromagnetics.

"Chi" programming includes "call-back dates" for the person to, say, return to the cult. And "omega" programming consists of self-destruct programs.

Note: Schneller said she has networked with the Mungadze Association, a dissociative disorders clinic in Bedford, Texas, in regard to some of this information and deprogramming techniques.

"ROBOT" ALTER PERSONALITIES

More and more therapists are coming across survivors reporting high-level "marionette" operative stories similar to Kathleen's. Randy Noblitt, Ph.D., is also a member of both the American and British Psychological Societies.

Noblitt said he has worked with a number of survivors reporting the same types of stories as Kathleen. Besides the alter personalities already described, Noblitt, like a number of other therapists, has also discovered "robot" alters in some of these complex internal systems. The "robots," said Noblitt, are viewed by the rest of the system of alters as actually being metallic, impenetrable. They have been programmed to be "enforcers," somewhat similar to Arnold Schwarzenegger's character in the Terminator movies.

"The fact that these types of patients [operatives] are coming up so often, leads me to believe this is not confabulation," said Noblitt.

SUPREMACIST DOMINATION

Dr. Collin Ross has also worked with survivors reporting similar stories. Ross is the director of the Dissociative Disorders Unit at Charter Hospital in Dallas. He is also the author of: Multiple Personality Disorder: Diagnosis, Clinical Features and Treatment and The Osiris Complex (Case Studies in MPD).

Ross doesn't dismiss the stories of high-level programming. According to Ross, some have already been documented as well.

As discussed earlier, Ross said some of the government mind-control experiments have now been declassified, and reports on some of the same dynamics as in these (marionette) survivor stories. "And they [government experiments] have been systematic, and highly unethical," he said. Ross, for instance, cited a 1961 Scientific Digest article about G.H. Estabrooks' work, in concert with the United States government, to deliberately create Manchurian-Candidate-type alter personalities that could be cued by hypnotic codes to become military operatives.

Ross said the reports of this type of abuse are becoming a major emerging theme in the therapeutic field. And he said, like any of the other abuse themes (i.e., sexual abuse, ritual abuse), before it reaches a measure of consistent acceptance, it will go through its inevitable stages. That is, there will be incredulity and attempts to discredit the survivors. Likewise, the therapeutic field will most likely become highly polarized around the issue. However, as more reports surface, and more and more evidence links are established, degrees of acceptance will inevitably increase in the therapeutic world — and in society.

Ross also reiterated the medical experimentation/mind control phenomenon is not initially coming from a place of pure conjecture. As discussed, some of the government experiments have already been documented. What is left to determine is how much of an overlap there is into ritual abuse groups, to what extent it is going on in society in general — and who is pulling the strings?

Ross said there are indications the overall links are extensive, with ties into the Kennedy assassinations, Jonestown, even Waco... In recent years, there have been a number of investigative pieces that indicate the linking of Jim Jones, the leader of the People's Temple in Jonestown, Guyana, to the M.K. Ultra series. That is, that he was possibly a contract programmer for the CIA, carrying out a series of mind-control experiments with his followers.

California journalist May Brussel has put together a lengthy tape series based on her exhaustive research into the Kennedy assassinations, Jonestown, and so on. In one of her tapes, she said she believes both mind-control and genetic experiments may have been carried out at Jonestown as an extension of CIA experimentation.

Brussel said, curiously, there were 33 babies born in Jonestown who weren't accounted for after the mass suicide. She theorizes they may have been part of the experimentation, and transported to another location for more observation and research.

Likewise, Ross said, as ongoing investigations are done in the aftermath of the Branch Davidian cult situation in Waco, Texas, it will be interesting to see if there was any degree of involvement with the CIA. Had the CIA, for instance, infiltrated the cult at any point to study leader David Koresh's mind-control techniques? Were there genetic experiments going on?

An interesting aside here: A May 17, 1993, Newsweek article cited a preliminary report by Dr. Bruce Perry, a Baylor College of Medicine psychiatrist who worked with 19 of the children who had been exposed to the Waco cult. According to the article:

> In his report, Perry mentions that several children said dead babies were kept in the freezer until they could be buried or burned. Perry says that there's no way to determine the accuracy of these reports.

Why? Because the cult complex, just like any number of other cult sites mentioned earlier — burned to the ground. And before the fire was lit, kerosene was poured throughout the complex, which would make the fire that much more intense, that much more consuming.

A May 3, 1993, Newsweek article, also on the Waco aftermath:

> Somewhere amid the ashes of Ranch Apocalypse there may be clues to what really happened. Then again, some of the evidence, like some of the bodies, may be burned beyond recognition.

Dr. Ross noted that several books mention that Robert Kennedy's assassin, SirHan SirHan, may have been some type of M.K. Ultra series operative.

Ross also said the focus shouldn't be a myopic one, just attempting to verify each of these cases individually, and miss what's going on in the bigger picture. Ross said at this point there should be some "global-level concern" about the driving force behind it all. Which, according to Ross, would point toward a "full-tilt" white supremacist movement intent on world domination.

Ross also said, some of the apparent plan, however, is starting to break down as recovery technology is evolving to help survivors uncover the programming — and start to reverse it.

Note: As Dr. Ross alluded to, there has been conjecture SirHan SirHan may have been a programmed, M.K.-Ultra-series-type assassin.

In the Video Treasures documentary, The Second Gun, about the RFK assassination, there is a segment that explores this possibility. The beginning of the segment displays one of SirHan's notebooks. It included repeated references to "black 'magick,'" and was punctuated with such satanic symbols as an upside-down cross.

The documentary's narrator then raises the question: "Like the hero in Richard Condon's novel, The Manchurian Candidate, could SirHan be brainwashed and programmed to commit political assassination?"

SirHan repeatedly maintained he couldn't remember anything about the assassination. In an interview with SirHan's mother later, she said her son told her: "I don't remember doing it... I was told I killed Senator Kennedy."

(The tape also offers some extremely strong evidence, SirHan might not have been the only assassin, and there actually may have been a "second gun" involved. Which also tends to connote that, as with his brother John, there may have been a lot more to Robert Kennedy's assassination than we've been led to believe.)

Was a programmed alter personality in SirHan cued to act out on Robert Kennedy that day? And if that's the case, does that account for why SirHan claims he can't consciously remember the shooting?

The answers aren't clear. But given the information that has been surfacing of late about these Manchurian-Candidate-type operatives, what is clear is this possibility should be investigated a lot more than it currently is.

In the book Operation Mind Control, author W.H. Bowart writes:

> The closest the courts have come to considering the case of mind control was in the Patty Hearst case. But F. Lee Bailey, at the last minute, moved from his planned brainwashing defense. One of the witnesses in the defense was Dr. Martin Orne. Dr. Orne testified at the trial that Patty Hearst had indeed been brainwashed by the SLA. Orne [who, again, is now an FMSF advisory board member] should have known whether Patty was brainwashed, since as the head of the office of the Naval Research's Committee on Hypnosis, he helped develop coercive use of hypnotic mind control for the Cryptocracy.

According to the author, the "Cryptocracy" refers to all the clandestine forces involved in conspiracy and cover-up around these, and other, projects. Projects that may still be alive, well, and even gaining steam these days — all over the world.

Note: At the second International Council on Cultism and Ritual Trauma in Dallas, Texas, in April 1996, there was a small contingent of these government mind-control subjects. They are not only starting to recover. They are starting to unite. Also, in an attempt to speak out, one woman from Canada, for instance, had recently started the newsletter The Stone Angels Journal.

WORLD CONSPIRACY

John Smith, Ph.D. (pseudonym for safety reasons), has worked extensively with ritual abuse cases, including numerous consultations across the country. He is an expert at reversing cult programming. And he said many of the cases he's worked on have included any number of the same types of advanced programming discussed in the last chapter.

What's more, Smith — as with others — is also seeing the emergence of a scary cult global agenda.

While emphasizing this is only theory, based on his work with some cult survivors, and supplemented with information from the nationwide consults, the following is what Smith said he has been able to piece together.

He too said some of these cult survivors have been turned into conditioned operatives to be used as, in essence, dissociative pawns for drug dealing, prostitution, weapon sales, assassinations... He used the metaphor of an army of worker ants who are being controlled by "megalomaniacs" who, ultimately, want total power and world domination.

Many cult survivors, and others in diverse research areas around the world have independently stated that the international leadership of the cult is called: the "Illuminati."

Author Gary Kah, a once high-ranking government liaison, also believes in the world takeover scenario being orchestrated by the Illuminati. In his book En Route to Global Occupation, Kah describes the Illuminati as a "secret society" founded as a Freemason-inspired group in 1776. Kah goes on to write:

> John Robinson, an eighteenth century historian and a prominent Mason, was entrusted with some of the original documents and correspondence of the Illuminati. In his book, Proofs of a Conspiracy, written in 1798, he produced major segments of the Illuminati's original writings. Robinson stated: "The express aim of the Order [Illuminati] was to abolish Christianity, and over turn all civil government."

(Kah then goes on to write about how he believes the plan for a "New World Order" has evolved out of the Illuminati plan.)

It is a plan, it seems, that has been experimented with before. William Schnoebelen, author of Masonry (Beyond The Light), said the Illuminati was the brainchild of Adam Weishaupt, who was intent on creating a reign of genius "Philosopher Kings." (When Weishaupt started the group in 1776 he was a professor at the University of Ingolstadt in Bavaria and originally called it: "The Ancient and Illuminated Seers of Bavaria" (AISB)). As Kah notes, Schnoebelen said Weishaupt, in effect, created a secret order within the Masons. (That is, a secret order within a secret order.)

Weishaupt also, said Schnoebelen, believed in fostering controlled chaos necessary for revolution to bring about the installation of these "Philosopher Kings." (The French Revolution and the Reign of Terror were typical of Weishaupt's plans.) Schnoebelen writes:

> Had God not intervened, all of Europe might well have gone the way of France and the then coming "Terror." Weishaupt's infiltration of Masonry might have been complete had not an AISB courier been blown off his horse and killed by a lightening stroke in 1785. The courier was carrying papers written in the cipher of Illuminism, and dealt with the plans of AISB to subvert the Masons and governments of Europe.

After this, the Illuminati was broken up by police and went underground where, Schnoebelen, and many others believe, the infiltration of Masonry and governments continued on a highly covert level, always with the same goal. World takeover.

Schnoebelen said Weishaupt believed societies cycled through five phases, and if the phases were manipulated properly, it could become the platform to springboard the "Philosopher Kings" into control.

1) Chaos. The starting point for all societies.

2) Discord. There is discord because a ruling class has emerged and the "average people" resent the imposition of authority.

3) Confusion. An attempt to restore balance between the two groups fails.

4) Bureaucracy. In this phase, everything must be obsessively tracked so it doesn't get out of control as in phase 3. In this, the ruling bureaucracy primarily becomes "god." People can't internally deal with the spiritual void this creates, and escape into fantasy, drugs and madness. During this phase, the destruction of the middle class also occurs creating an economic crisis.

5) Aftermath. This, Weishaupt taught, was the implosion of society — a reversion to chaos where the bureaucracy crashes under its own red tape and things whirl out of control.

With the masses groping for order, the climate becomes perfect to usher in the "Philosopher Kings."

Schnoebelen said he believes our society is well into stage four at this point. (It's escaped into huge amounts of addictive and compulsive behavior, into the fantasy of an all-consuming entertainment industry, and so on.) And Schnoebelen said he believes, as Weishaupt tried, the modern-day Illuminati is positioning itself for a takeover as society implodes and reverts to chaos.

(Schnoebelen, who is a former 32nd-degree Mason, said he believes the majority of Masons don't even know about the inner circle of the Illuminati or their plans. However, in joining the Masons, Schnoebelen said he believes these lower-level members spiritually open themselves to the demonic roaming the inner bowels of the organization. And with those doors open, the demonic then turns these members into naive pawns who are preparing the ground, so to speak, on the surface of society, for these "Kings" and their anti-christ philosophies. That is: glorifying materialism, establishing counterfeit spiritual systems, creating dysfunctional family systems that tear at the very fabric of society...)

COMING CHAOS

Schnoebelen also said the destabilization in stage four of our current society is being ratcheted up markedly at this point, heading toward implosion. And behind the scenes, legions of children are being groomed to become compliant, multiple personality tools for the Illuminati elite as they shape the New World Order. It will be a "perfect" race of people. That is, said Schnoebelen, a perfectly (demonically) possessed race of people.

"It's as if Satan is being a diamond cutter," said Schnoebelen.

Schnoebelen also said he believes the societal implosion will ultimately come about through things like financial and/or environmental crisis.

Brice Taylor (pseudonym), author of Starshine, reports she's had firsthand experience with these contemporary "Philosopher Kings." What's more, not only are they riding societal tide, according to Taylor, they are orchestrating most every aspect of it in the most sophisticated and clandestine ways.

Taylor, like Kathleen H., reports being a top-level mind-control operative. She also said she was exposed to some of the highest levels of the takeover plot. However, she said she broke away and through extensive recovery work and intense deprogramming, has been able to piece together some of the key components of the plot.

As a youth, Taylor was traumatized in satanic rituals which turned her into a "complex multiple." During this time, she was also used in child pornography.

Just prior to her teens, her father hooked her up with a grandfather who was the mayor of a Midwestern town. Over time, she was prostituted into higher and higher political circles, including liaisons with United States presidents. (Her alter personalities were highly trained and included photographic memory.)

She said she was subsequently enlisted by an "elite circle." She said this small group of men were the ones at the heart of the takeover move. She said these people would orchestrate wars, secretly control world banking, manipulate the media, and were systematically enlisting one country leader after another. And for those that wouldn't go along with the plan for a New World Order, the inner circle would go to great measures, said Taylor, to manipulate or destroy them.

Through varying channels, for instance, Taylor said she would be prostituted to some of these leaders. She said she was programmed to learn about the leader's secret sexual fantasies, drug habits, and so on. Then scenarios would be set up to bring the leader down, or for blackmail purposes.

Taylor said the inner circle was very calculating, very thorough.

Also behind the scenes, Taylor said there is ongoing work to build an "Aryan race" of mind-control slaves that even includes genetic engineering to create what they believe are physically and intellectually superior people — just like the Nazis were trying 50 years ago.

Taylor explained a key component in the takeover will be the orchestration of a financial collapse of the United States, which is slated for the very near future. She said it will make the depression of the early part of this century seem minor. The plan, Taylor said, is for a "World Government" to then come to the rescue. (Taylor, and many others tracking the evolving New World Order at this point, recommend getting out of debt and having property that will facilitate self-sufficiency and the possibility of community.)

In concert, global environmental disasters are to increase dramatically, wiping out masses of people. Some of the disasters, such as earthquakes, fires, floods, said Taylor, will also be orchestrated by this inner circle who, apparently, has the technology to effect natural disasters on a wide scale — to help wipe out people they believe are inferior and will be a drain on the new world.

(There are reports, for instance, of current government experimentation with electro-magnetic beams to knock out communication systems and change weather patterns over enemy countries. Preliminary reports on prototype testing indicate these beams could alter weather with the injection of huge amounts of heat beams into the ionosphere, creating, in effect, the equivalent of mini-super-charged El Ninos. In essence, droughts could be orchestrated in some areas, torrential rains in others, and so on.)

Taylor said many of the "worker bees" so to speak, that is, the people doing the research at government installations, in research laboratories at universities, and so on, aren't aware of the "big picture," as far as how some of their work is really intended to be used — including, in some cases, on them. (Just as many of the "average" Masons don't understand the bigger picture.)

The takeover crescendo may include another element that may add even more to the "chaos." Smith said he knows of several dozen cult survivors who report being programmed to assassinate politicians, newspaper publishers, priests... around the same time.

"I'll get a phone call. There will be a tone and codes will be given, indicating my (assassination) assignment. I'm then to flee to a meeting place in Canada." Smith used this as a typical example of some of the reports he's getting from operatives.

In the resulting chaos, it is highly feasible the masses will be groping for leadership, any type of leadership.

MORE VALIDATION

Dr. Judianne Densen-Gerber also said she believes there is credence to what Smith describes. Densen-Gerber, mentioned earlier, is a psychiatrist, lawyer and founder of P.A.C.T. (Protect America's Children Today).

Based on discussions with colleagues and cult survivors, Densen-Gerber said she's heard a significant number of stories of ritual abuse survivors that have also been programmed to act out in Manchurian-Candidate-type assassin style — to create this total planetary chaos "...prior to the installation of the anti-christ," she said.

A Texas cult deprogrammer said he is starting to find at the deeper levels of cult assassin programming that there are, in effect, internal computers programmed into the psyche with series of names, dates, and so on, relating to the assassination targets.

In regard to this sophisticated deeper-level programming, he said: "It helps to think of the complex programming layers like a very sophisticated Super Mario Nintendo game. There are many levels, secrets at each level, and, hazards to getting to them."

Note: Sometimes for cult survivors, depending on the sophistication of the cult, these deeper levels of programming can be highly complex. For instance, a programmer instructs a victim alter he was turning into an assassin, that he was implanting a computer system in the victim's psyche, and then would "load" a series of names, dates, and locations relating to each assassination target. And just like we need to know, say, our user password, the software program name, like WordPerfect, and the name of the document, to get to the data in a computer; so it is with some of these cult-programmed assassins. And, only the programmer, select cult people, and the assassin personality know the codes.

What's more, the Texas deprogrammer who travels the country consulting on ritual abuse cases, said a number of survivors have gotten to extremely deep levels where, not only are these internal computers being revealed, but information is surfacing that there are "external" computers as well.

The deprogrammer said a number of survivors around the country that are getting to the deepest levels of some ultra-sophisticated programming are also reporting there are main computers in Washington, D.C., and Colorado, that have lists of all the cult operatives that have been programmed, what their access codes are, the types of jobs they've been programmed to do... The information might also be available to cult zone leaders, etc., over a cult computer "internet" system of sorts.

He also said, according to survivor report data he's gathered, cult people have already been installed in key leadership positions around the globe. And others are being groomed to take over even more positions. In addition, he too has heard that other key leaders will be assassinated in the future.

Dr. Densen-Gerber, Gary Kah, and many others, believe we've graphically moved into the "end times" talked about in the Bible's Book of Revelation and that this scenario is matching up with some of what is predicted there.

TAKEOVER STRATEGIES

Doug Riggs was also at the seminar in Richmond. Riggs is the pastor of Morning Star Testimony Church in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Since 1990, he reports having counseled with an astonishing 14 people in his congregation who have been conditioned with this ultra-high-level programming. It's his belief, these people were programmed and sent to this geographic area, as other clusters of operatives may have been sent to other areas. The participation in the church, on one level, was merely part of the front.

From the information he's gleaned so far, Riggs too said he believes the world takeover scenario is not only in progress, but in its last phases. "The mystery isn't really the takeover," said Riggs. "That's written about [in Revelation]. The real mystery has been how is it being done."

Riggs also believes the Illuminati has ruling "masters" who are orchestrating the plan. And Riggs said he believes these ruling masters are actually a rung below a globally renowned family, who controls a large portion of international banking.

Riggs said this control has, apparently, been one of the key elements in the evolving takeover. Many governments are in debt to international bankers. And through this debt, banking institutions, theoretically, would control and dictate certain aspects of politics — thus covertly setting the stage for what is to come. For example, some of the Illuminati may have already been placed in key government positions, and others are waiting in the wings, said Riggs.

Riggs said he was able to access the information about this renowned family, the Illuminati, and so on, through alter personalities that have been programmed into some of the people he's been working with. He, too, said he has learned, according to survivor reports, there is a network of programmed assassins and other "agents" throughout the world that are part of the takeover plot.

He said he has learned, from survivors, some highly skilled neurologists and other programmers have reportedly been used to build these complex alter personality systems into these operatives.

Riggs also believes that some of this is being carried out by "demonic intelligence," which is highly evolved and could account for the high degree of sophistication — and one of the reasons it has all been kept as covert as it has for so long. However, Riggs believes God is now allowing it to be exposed.

He gave a brief example of how he believes these demonic dynamics play an extremely significant part.

That is, as mentioned before, as the person is being tortured, say through electro-shock, they dissociate. And in this state, alter personalities are programmed in by the perpetrators. What's more, the perpetrators will sometimes also perform rituals to channel demons into the victim. These demons will attach to the cult-created alter personalities. The demonic influence, Riggs said he believes, works to sabotage the recovery process and keep the deep levels of programming secret. Demons are also reportedly capable of highly advanced telepathy, astral projection (being able to travel through space at a highly accelerated pace), and so on. The demonic influence, said Riggs, is like adding another exponent to the sophistication of the programming.

Riggs said he believes satan is setting up the core of his takeover, the core of his earthly kingdom, through this process. That is, through a "legion" of people, who at the core of their being, are demonically possessed and will automatically respond to any "dark-side" based command (cue).

INTERVENTION

Given all this sophistication, Riggs nevertheless said he has been extremely effective (survivor by survivor) in exposing the levels of programming — and reversing it. (He is quick to point out, he has been effective under God's guidance.) He said as more and more helping professionals become familiar with the protocol of effecting all this — it will have a major impact on the takeover plot. That is, according to Riggs' spiritual beliefs, if you can get the demons out and have the "dark-side" alters convert, "...you cut off communication from the cult (both on spiritual and/or para-normal planes)." That is, the cult will, for instance, sometimes use mental telepathy to relay a message, cue a program, etc. (Things like para-normal abilities, such as telepathy, have also been demonstrated in studies at Duke University.)

Note: In addition, often much solid psychological deprogramming and other recovery work must be done to shut down the old system, and help the survivor heal completely.

Riggs reiterated, it is important to understand how the "dark-side" kingdom is being set up, person by person. It is also imperative their authority structure is understood; how they network, and so on.

And as this continues to be revealed and reversed, person by person, a significant dent will be made, weakening and limiting the impact and overall scope of the plan. "Undoing the programming is a big threat to them [the Illuminati]," said Riggs.

Riggs said he has watched the intensification of evil grow stronger and stronger as we've approached the end of this century. And he said he couldn't think of anything more heinous, or evil, than all but taking away the very core of an individual, reprogramming it, and infesting it with demons.

But despite all that, Riggs said he has watched amazed as God has worked to start to turn the situation around, again, person by person.

VORTEX OF EVIL

At Richmond, I also met a psychotherapist from Dallas, Texas, who heard there would be a "dark-side" intended convergence on Atlanta in 1996. Linda Marten, Ph.D., has a private practice, and has facilitated a number of MP/ritual abuse groups at three Dallas area hospitals.

She had recently been called in to consult on a ritual abuse case. The survivor reported she had also been a cult trainer and programmer. At one point, the woman told Marten some of the top echelon of the cult would be coming from all over the world to meet at the Olympics in Atlanta in 1996. These would be the elite, "...most given over to [demonic] spirits," she said.

The former cult member went on to tell Marten these people would begin to pray intensely the first day of the Olympics to create a "vortex" to allow the evil spirits to flood into the earth. The intention, said the woman, is to get as many dark-side spiritual forces as possible to help in the final phase of the takeover plan.

Marten said she was initially skeptical about the information. However, several weeks after hearing about it, she received a copy of the Christian-oriented Morning Star Prophetic Bulletin out of Charlotte, North Carolina. She said one of the stories included a prophecy there was a strong battle raging in the spiritual dimensions. A battle that was being accelerated. What's more, the prophecy included there would be a convergence of evil in Atlanta in 1996, and it was important for Christians to also go to Atlanta to pray at that time as well.

"The synchronicity was spooky," said Marten, referring to having just heard a similar thing from the cult survivor. Marten said she now believes something is going to happen in Atlanta, and God is starting to alert people "...even if not everyone even knows exactly what they are getting ready for yet."

Note: This "vortex" (portal) phenomenon isn't without satanic precedent. In the book Objective Evil: Satanic Cults in U.S. Intelligence, it is reported Westphalia, Germany was the site of prayer and black magic rituals by the Nazi SS. They, too, were trying to channel as many demons as possible through a portal there to help them with their takeover plans. Commandant Henrich Himmler believed Westphalia to be the geographic center of the world and the point where the greatest evil was concentrated.

END TIMES

The "end times" topic is getting a substantial amount of notice of late. Bible scholars, researchers, authors... are pointing to current global occurrences as indications we have, indeed, moved well into the end times. And a graphic example researchers point to is a Bible passage from the Book of Revelation. (Again, the Book of Revelation contains prophecy about the end times.) Revelation 8:10, 11:

> A huge star burning like a torch crashed down from the sky... the star's name was Wormwood.

The Ukrainian translation for Wormwood is: Chernobyl.

Besides the Book of Revelation, there are numerous other references throughout the Bible to the end times. On the Mount of Olives, Jesus' disciples asked Him about the signs that would precede His Second Coming and the "end of the age." Matthew 24:4-7, 12:

> Jesus answered: "Watch out that no one deceives you. For many will come in my name claiming 'I am the Christ,' and will deceive many. You will hear of wars, and rumors of war, but see to it you are not alarmed. Such things must happen, but the end is still to come. Nation will rise against nation, kingdom against kingdom. There will be famines and earthquakes in various places... Because of the increase of wickedness, the love of most will grow cold."

Besides earthquakes and famines, in other places the Bible predicts the end times will also see dramatic fires, floods and plagues.

There has been dramatic flooding in Europe and the United States the last several years, massive earthquakes in Mexico, Italy, Russia, Japan; fires raging in America's West, in Australia; widespread famine in Africa, India; and diseases like cancer and AIDS are sweeping through the world population. And, for instance, in 1993 there were 73 "hot spots" around the globe. Places where there was war, or the imminent threat of war.

In another section in the Bible's Book of Matthew (24:32, 33), Jesus said:

> Now learn this lesson from the fig tree: as soon as its twigs get tender and its leaves come out, you know that summer is near. Even so, when you see all these things, you know that it [Jesus' Second Coming] is near, right at the door.

Many believe the Second Coming is "right at the door." (Jesus' Second Coming marks the beginning of a "thousand years" of peace, according to Revelation.) Bookstores are filling with end-time literature. Front pages of newspapers around the world often read like pages from the Book of Revelation.

Numerous circles are urgently postulating about the particulars of how the end-time scenario plays itself out. Some, for instance, see the approaching "New World Order" as the camouflaged, end-time, one-world anti-christ system referred to in the Bible. Many also believe the "mark of the Beast," which the Bible prophesies is needed to participate in this system, may be a "smart card," or biochip implanted in the hand or forehead.

And the climax of this era might include some version of an attempt at a "physical" takeover. A lot of indicators emerging in the ritual abuse field seem to point toward a calculated and sophisticated orchestration of this.

However, it seems many are transfixed on looking to the future in all this... when dramatic lifestyle decisions might well be called for now.

ANTI-CHRIST SYSTEM ALREADY HERE

In my own research, one of the main things I've come to is, while many have their eyes trained on the underground workings of the physical takeover, the above-ground evolution of the "New World Order," and so on, what many aren't seeing is satan's one-world system(s) has already evolved and is "marking" people now.

I once heard a minister in southern California give the talk: "The Last International Sign Before Armageddon." He alluded to the Book of Revelation 16:13: "Then I saw three evil spirits that looked like frogs; they came out of the mouth of the dragon, out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet." The minister said he saw these frogs/evil spirits as symbolic of the anti-christ systems that have been put into place. And the frogs coming out in the open, as relayed in the passage, is when people will finally see the systems for what they really are.

In the book To the Priests (Our Lady's Beloved Sons), Fr. Don Stefano Gobbi reports the Virgin Mary, through interior locution to him, has confirmed we are into the "end times." What's more, she explained the Red Dragon (of Revelation) is Marxist Communism. The Black Beast (with seven heads, according to Revelation) is Freemasonry, Mary said. (And there are seven Masonic Lodges around the world, she continued, conspiring to subtly and diabolically weave their satanic philosophy into all of society.)

Satan, through Freemasonry, is using such mediums as dysfunctional family systems, media/entertainment systems, school systems, systems based on glorifying materialism, counterfeit spiritual systems. It is also reported Mary said: "...behind the perverse action of Freemasonry, there are being spread everywhere black masses and the satanic cult."

Fr. Gobbi also reports Mary, again, said people are already being signed with what Revelation refers to as the "mark of the Beast." According to Revelation, that mark is imprinted on the forehead and hand. According to Mary, the forehead indicates the intellect; and the hand expresses human activity. Those marked on the forehead, she said, are led to accept the doctrine of denial of God, rejection of His Law, atheism. Those with the mark on their hand act autonomous of God, ordering their activities in a quest for purely material or terrestrial good.

Besides the seven-headed Beast, there is another Beast of Revelation which has on its head "...two horns like those of a lamb." The high priest of the Old Testament wore a headpiece with two horns. The bishops of the Catholic Church wear the mitre — with two horns — to indicate the fullness of their priesthood, said Mary.

It is reported Mary said the Beast with the two horns like a lamb indicates Freemasonry infiltrated into the interior of the church — ecclesiastical Masonry. "If the task of Masonry is to lead souls to perdition bringing them to the worship of false divinities, the task of ecclesiastical Masonry on the other hand is that of destroying Christ and His Church, building a new idol, namely a false Christ and a false Church.

"The Church instituted by Christ is one, and one alone: it is the one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church, founded on Peter..." "Ecclesiastical Masonry," it is reported Mary said, "seeks to destroy this reality through false ecumenism, which leads to the acceptance of all Christian churches, asserting that each one of them has some part of the truth. It develops that plan of founding a universal ecumenical church, formed by the fusion of all the Christian confessions, among which, the Catholic Church." (That is, the Masons have clandestinely woven their way into the Catholic Church as well, dividing it internally between those holding onto the true faith, and those that have been misled by false doctrine.)

Now, all these systems, whether dysfunctional family systems, media/entertainment systems, materialistic systems, counterfeit spiritual systems... appear pretty easy to see at this point. That is, easy to see unless one has been gradually desensitized. Noted author Malcolm Muggeridge uses an excellent metaphor for this desensitization which, wouldn't you know, has to do with frogs.

"You put frogs in some water and you heat the water very slowly, so slowly that the frogs never once think of jumping out. They just quietly die once the water boils. That is what our Western society is like, very gently being boiled. Therefore, the impulse to jump out and save ourselves is inoperative."

It would seem, given all this, we need to be praying in major ways for God to give us the grace to see the systems clearly, and then the grace to get out of them — one day at a time.

And the starting to "jump out," for instance, would be things like if you're caught up in dysfunctional family system behavior, get into some counseling, some 12 Step groups, other forms of recovery. It would mean starting to turn the TV off, for instance, and spending much more time in prayer, reading the Bible... It would mean starting to get off the materialism merry-go-round, and learning to live much more simply and charitably. It would mean getting this "end-time" message to others. And soon. According to Mary, time is extremely, extremely, short.

CONCLUSION

This book demonstrates satanic ritual abuse does exist. We have bodies now, confessions, cult members on death row... What's more, there are now links to indicate the cults are quite structured, networked, and apparently indoctrinating a good number of people. There also seem to be overlaps between highly clandestine government mind-control technology and cult programming. And, has anyone noticed a suggestion of a cover-up?

When I look back at this book, the Akron, Ohio scenario stands out: A cult survivor frantically trying to get someone to believe her, maps out the way to a secluded ritual site. A tenacious investigator treks far back into the woods. He finds a triangular site, a fire pit, a tree with satanic markings...

His comment after matching what he saw at the site with the survivor's explanation of rituals there: "Something happened."

And, just as the woman in Akron was so frantically trying to get the message across, so too are scores of courageous ritual abuse survivors around the planet. What's more, they are not only saying: "Something happened." They are also saying: "Something is still happening."

They are trying desperately to sound the alarm so that other innocent victims don't have to feel the cold steel of a knife slashing across their neck. And beyond, some are trying to warn about much more than just the macabre late-night ceremonies. They are risking their lives talking about who some of these "respectable-looking" cult members are, where they are placed in society, and what their overall agenda appears to be.

DENIAL

As with much of the initial stories about the Holocaust; the simply horrific stories coming out about the killing fields of Cambodia's Pou Pot regime... this is all quite hard to hear, and jolts our, what Matthew (Chapter 4) terms: "epistemological boundaries." That is, many people have boundaries around how much realization of evil, or level of horror, they are able to let into their conscious mind. And, says Matthew, satanic ritual abuse and all of its implications, punctures too big a hole in how most of the general populace views society. So, most of society goes into the first phase of sort of a collective global grief process — denial.

The denial then sparks an inevitable backlash. A "kill-the-messenger" mentality. Dedicated, highly skilled therapists and social service workers are labelled as quacks, rumor mongers, and so on. Survivor stories, even in the midst of surfacing hard evidence, are labelled "patently false," delusional.

And isn't it more than a little bit curious the FBI, the organization that said the Mafia didn't exist, would be so quick to come out with something as influential as a sweeping "Law Enforcement Perspective" debunking this, and serving to discourage local law enforcement from following up on ritual aspects of a crime?

Speaking of government agencies, how much of a stretch is it to believe that factions of an agency like the CIA, which has injected babies with radiation and literally, and unconscionably, wiped out people's minds, might be tied to these underworld groups? Particularly since some of the type of sophisticated mind-control technology they use is reportedly showing up in these groups — groups that might include the likes of the Satanic Hierarchy, the Order of the Golden Dawn, the Illuminati.

Note: Just today as I'm writing this, there is a wire service report indicating part of the Cold War era radiation experiments may have included "total-body radiation" tests on war veterans.

Akron detective Kasarda found a triangle made of intertwined vines. I've got to believe, on one level that will prove quite symbolic. That is, these sadistic hate groups, dark government factions, and so on, may well be intimately intertwined. And their agenda may well be world control. And, just as the Ohio site was so well hidden, so, it seems, has the overall cult plan been — whether hidden in cult members' attics late at night, in government sub-basements, or even a couple layers into the subconscious of cult operatives.

Granted, this is all quite scary to let sink in. And even scarier, when thinking about doing something about it. But do something about it, we must. And we've had some excellent models.

One good thing about the backlash, said Monarch Resources' Maureen Brugh, "...it makes you fight even harder to get the truth out."

FIGHTING BACK

While I talk disparagingly about some media, that's not all the media, by any means. Among some reporters, as there always has been, there is a gutsy, tenacious drive to get to the real truth. (The Washington Post's reporters Woodward and Bernstein's undaunting efforts to expose Watergate, for instance.) Some of this subject's modern "Woodwards and Bernsteins" have included investigative journalists Maury Terry, Michael Newton and Roy Blake... who have all taken substantial risks in trying to dig up the truth. The painstaking work of former Senator DeCamp in trying to expose the Nebraska affair and law professor Alan Scheflin's work in trying to expose CIA wrongdoings should also be commended.

Meanwhile, Detective Kasarda, John Hunt, Dale Griffis, Jerry Simandl... still exhaustively follow up on every possible ritual clue, often on their own time, trying to expose this. Despite death threats, California ritual crime investigator Randy Cerny relentlessly pursues a highly dangerous satanic cult. In Canada, an expert team of police and social workers expose a sexual/ritual abuse ring that is staggering in its size. (And how many more similar rings would be exposed if professionals had the time and a green light?) A family in Texas, at great risk to themselves, opens their home to a woman and her daughter breaking away from a cult in Oklahoma. (This becomes the genesis of an organization to sponsor cult safe-houses.) Therapists across the country are threatened, poisoned, faced with waves of public skepticism... yet press on in trying to help ritual abuse survivors, some of the most hurting people on the planet, heal.

And despite the code-of-silence programming, the intense fear, the public backlash... some of these survivors still struggle with everything they have inside them to go back into a past Stephen King would have a hard time with, to uncover secrets that are not only key to their healing — but secrets that may be key to all of our futures.

THEY NEED HELP

Those on the front lines of all this need help. A lot of help. They need prayer, they need moral support. They need volunteer help. They need financial support. And they need it now. There are all kinds of organizations listed in the appendix. Please pick one, and help them.

What's more, we need to keep collectively coming together to form communities to fight back. Ministers, educators, therapists, police, civic organizations, the general public... need to come together to take a stand, the way they've done, for instance, with task forces in L.A., Minnesota, Michigan. (The evolution of the National Ritual Abuse Awareness Coalition is also an optimistic sign.) It is only in a united effort that there will be significant success.

And again, it is important to note, a measure of success is already coming person by person. Each time another cult survivor breaks away, gets into recovery, and starts to break the programming, a few more bricks in the cult's wall fall down, and a little more of the overall plan is exposed and dismantled.

"KIDS IN PERIL"

All this might be doubly hard given some of the prevailing social climate around us. I recently gave a presentation at a national "Trauma Resolution" conference in Arizona. The day of the talk, the Arizona Daily Star carried the following headline: "Kids In Peril: Latest Movie Shock Tactic." The following is an excerpt from the article:

> It takes a lot to give sophisticated audiences that thrill of fear and loathing, that sensation of hitting > the wall of one's own tolerance. Carnage, the degradation of women, machine gun blasts of foul language have had their day. Now Hollywood has latched onto something that still has the power to jolt even the most jaded movie-goer — putting children in peril.

> ...The idea behind a shock, after all, is to take something beloved and then fold, spindle and mutilate it.

And, with the proven success of Jurassic Park; The Hand That Rocks the Cradle... we are, most likely, about to see waves of such cinema.

TIDAL WAVE

There are a number of indications the climax to the physical world takeover is building at a tremendous rate.

And, as serendipity I believe would have it, as I was first leafing through the May 1994 Discover Magazine, looking for the article on memory, I came across another article. The first page showed an aerial view of some of the world continent coastlines and the massive Pacific Ocean looming in the middle. Overlaid was the headline: "Waves of Destruction." The first two sentences: "Tsunamis have always been mysterious monsters [Remember that word?] — mountain-size waves that race invisibly across the ocean at 500 mph, drain harbors in a single gulp, and destroy coastal communities without warning. But now some researchers are trying to take the mystery away..."

A tsunami (tidal wave) is usually caused by an earthquake out in the ocean. A vast swell of water which may cover up to 10,000 square miles, collapses. Then, according to the article, there are alternating swells and collapses which ultimately create the tidal wave.

> On the open sea a tsunami might be only 10 feet high, while its wavelength — the distance from > one tsunami crest to another — can be up to 600 miles... Normal surface waves hide tsunami. But that placid surface belies the power surging through the water.

The massive tower of water will eventually burst onto land at "freeway speeds" destroying everything in sight.

I personally believe somewhere hidden in the depths of society (in some men's and women's souls) something gave way throwing everything off-balance. Morals collapsed, and the alternating swells of evil keep increasing in pressure as this monster wave (physical world takeover) keeps getting bigger and bigger below the surface, moving swiftly inland. Right now some can only see the top ten feet, and even that is hidden among other societal waves at this point — urban violence, broken families, drug abuse, poverty, wars...

However, when this final phase of the physical world takeover wave hits the mainland, the devastation will be tremendous.

Seismologists say there is no way to prevent a tsunami, but there are now early-warning tsunami sensing devices placed in strategic places far out in the ocean floor — so people will have a brief time to prepare.

The final takeover phase sensing devices, I believe, are these emerging cult survivors, who are exposing different parts of the takeover plan.

As the tsunami sensors lie at the depths of the ocean floor, some of the world takeover sensors lie at the bottom of these programmed layers, in the depths of some of these survivors' unconscious minds.

We need to listen. We need to prepare.

PLAY ME BACKWARDS

You don't have to play me backwards
To get the meaning of my verse
You don't have to die and go to Hell
To feel the devil's curse

Well I thought my life was a photograph
On the family Christmas card
Kids all dressed in buttons and bows
And lined up in the yard
Were the golden days of childhood
So lyrical and warm
Or did the picture start to fade
On the day that I was born

I've seen them light the candles
I've heard them bang the drums
And I've cried Mama Mama I'm as cold as ice
And I got no place to run

Let the night begin, there's a pop of skin
And a sudden rush of scarlet
There's a little boy riding on a goat's head
And a little girl playing the harlot
There's a sacrifice in an empty church
Of sweet Li'l Baby Rose
And a man in a mask from Mexico
Is peeling off my clothes

I've seen them light the candles
I've heard them bang the drums
And I've cried Mama Mama I'm as cold as ice
And I got no place to run

So I'm paying for protection
Smoking out the truth
Chasing recollections
Nailing down the proof

You don't have to play me backwards
To get the meaning of my verse
You don't have to die and go to Hell
To feel the devil's curse
I'll stand before the altar
And tell everything I know
I've come to claim my childhood
At the Chapel of Baby Rose

I've seen them light the candles...

RESOURCES

Resources for ritual abuse survivors have grown tremendously in the last several years. California-based Monarch Resources, which has provided some of the following data, typifies the growth. A non-profit organization founded in 1988 by lecturer/abuse survivor advocate Maureen Brugh, Monarch now receives thousands of calls a year related to topics of ritual abuse.

Monarch is an informal clearing house that provides resources and information (bibliographies, listings of newsletters, hotlines, support groups, referrals...) for each of four interest areas: childhood sexual abuse and incest, ritual abuse, multiple personality/ dissociation; and for pro-survivors. It also publishes a quarterly calendar of events and conferences, and offers a speakers bureau and conference planning service.

Contact Monarch Resources at P.O. Box 1293, Torrance, California 90505-0293, or call: 310-373-1958.

This Present Darkness: Live!
(A Case Study)

by Daniel and Liz Ryder

This is the story of a real town you'd swear Frank Peretti had in mind when he wrote: This Present Darkness. It is also the story of how some Christians in Alaska are banding together to take their town back for Jesus in the midst of what's shaping up to be a dramatic revival. What's more, God is urgently calling people to deeper levels of revival in their ongoing spiritual work, addictions, emotional recovery, social consciousness, and environmental concern.

It is becoming clear that all over the world there is version after version of the prophetically inspired town Peretti wrote about. And with the end times upon us, battle lines are rapidly being drawn in these places. Is your town one of them? If so, the booklet contains tried information for strategies you can use to take back your town, and yourselves, for Jesus.

DANIEL and LIZ RYDER started Ryder Ministries in 1994. Daniel is also the author of the groundbreaking Breaking The Circle Of Satanic Ritual Abuse (Recognizing And Recovering From The Hidden Trauma), and the more recent Cover-up Of The Century (Satanic Ritual Crime And World Conspiracy). The name "Ryder" is a pseudonym.

As always, to Scott Douglas de Hart:
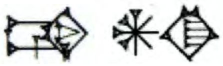
You are a true



For all the shared bowls and walks and talks and so many brilliant insights in so many conversations through the years,
Anything I could say, any gratitude I could express, are simply inadequate.

To George Ann Hughes:
Dear and good friend:
You are a constant encouragement; thank you, but again, it seems so inadequate.

To D.R.J.:
Good friend, who has seen the full implications of the Metaphor, and given numerous and priceless insights:
Thank you is, in your case as well, inadequate.

To My friends D.E.C. & B.J.K.:
I'm proud of you!

To all the other "extended Inklings" out there:
Many thanks for continued and consistent friendship through the years.

And to Tracy S. Fisher, who with love and gentle prodding encouraged me to write:
You are, and will always be, sorely missed

“ ...(We) can readily understand why the power elite of America has no ideology and feels the need of none, why its rule is naked of ideas, its manipulation without attempted justification. It is this mindlessness of the powerful that is the true higher immorality of our time; for, with it, there is associated the organized irresponsibility that is today the most important characteristic of the American system of corporate power.”

C. Wright Mills, The Power Elite (Oxford, 1956), p. 342.

“ ...(When) men of knowledge do come to a point of contact with the circles of powerful men, they come not as peers but as hired men.”

C. Wright Mills, The Power Elite, p. 351.

PREFACE:
THE MATRIX OF A BREAKAWAY CIVILIZATION:
GEOPOLITICS, NATIONAL SECURITY, NUCLEAR WEAPONS, COVERT OPERATIONS, SPACE, AND UFOS

"It is mandatory to Flash-report Fort Meade on all intercepted foreign-government signals intelligence that pertains to unidentified flying objects; and these installations are required to track and Flash-report on any signals or electronics intelligence that might have an extraterrestrial origin."
Howard Blum[1]

"U.S. historian Carl Oglesby sees the origin of much of the CIA's later sinister record in the alliances it forged almost immediately upon its birth, with the Gehlen/Vlassov organization and, through Operation Underworld, with the Lanksy crime syndicate: 'Everything after this (the Gehlen alliance), on top of Operation Underworld, was probably just a consequence of this merger. How can a naive, trusting, democratic republic give its secrets to crime and its innermost ear to the spirit of Central European fascism and expect not to see its Constitution polluted, its traditions abused, and its consciousness of the surrounding world manipulated ultimately out of all realistic shape.'"
Henrik Krüger and Carl Oglesby[2]

This book is about exactly what the title and sub-title say it's about: covert wars, breakaway civilizations, secret space programs, and psychological operations. But behind that rather blandly limiting list of concepts, lurks a hidden jungle-overgrowth of a massive amount of details that are bizarre, bewildering, and pregnant with huge implications. Even a brief catalogue of these details is sufficient to portray just how bizarre, bewildering, and significant those details are, for in this book, you are going to read about concentration camp victims; con men and grifters; industrial scale Nazi counterfeiting; massive postwar financial fraud and hidden systems of finance; stolen computer software that tracks it all; Roman Catholic cardinal archbishops; banksters; secret agents; generals; the Mafia; the CIA; the Gestapo; Imperial Japan's Kempai Tei; bullion; precious gems; General Reinhard

In the predecessor volume to this sub-series of books, Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops, I stated that "This is not an 'exciting' book, but it is a necessary one."[3] This book, like its predecessor volume, is not an 'exciting book', but it is necessary. Unlike its predecessor, any objective view of the previous survey of its contents will also reveal this it is not only not an exciting book, not only a necessary book, but also a messy book.

Thus, by necessity, any author attempting to write a book proposing to deal with covert wars, breakaway civilizations, secret space programs, and "celestial psyops" is asking for trouble in spades, for consider just the scope of merely one of those terms: "covert wars". By definition, this term would have to include not only ordinary covert operations of all sorts—psychological operations, financial and economic warfare, cyber-warfare, assassinations and so on—being waged among various nations, but it would have to take into account how the concept of covert wars is modified and vastly expanded when considered in the context of Mr. Richard Dolan's idea of a "breakaway civilization", and a secret space program, of, perhaps, actual shooting wars being fought right under our noses by dint of technologies capable of manipulating "mother nature", and fought secretly, not only between nations, but between hidden groups, and perhaps between all of them and someone from "out there" (extraterrestrials) or "down there" (sub-terrestrials).

Consequently, and by another necessity, this Preface may be one of the longest prefaces in alternative research media history to a book that engages in nothing less than high octane speculation.

The inclusion of the components of (1) breakaway civilizations and (2) space adds dimensions to the problem not normally considered, such as covert operations between hidden factions, extra-territorial states and organizations, private syndicates such as the Mafia and so on, in addition to the sort of covert operations between nation states that one normally considers. Additionally, with space as a component for consideration, yet another new dimension is added, namely, that some of these covert wars and psyops are possibly being waged not only between humans both on earth and in space, but also between humans and non-humans, both in space and possibly here on earth as well.

Such sweeping considerations thus necessitate a primarily thematic, rather than chronological, methodology. In a certain sense, the case for a breakaway civilization is outlined here in the preface, the supporting "facts," or rather, perceived footprints and signatures of such an entity, are examined in the text. We are dealing, in the preface, with the skeleton, and in the main text, with the muscles and organs. It is for the individual reader to decide if this hideous creature is capable of standing and walking.

So what are the basic questions that need to be asked, and which we shall confront in this book?

Among them, are these:

1) Does a breakaway civilization actually exist?
2) What are its footprints? its signatures?
3) Why have a secret space program?
4) What is the size of the secret space program?
5) How far back do the secret space program and breakaway civilization go? And who might be involved?
6) How does one define a breakaway civilization?
7) How is it financed? What are the costs of its maintenance? How does one envision it finances its covert activities and technological developments?
8) Is there more than one such breakaway civilization and secret space program? Or are there competing and perhaps occasionally warring interests within one single entity?
9) Who is running it or them
10) Is this breakaway civilization in contact or conflict with UFOs?

A. Culture, Definitions, and Questions

1. Geopolitical, Strategic, and Technological Imperatives of the Culture of the Breakaway Civilization

a. The Culture of Secrecy, Covert Operations, and Their Implications

With these preliminary thoughts and questions in mind, it is now time to consider the concept of a breakaway civilization as others have envisioned it, and as I envision it here.

It is my contention that within the body of research into this signally important subject, there have been two discrete and distinct approaches, and that neither of these, taken alone, is a sufficient basis by which to comprehend the breakaway civilization and its activities. In short, it is my contention that if one approaches the subject (1) solely from the standpoint of its covert operations and its alignment to intelligence bureaucracies and the international criminal drug trade, or conversely, (2) solely from the standpoint of its technological research, black projects, space activities, or UFO interests, then one will not have a complete picture, for this breakaway civilization is engaged on both sides, and for reasons arising from its culture.

This culture was formed under the historical circumstances of the end of World War Two and the peculiar and tightly interwoven strategic, geopolitical, and technological imperatives that arose from it. The most obvious change to standard geopolitical and strategic planning was, of course, a technological one: the discovery of nuclear fission and the invention of the atomic bomb, and a few years later, the thermonuclear hydrogen bomb. This fact, plus the knowledge that inevitably the Soviet Union would acquire a similar capability, completely changed the nature of strategic calculation. It became necessary for the USA and the West to contrive the means to first contain, and then increasingly to engage, then to roll back, and ultimately to defeat, the Soviet Union, and thereby to impose its own unipolar hegemony and world view upon the globe. And it had to do this without resort to nuclear warfare if possible. It is from this geopolitical circumstance that the twin means of doing so—covert operations, and technological end-runs around nuclear weapons—arose, and with them, the bureaucratic imperatives to create a breakaway civilization.

These circumstances inevitably meant a turn toward covert operations and the use of proxies or cut-outs as a means of avoiding direct and potentially catastrophic confrontation, while simultaneously pursuing technologies that would do an end run around the nuclear problem, obsolescing, and eventually rendering nuclear weapons themselves, obsolete by the invention of even grander strategic weapons, weapons moreover that would not have "spillover" consequences on those using them.

This twin matrix of covert operations and covert research projects forms the more general matrix of the breakaway civilization, and from it, in turn, arose another profound, and early, development, for the marriage of covert operations and covert research also fueled the quest for weapons whose deployment itself could be covertly masked as acts of God, or of nature. To put this point even more succinctly: The covert operations mentality or "culture of plausible deniability" would seek a technological capacity to wage war against an enemy or its population undetectably and with plausible deniability. Thus, it would seek technologies liable to misinterpretation by their use, i.e., weather war, earthquakes, solar events and so on, or technologies able to directly modify the brain's interpretation of their use, including the eradication of the memory of their use, or of the subject's own use as a "Manchurian candidate."[4] In short, the technology itself, like covert operations, becomes a product of the culture of "plausible deniability."

This presents also another essential factor in the evaluation of the technological aspects of the breakaway civilization and its covert operations and research activities, for its terrestrial preoccupation—the containment, engagement, rollback and defeat of the Soviet Union—and its "extraterrestrial" one—the UFO phenomenon—necessitates that the greatest effort will be sought to obtain technologies of capable of the greatest utility in dealing with both perceived threats. In this regard one need only think of the utility of spy satellites both to reconnoiter Soviet ICBM sites and other activities, and to monitor and track potential UFO events and activities in nearby space. In other words, this dual matrix implies that both motivations were crucial factors in the development of spy satellites and other secret space program technologies at the outset, and that to explain their development solely from the motivation of monitoring terrestrial ICBM and other military activity is a convenient and to some extent diverting explanation for what the ultimate and deeper purpose may have been.

[4] While I do not deal directly in this book with mind control technologies, I do propose a vast extension of the idea for radically different purposes in chapter twelve.

This may be illustrated by the geopolitical context of the Cold War in which the culture of "threat assessment" and its associated technologies—the high altitude high speed reconnaissance airplane, the spy satellite, and the deep robotic space probe—grew. The last point—robotic space probes—may seem unrelated to the first two unless we take into consideration the culture of threat assessment. L. Parker Temple III, in his scholarly and well-documented history of space reconnaissance technologies, stated this need in relationship to the national security structure in this fashion:

> The year 1952 approached without much increase in the danger. The CIA issued a revised NIE 48,[5] "Likelihood of the Deliberate Initiation of Full-Scale War by the Soviet Union." Unlike the contradiction of its earlier estimate, it concluded that deliberate initiation of an offensive by the Soviets was unlikely in 1952. The estimate also stated the conditions under which the Soviets might initiate a conflict: either the Soviet leaders had to believe that a Western attack on the Soviet Union was imminent, or, an irreversible power shift to favor the West was occurring.
> Far ahead of projections, the Soviets detonated their first thermonuclear device on 12 August 1953, with a yield of 400 kilotons. Despite U.S. hydrogen bomb yields in the megatons by that time, the detonation served notice that the Soviets could produce an indigenous device…. The surprise was not quite another Pearl Harbor, but it underscored the U.S. need to have some means to learn what the Soviets were doing. Once more, Stalin's threat to surpass the United States came to mind. The Soviets were narrowing the gap; when would they overcome it?
> The situation, when the year of maximum danger of 1954 had finally arrived, was that the chairman of the Joint chiefs of Staff (JCS) favored a joint military command for air defense. The recognition of the need, however, seemed a bit late in the face of intelligence estimates that had warned of the danger of Soviet attack. The CIA had changed its assessment, saying the likelihood of general war was increasingly unlikely before 1958. The impact of the U.S. inability to see inside the Soviet Union was readily apparent. The need for reliable reconnaissance seemed to be more important as the predicted threat failed to materialize. Our estimates were wrong, but how wrong were they?[6]

[5] NIE: National intelligence Estimate, ed.

[6] L. Parker Temple III, Shades of Gray: National Security and the Evolution of Space Reconnaissance (American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics, Inc., 2005), pp. 7-8, emphasis added.

The advent of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons was the game-changer, for it became essential to estimate any potential capabilities of other nations, and to do so required the development of the appropriate technologies.

As will be seen in the main text, this issue was very early on coupled with the modern advent of the UFO, since these appeared in part to be responses to, or reconnoitering of, terrestrial nuclear capabilities, and thus, in the creation of the technologies and culture of threat assessment, what was true of U.S. responses to the Soviet Union's development was even more true—for both countries—of the UFO and the potentialities it represented.

Note that there are three factors involved and that each of these, considered alone and apart from the others, would have required enormous funding. We have the following elements:

1) The need to establish a semi-permanent covert operations capability to engage, contain, roll back, and eventually defeat, the Communist bloc;
2) The need to develop and deploy the technologies of high altitude and space reconnaissance platforms in the form of spy satellites to assess the potential threat posed by the Communist bloc; and,
3) The need to develop and deploy the technologies of space reconnaissance platforms in the form both of spy satellites and deep space robotic probes to reconnoiter the possible bases of observed UFO activity, and to assess their threat. This would have been seen as a national security issue, apart from any considerations of the origin of the phenomenon, since UFO activity was closely associated with American (and presumably Soviet), defense capabilities and installations.

I have written elsewhere of this system of finance, and of the interface it required with the international criminal drug trade. Given the list outlined above, however, such a system by necessity would have to have been supplemented from other sources. Thus, as a consequence of the simultaneous emergence of these three things, enormous pressure was developed not only to create an independent system of finance, but this system had to be both an enormous system, and an utterly hidden and covert one. Since such funding could only be had either by massive increases of taxation—which would have raised inconvenient questions—or by massive fraud, then ultimately, it required—as will be discovered in the main text—the use of new kinds of fraud, on an industrial economy of scale, a scale implying the complicity both of certain prime banks(or at least of certain individuals within their management) and of various organs of intelligence, not only in order to make the fraud work, but also to maintain the system as a steady source of funding…

… and of profits. This element is also a major contributory factor to the culture of the breakaway civilization, for it means that its perpetuation will become a matter of vested interest (whether a threat really exists or not), as it is a source of tremendous profits to those participating in it.

Consequently it is this system, with all of its national security implications, that constitutes the ultimate though hidden source of the public culture of corruption so prevalent today. It necessitates likewise, as we shall see, the development of technologies for the covert monitoring of financial activity, and of any potential threat via any form of economic warfare to the fraudulent system being put into place, since that system itself is the lifeblood of the covert operations and technological arms of that civilization.

We may consider the massive scale of financing needed in such an operation by examining its UFO-related component from another perspective. On the view that UFOs would represent extraterrestrial interplanetary craft (or, worse, craft from outside this solar system), then it would appear to represent the achievements of possibly a Class I or Class II civilization on the Kardashev scale. For those unfamiliar with this scale, Kardashev was a Russian scientist who developed a classification system for potential extraterrestrial civilizations. A Class One civilization would be a civilization whose energy requirements were those of an entire planet. A Class Two civilization would be a civilization requiring the energy of an entire star. A Class Three civilization would be a civilization requiring the energy of an entire galaxy. In my previous works, I have slightly restated this, or developed a "corollary," and it is this corollary with which we are concerned here. The corollary may be simply stated as follows: the energy requirements of any particular Kardashev civilization class imply the technological ability to manipulate systems on a planetary, stellar, or galactic scale. It is therefore entirely possible that the UFO, understood as such a technology, requires the economic resources of at least a minimum of a Class One civilization to produce, and therefore, would require similar resources on the part of a human breakaway civilization to study or reproduce. But since our civilization is only on the cusp of becoming a Class I civilization, its economic and financial resources, in the absence of an efficient energy technology such as fusion-based or zero-point energy based systems, would arguably not be sufficient to the task unless a means or mechanism were contrived to vastly expand its financial resources by stimulating a vast though hidden expansion of credit, and a "suctioning" of hard assets to in order to emulate technologically the capabilities of UFOs.

Thus, in addition to these terrestrial components, the end of World War Two also found the engagement of a wholly unexpected factor, one having massive technological and national security implications of its own for the emerging national security state: the UFO, or "flying saucer," and the potential it represented for a wholly different kind of national security threat: the extra- or non-terrestrial one. With this added factor, the covert operations-covert projects milieu had an additional geostrategic and financial burden to confront, and this factor also became part of the culture of the breakaway civilization.

It is also suggested throughout this book that the basic strategy by which the emerging breakaway civilization dealt with the Soviet Union via covert and psychological operations designed to (1) contain, (2) engage, (3) roll back, and (4) defeat, became also to a certain extent the basic paradigm by which it dealt with the UFO phenomenon. In other words, it is the culture of the breakaway civilization that is the crucial component to understanding its policies toward the UFO phenomenon. The Covert War against the Soviet Union to a certain extent also encompassed other potential "enemies," and became a covert war against an unknown target of a very different type. The black research inevitably implied by the UFO phenomenon and its interaction with the breakaway civilization also inevitably implied that it may function as a means of achieving the very technological end run around nuclear weapons and the strategic advantage sought against the Soviet Union.

Consequently, in any assessment of the nature of the breakaway civilization, or "deep state," or "secret team," or "secret government" or whatever one wishes to call it, it is an impossibility to divorce the world of covert operations from that of covert research, from the UFO, and from the covert financing undergirding these activities. This is an important clue as to the culture and structure of the breakaway civilization, for as Professor Peter Dale Scott observes, this means one is not dealing with a "conspiracy" in any classic sense of the term. It is not a structure with activities that are "self-contained" and thus "extrinsic to the basic sociopolitical structure of America, but an integral cause and part of a larger war machine, an apparatus with a settled purpose fixed on achieving and maintaining global American dominance."[7]

In this, we are now confronting its "total culture" of total power and full spectrum dominance, for by the nature of the case, the covert operations mentality will also give rise to the demand to understand the UFO phenomenon in order—if possible—to wage covert operations of containment (minimally), and rollback (optimally and if required) against it. This implies that not only could the UFO phenomenon be exploited for terrestrial psychological operations, as outlined in the previous book Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops, but also that psychological operations be initiated directly against the UFO phenomenon, in addition to more direct technological confrontations.

b. The Total Culture of Total Power and Full Spectrum Dominance

Implicit in the survey of developments outlined above is another cultural phenomenon, indeed, one may view it in some respects as the key or defining cultural meme of the breakaway civilization. That factor is the "Total Culture of Total Power and Full Spectrum Dominance." It is a "Total Culture" because it is an all-pervasive and steady influence, a constant matrix in which its policies are formulated and its activities conducted. It is a culture of "Total Power" in that, in its effort to contain both perceived threats, it requires the manipulation of perceptions where it cannot control or directly confront the phenomenon (be it the Soviet Union, or the UFO), all the while pursuing the means—technological and otherwise—of doing precisely that. The manipulation of perceptions of something is, in itself, a means of acquiring power over it. The mentality of engagement, containment, rollback, and ultimate defeat is, of course, a long-term strategy, requiring the institutionalization and "enculturalization" of these goals, and from this arises a perpetual war machine, and a culture of power and dominance, a kind of perpetual warfare/welfare socialism.

Professor Peter Dale Scott, who has approached this phenomenon more or less exclusively from the standpoint of covert operations and the nexus between them and the international drug trade, puts this point in the following way:

[7] Peter Dale Scott, American War Machine: Deep Politics, the CIA Global Drug Connection, and the Road to Afghanistan (Rowman and Littlefield Publishers, Inc, 2010), p. 6.

> Today everything that has ever been labeled “invisible government” or “shadow government” can be considered parts of that machine—not just the CIA and organized crime but also such other nonaccountable powers as the military-industrial complex (now the financial-military-industrial complex), privatized military and intelligence contractors, public relations agents, media magnates, and even Washington’s most highly organized lobbyists.
> What we are describing is not just a neutral power apparatus but an apparatus with a settled purpose, a manipulative mind-set fixed on achieving and maintaining global dominance.[8]

While Scott is not writing about UFOs and their relationship to this deep-state, his assessment of its power-obsessed culture is worth noting since it is equally applicable to its approach to UFOs, for the common uniting feature behind such events as the Kennedy Assassination, or postwar “terrorist” and false flag incidents, to the overwhelming evidence of government suppression of information concerning UFOs, and to its relationship to the criminal underworld, or to postwar Fascists, is a “global dominance machine” or war machine, with resources both within and outside governments, “united not by conspiratorial oaths and handshakes but by a shared mentality and purpose.”[9]

This culture not only generates enormous corruption, but also a kind of psychopathological, or sociopathological, approach to the “overworld” with which it is still connected, for the culture of dominance creates an illusion which, as Professor Scott avers, is self-perpetuating; the culture of “dominance,” he states, “creates megalomanic illusions of insuperable control and… this illusion in turn is crystallized into a prevailing ideology of dominance.”[10] This culture, moreover, viewed from the standpoint of the “overworld” civilization with which it is still connected, is “delusional, indeed perhaps insane.”[11] This insanity, this delusional culture, stems, for its part, from the culture of covert operations and "plausible deniability."

[11] Ibid. As an example of the delusional insanity gripping what he calls the "financial-military-industrial complex," Scott cites the following passage from Carter Administration National Security advisor, and co-founder of the Trilateral Commission with David Rockefeller, Zbigniew Brzezinski, and his 1997 geopolitically delusional book, The Grand Chessboard:

B. Plausible Deniability: Covert Operations and Wars, the Engineering of Perception, and the UFO

As I contend in this book, and as I have suggested here in its preface, the UFO phenomenon affords the best entry into the culture and methodology of covert operations, the method called "plausible deniability" and deliberate perception management, for as will be evident in the main text, when confronted by their inability to completely understand much less control the UFO phenomenon, the breakaway civilization could at least manage some degree of control or dominance over it by means of the engineering of the public perception of it. Again, though not writing directly to the relationship of the UFO phenomenon to the national security state, and to its contribution to the emergence of that state as a kind of "breakaway civilization," nonetheless Professor Peter Dale Scott's remarks are equally applicable to this phenomenon, for one of that civilization's earliest and most consistently repeated denials was that the UFO posed no real national security threat or even concern, even while covertly it was behaving precisely as if it did. Professor Scott has noted that one hallmark of any civilization—breakaway or otherwise—is that it is "a great conspiracy of organized denial."[12]

"For the first time ever, a non-Eurasian power has emerged not only as a key arbiter of Eurasian power relations but also as the world's paramount power. The defeat and collapse of the Soviet Union was the final step in the rapid ascendance of a Western Hemisphere power, the United States, as the sole and, indeed, the first truly global power.

"For America, the chief geopolitical prize is Eurasia…. Now a non-Eurasian power is preeminent in Eurasia-and America's global primacy is directly dependent on how long and how effectively its preponderance on the Eurasian continent is sustained….

"To put it in a terminology that harkens back to the more brutal age of ancient empires, the three grand imperatives of imperial geostrategy are to prevent collusion and maintain security dependence among the vassals, to keep tributaries pliant and protected, and to keep the barbarians from coming together." (Citing Zbigniew Brzezinksi, The Grand Chessboard: American Primacy and Its Geostrategic Imperatives [New York: Basic Books, 1997], pp. xiii, 30, 40.)

[12] Peter Dale Scott, American War Machine, p. 3.

This "organized denial" is most evident in what Scott calls "Deep events," namely, those events that are either orchestrated and carried out by the breakaway civilization, or events whose public perceptions are managed and influenced by it. These "Deep Events" are:

> events that are systematically ignored, suppressed, or falsified in public (and even internal) government, military and intelligence documents as well as in the mainstream media and public consciousness. Underlying them is frequently the involvement of deep forces linked either to the drug traffic or to agencies of surveillance (or to both together) whose activities are extremely difficult to discern or document.
> A clearly defined deep event will combine both internal features—evidence, such as a discernible cover-up, that aspects are being suppressed—and external features—an ongoing and perhaps irresoluble controversy as to what happened. Some deep events—the 1968 assassinations, the Tonkin Gulf incidents, and 9/11—clearly have both features.[13]

These "deep events," moreover, are "better understood collectively than in isolation," for "when looked at together, they constitute a larger pattern,"[14] a pattern that constitutes a "deep history" of that breakaway civilization.

It is evident that the characteristics of such deep events are equally applicable to the UFO phenomenon, and that it indeed qualifies as such a "deep" event, and moreover, one of an ongoing nature. This is a crucial point, for many, in the wake of the collapse of the Soviet Union and an end to the Cold War, have questioned why the national security and military establishment was not ended, or at least dramatically curtailed. The answer must surely lie in part in the fact that that establishment was not founded solely to deal with the Soviet phenomenon, but also with the UFO phenomenon, which shows no sign of abating.

In any case, the nature of ongoing cover-ups and continued controversy over the interpretation of deep events implies that yet another technique and technology that the culture of dominance will want to acquire is the technique and technology of perception management, social engineering, and mind control, for these will afford the quickest and easiest way to dominate the UFOlogical phenomenon in a "soft" fashion, while it eagerly, simultaneously, and secretly seeks the means to engage and contain, and if it perceives it to be necessary, to rollback and ultimately to defeat it by the hard fashion.

In short, the breakaway civilization has been engaged in a cover war not only against the Soviet Union, and others, since World War Two, but has also been engaged in a covert war against the UFO phenomenon since World War Two, since both spring from a common cultural matrix and meme: total power, and total dominance.

1. Historical, Structural, and Factional Analysis of Components

In any analysis of the breakaway structure, one must discern its structural and factional components by the historical circumstances that led to their creation. While some of the these components and historical circumstances have already been alluded to previously, we need to take note of the following points. Historically, the matrix of the breakaway civilization drew from the following arrangements and events:

1) The nexus or interface between the Anglo-American financial and intelligence elite, and their World War Two Nazi and Fascist counterparts, as exemplified by:
    a) The wartime agreement struck between U.S. intelligence mandarins and German military intelligence general Reinhard Gehlen;[15]
    b) The implicit agreement between the Anglo-American financial oligarchy and the postwar "Nazi International" to launder Nazi plunder through western banks, an agreement implied by the composition and implied purposes of the early Bilderberger meetings and other events;[16]
    c) The ties between American intelligence, the Texas oilmen Hunt and Murchison, and General Gehlen's organization;[17]

  - d) The pre-war German-American business ties that were, for all intents and purposes, resumed after the war.[18]

As I have outlined these components of the breakaway civilization in previous books, they will not be reviewed at any length here save in cases where it is necessary. But in addition to these relationships, this book will outline the following historical circumstances and events in the evolution of the breakaway civilization:

2) A similar interface or nexus of relationships as obtained between the postwar Anglo-American elites and the surviving Nazi and European Fascists also emerged between American elites and the elites of the Far East. This appears to have occurred in two distinct phases:
    - a) A pre-war arrangement between Nationalist Chinese generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek and the American financial oligarchy; and,
    - b) a postwar nexus between the Japanese yakuza, zaibatsu, and the Japanese Imperial family. Unlike the corresponding nexus between the American elite and the postwar European Fascists, a nexus that encompassed the whole spectrum of interfaces between the American intelligence-and-covert operations complex, the American military-industrial black projects complex, and the American financial elites, and their corresponding Nazi and Fascist counterparts, the nexus between the Japanese elite was initially mediated much more narrowly by contact with the American military and covert operations complex;
3) Additionally, all of these interfaces are in turn linked to the international criminal underground drug trade, and this mediation occurs directly via the involvement of the American intelligence-covert operations complex, but also through the involvement of the Fascist International and Oriental components;
4) Finally, the matrix of the breakaway civilization arises from the vast complex of secret weapons projects that arose during World War Two, particularly in the United States and Nazi Germany, and with their effective fusion via Operation Paperclip after the war. Effectively this represents the corporatization of advanced research having an impact on military and national security matters.

Consideration of these general factors reveals the basic structural components of this breakaway civilization:

1) The financial component, comprised of Central Banks and Prime banks in the west, and major brokerage houses. These constitute the interface between the breakaway civilization and the "overworld" or public civilization. This component is also comprised of financial institutions deliberately established by the intelligence-covert operations complex in order to enable its activities more directly, and to exercise more direct control and security over them. As outlined previously in this preface and elsewhere in my works, there are at least three major components of the financing of this structure, beginning with the most visible and least secure, to the deepest level:
    a) Black budget financing via budget loopholes and reallocation within the public budget of the host state (the USA);
    b) Financing through criminal activity, including economic warfare activity against various nations, and also particularly via the drug trade; and,
    c) At the deepest level, a completely hidden system of finance involving massive securities and bullion fraud and re-hypothecation, in part to create massive leverage for the financial oligarchies, and in part to raise the enormous sums required by the technological components connected to Soviet and UFO threat assessments outlined above;
2) The covert-operations-intelligence-military complex, which uses part of these funds to sponsor massive operations, initially to engage, contain, rollback and eventually defeat the Soviet Union, and more recently to suborn other nations to become host nations supporting the breakaway structure, literally leveraging a buyout of the world (possibly as a necessary response to a perceived UFO threat); and,
3) a corporate-technological, or military-industrial complex comprising the scientific, aerospace and other technological components.

Before moving to a consideration of the factional components of this breakaway civilization, it is worth pausing to note its inherent instability as revealed by the above three structural components, for clearly, each component and the elites running them are a potential threat to the others, and the real power in the structure ultimately rests with those who know how to create and manipulate the technology.

This instability is a crucial factor in consideration of the factions of the structure revealed in the historical review. We have encountered the following factional interests:

1) The financial oligarchy, represented by
    a) the Central Banks and Prime banks of the nations involved (principally, the USA, UK, France, Japan, Italy, Germany, and other western European, North, and South American banks). Note here not only the continued existence of national factional interests, but of regional ones, as for example, between the USA for one part, the UK for another, and the continental European for a third;
    b) the "Front" banks created more directly by the covert operations intelligence complex and more directly under its control and influence;
2) The International Fascist component;
3) The Japanese component; and,
4) The international criminal syndicates and drug cartels.
5) The American intelligence-covert operations-military-industrial complex.

It is thus evident from a consideration of this list of factions that the structure is thus not only inherently unstable from a component point of view, but that there are internal stresses upon those components created by the national, geopolitical, class interest and cultural points of view that each faction brings to the table. Consider for example the second structural component: the covert-operations-intelligence complex. A quick glance at it will reveal that it is comprised of American, European, and criminal underground factions, each interfaced with each other. The best analogy to this overall structure, therefore, is that of the Mafia itself, each capo having a jurisdiction or territory, each structural and factional component being a "family." These "families" can gather around one table to discuss business and plan their activities, while at another level, when their individual factional interests are threatened, they can go to war with each other.

Or, to view it in a different and deliberately mathematical way, we are dealing with networks of secret and hidden regions of component interests and organizations, whose interfaces or common surfaces are detectable in the personnel that overlap between them, performing this set of functions in one area, and that set in another. These common surfaces can arise and dissipate between components and factions of the structure according to the dictates of the circumstances of the moment, as the sets of functions and interests of the one overlap with those of another, sometimes creating enormous amalgamations and alliances behind the deep events of history, as with the JFK assassination. And in other cases these common surfaces can remain more or less semi-permanent nodes within the structure itself.

Rightly then, this organization is a segmented poly-centric integrated network, and a truly international phenomenon, organized around a dominant American core in its intelligence, covert operations and research, and military activities.[19] But it can thus give rise to, and has given rise to, serious factional infighting.[20]

2. A Crucial Common Surface, or Interface:
The Office of Policy Coordination

As outlined above, one of the crucial defining features of the breakaway civilization, and one that will initially preoccupy us in the first part of the main text, is a vast and entirely hidden system of finance, a system, moreover, in more-or-less direct control of the intelligence and covert operations mandarins. This system, once again, emerged in the immediate postwar period with the creation of the national security state, as Professor Peter Dale Scott notes:

> One of the first acts of the newly created National Security Council in 1947 was to launder “over $10 million in captured Axis funds to influence the (Italian) election (of 1948).” This use of off-the-books financing for criminal activity was institutionalized in 1948 with the > creation of a covert Office of Policy Coordination (OPC), whose charge it was to engage in "subversion against hostile states."[21]

[19] The financial, drug, and technological aspects may be, and I suspect are, far more internationalized and may no longer be under "American" control. This is a point for discussion among researchers concerned with this topic.

[20] One need only think, regarding this point, of the phenomenon of the split between the Northeastern establishment "globalists" and the more openly Fascist-leaning "American Empire" builders of the "cowboys" of Texas and California, often commented upon by researchers of the American elite. See, for example, Peter Dale Scott, American War Machine, pp. 208-209.

As Professor Scott also notes, the Office of Policy Coordination was established by direct order of the National Security Council; no authorization from, or role for, Congress was ever in view.[22] With this action, covert operations, intelligence, and criminal high finance became directly intertwined.[23]

The crucial step in this process was the issuance of the National Security Council's directive 10/2, dated June 18, 1948. This directive created the "total culture of total power and dominance" and the criminal culture that went with it, for this directive

> …gave the CIA's newly created OPC the task of carrying out "covert operations," among which were listed "subversion against hostile states, including assistance to underground resistance movements, guerillas and refugee liberation groups."
> At this moment OPC, authorized to engage in crimes, secured allies in its fight against communism by establishing backdoor links to professional criminal organizations, above all in the drug traffic. Relationships that had been sporadic before World War II became institutional and protected.[24]

European researcher Daniele Ganser, in his masterly survey of NATO's "stay behind" guerilla warfare commando units, puts the role of this crucial national security directive even more forcefully, as we shall discover.

The success of covert operations in the Italian elections of 1948 lead President Truman and his advisors to begin to see covert operations as an effective and more or less permanent tool of statecraft, and, in so far as they are related to the breakaway civilization beginning to emerge at this time, they become its standard method of operation:[25] the covert operations and wars of a covert civilization. Ganser sites much of NSC

10/2, and the reader, while reading this memorandum, should also note the peculiar ambiguity of its language in certain phrases, phrases that could be equally applicable to the UFO phenomenon:

> NSC 10/2 directed that OPC shall 'plan and conduct covert operations'. By 'covert operations' NSC 10/2 designated all activities 'which are conducted or sponsored by this government against hostile foreign states or groups or in support of friendly foreign states or groups which are so planned and conducted that any US Government responsibility for them is not evident to unauthorized persons and that if uncovered the US Government can plausibly disclaim any responsibility for them.'[26]

Such methods of integration of covert operations into overall strategic planning and statecraft are heavy with implications for the subject of UFOs, and how these also mightily impelled the organization of the breakaway civilization, for the integration of covert operations created an inherently long term offensive viewpoint within that civilization, the viewpoint reflected in (1) engagement, (2) containment, (3) rollback, (4) defeat.[27]

Since direct confrontation of a powerful enemy such as the Soviet Union was not possible, any such confrontation had to be via mercenaries, proxies, and cut-outs, and as will be contended in this book, a similar approach was therefore even more heavily implied for the UFO phenomenon. One cannot emphasize enough once again that the approach to both potential threats emerged from a common cultural view.

With this very high, very speculative overview in mind, it is now time to begin our journey through the fog-filled hall of mirrors, and with its most fundamental component: financing, and fraud.

COUNTERFEITING, COVERT OPS, AND KONZENTRATIONSLAGERN: THE POSSIBLE POSTWAR SURVIVAL OF OPERATION BERNHARD

"Kaltenbrunner immediately arranged a private interview with Hitler, whom he saw a few days later. He reported the start of dollar production, showed his samples, which the Führer apparently approved."
Anthony Pirie[1]

There is in place, and has existed since World War Two, a vast, and almost completely hidden, system of finance within the world, and this system of finance has been used to fund the breakaway civilization in all its factions and all its activities, activities which include covert operations of all varieties, from overt and covert warfare—of all types—both on this planet, and off, to psychological operations, targeted at those both on this planet and… "elsewhere." This vast mechanism additionally supports the research and black projects that make its fantastic technologies possible.

It is a system, however, that at its root is based upon vast fraud and the collusion of public institutions of government and corporations, and more simply, robbery, for the covert financing for the breakaway civilization began as a series of three things, and came about by dint of a combination of those three things through historical circumstance, elitist opportunism and planning, and just plain luck. These three factors are:

(1) a state-sponsored case of industrial-scale counterfeiting during World War Two, which, as luck would have it, became at least part of the inspiration for the post-war fraud;
(2) several state-sponsored cases of vast looting of the conquered, specifically:
   (a) Imperial Japan's looting of Asia;
   (b) Nazi Germany's looting of Europe;
   (c) America's technology-transfers from a defeated Germany to the USA; and,

(3) the nexus of collusion between post-war American intelligence factions with the financial, military, intelligence, and scientific elites of the defeated Axis powers, and with the financial and corporate world of the post-war West.

Of course, we are far from saying that this breakaway civilization does not have its counterparts in the former Soviet Union, or contemporary Russia or China, but it is our contention that the most advanced form of it took root in the West, during World War Two, and took root on both sides of the conflict, among the Allies, and particularly in the United States, and in the Axis powers of Germany and Japan.[2] After the war, this breakaway civilization took on elements of the elites both of the victors and the vanquished, and, I believe, the outlines of those factions can still be faintly discerned within as the post-war detente between those factions breaks down into "open" covert economic warfare between them. But that is another story.

For the present, we remain focused on the first component of this vast system of fraudulent or fictitious finance, the finance that makes possible the "fiction" of mind-boggling human technologies, technologies which in turn open up vast new vistas of covert warfare. This first component—industrial scale state-sponsored counterfeiting—begins, as most such stories do, in Nazi Germany, shortly after the outbreak of World War Two.

A. Operation Bernhard

1. Naujocks and the Beginning of Operation Bernhard

Economic warfare, including the counterfeiting of an opponent's coins or currency, has always been a form of warfare, and because of its covert nature, one readily engaged in both by combatants in a conflict, and by third parties not wishing to challenge a powerful geopolitical player overtly. With the advent of the printing press and paper money, however, vast quantities of money could be in circulation, and counterfeiting as a mechanism of economic warfare could only be effective if transformed to industrial scale.

[2] This is not, for a moment, to say that Fascist Italy did not form its own vast untold story of "the real history" of World War Two, for indeed, this author strongly suspects there is a deeply hidden aspect to the Axis atom bomb project that is centered around Mussolini's Italy, but that is the subject for a detailed examination that cannot be undertaken here. By excluding Italy from this consideration here, however, I mean only to point to the cultural implications outlined in the preface, that the other two principal Axis powers, by dint of their black projects and willingness to jettison humane values and utilize slave labor and human subjects in their experiments, and to make genocide (whether against Russians or Chinese) an actual war aim, were forming the cultural basis and moral context for the breakaway civilization.

This was done shortly after the beginning of World War Two, and on a scale hitherto undreamed of, a scale only outclassed in more modern times by the sheer audacity of the "bearer bonds scandals" of the first two decades of the twenty-first century. Nonetheless, in terms of sheer scale and an audacious, breathtaking vision of what state-sponsored industrial counterfeiting might accomplish, and to what uses it might be applied, the Nazis were there first, even though they had plenty of ancient, mediaeval and more recent precedent.[3]

SS Sturmbahnführer, or Major, Alfred Naujocks, a close associate of infamous SS General Reinhard Heydrich, contacted one Dr. Landau to study the feasibility of mass counterfeiting of British pound notes as a response to a clumsy British forgery of German food and clothing ration cards.[4] Because of his close association with Heydrich, it was Naujocks who was tasked with orchestrating the false flag attack on a German radio station with concentration camp prisoners who were placed into Polish military uniforms and executed so that Hitler could use this attack as a pretext for launching the invasion of Poland and the beginning of World War Two.[5]

In any case, Dr. Landau was initially put off by Naujocks' idea of mass-producing counterfeit British pound notes, since the notes were thought to be virtually counterfeit-proof.[6] Naujocks ordered Dr. Landau to make a study of the matter and report back to him within 48 hours:

[3] For the ancient and mediaeval precedent, see my Babylon's Banksters: The Alchemy of Deep Physics, High Finance, and Ancient Religion (Feral House, 2010), pp. 202-205, and my Financial Vipers of Venice: Alchemical Money, Magical Physics, and Banking in the Middle Ages and Renaissance (Feral House, 2013), chapter 8.

[4] The British forgeries were so bad the German authorities did not even bother rounding up the faked ration cards, for the frauds were easily detectable by the average German, who simply turned them into the authorities. (See Anthony Pirie, Operation Bernhard (New York, William Morrow, 1962), pp. 1-2.

> In forty-eight hours, Landau reported back that pound notes could be forged virtually undetectable from the original. It was possible but very difficult. Mass-production forgery would be even more difficult. Naujocks thanked Landau, and immediately made an appointment with his chief, Reinhard Heydrich, Head of the all-powerful Security Service and one of the most feared men in Germany.[7]

Not surprisingly, Heydrich, given his "character", was more than interested in Naujocks' industrial scale counterfeiting proposition, and immediately issued a directive, a directive that carried with it profound implications.

2. Heydrich's Directive

Before issuing his directive, however, Heydrich prepared a memorandum outlining the proposal to present to Hitler, who approved the plan, but with strict handwritten instructions added to Heydrich's memorandum as a marginal note: no U.S. dollars were to be counterfeited, only British pounds, as the Third Reich was not (yet) at war with the U.S.A.[8] This proviso in hand, Heydrich composed an official order for the operation, initially code-naming it Unternehmung Andreas (Operation Andrew), detailing quite specific instructions for Naujocks.[9]

> Naujocks read and reread the Geheime Reichssache (Reich Top Secret) file,[10] until he knew the main points by heart. Heydrich specifically stated: "This is not to be forgery or counterfeiting in the usual sense, but unauthorized facsimile production*. The notes must be such a perfect copy of the original that even the most experienced British banknote experts cannot tell the difference.*" The job was broken down into three separate parts: 1. production of paper identical with the British; 2. preparation of plates to print notes identical in color and design; 3. working out a proper numbering system.[11]

Adolf Burger, who was himself one of the concentration camp inmates who was eventually recruited by the SS to work on the counterfeiting of pound notes, and whose book, The Devil's Workshop must be consulted for any true appreciation of the extent of what would eventually be known as Operation Bernhard (Unternehmung Bernhard), puts all these points—including the translation of Heydrich's directive—slightly differently:

> The first details were contained in instructions declared 'top secret', which Naujocks received from Heydrich. 'This is not a question of forgery or imitation in the usual sense but it constitutes unauthorized production (of sterling notes). The notes must be so

[9] Ibid.

[10] It should be pointed out that Geheime Reichssache literally means "secret state matter", but it was the equivalent classification within the Third Reich of "Top Secret"(USA) or "Most Secret" (UK).

[11] Pirie, op. cit., p. 7, italicized and boldface emphasis added.

> close to the original that even the most experienced sterling note specialists would not be able to detect any difference.'
> This called for something extraordinary. It was a task that could only be completed with comprehensive technical expertise and with the greatest circumspection. When 'Operation Andreas', as it was first called, started in 1941, it was without precedent.
> This production of duds demanded the following:
> 1. First, paper had to be produced that exactly replicated that on which English notes were printed.
> 2. Printing plates had to be made up that could reproduce the tiniest details.
> 3. Mathematicians would be needed to work out the numbering system used by the Bank of England on its notes.
> 4. A worldwide distribution network would have to be set up.[12]

The phrase "unauthorized production" says it all, for it implies nothing less than that Nazi Germany was going to become an off-the-books, hidden supplier of banknotes to the Bank of England. In short, Nazi Germany was at war not only with Great Britain, but more importantly, with the British financial elite. Germany was attempting to erect a hidden system of finance, one ultimately designed to wreck the British war economy.

3. Industrial Scale Production and the Implications: A Permanent Counterfeiting Bureaucracy

It was indeed industrial scale production, mass-produced, and mass-marketed, counterfeiting, using all the international resources of the German security services. It is important, for our purposes, to note this connection between financial and monetary fraud, and intelligence bureaucracies, for it is a pattern we will encounter again—on an even larger scale still—in the pages ahead. Nor, as will be shortly seen, was wrecking the British economy the only goal, for once the counterfeiting production apparatus was in hand and in production, the Nazis soon found other uses for the structure.

It is also equally important to notice a second thing about Unternehmung Bernhard, or Operation Bernhard, as it eventually came to be code-named, and that is that the SS had established a counterfeiting bureaucracy whose task it was to reverse engineer the process of issuing

[12] Adolf Burger, The Devil's Workshop: A Memoir of the Nazi Counterfeiting Operation, pp. 128-129, emphases added.

"legitimate" British pounds sterling notes. They had created a structure for the technological examination of how to counterfeit British currency, and once in place, the method could then be applied to any other currency. Like all such government structures, this would become, in effect, a permanent counterfeiting bureaucracy, and with the survival of Nazism after the war as a kind of extraterritorial state,[13] it was inevitable not only that the operation could continue under Nazi auspices and the criminal elements that it aligned with, but also that it could form, perhaps, the inspiration for similar undertakings on the Allied side of the war, as will be seen.

4. A Modern Historical Precedent, and Further Implications

Germany was, of course, not the first country to view the idea of counterfeiting as a form of economic warfare. Indeed, Great Britain flooded revolutionary France with facsimile assignats, the paper money of the French revolution, from 1790-1796 in an effort to derail the revolution.[14]

More importantly, Germany itself became involved in state-sponsored counterfeiting in the 1920s, before the Nazis ever came to power, when a scheme was devised to forge French francs and Soviet rubles as a mechanism to relieve the crushing burden of war reparations. It is this effort to forge French francs that is connected with another state-sponsored counterfeiting ring, this time, in Hungary…

Heydrich's directive establishing Operation Andreas/Bernhard created a huge enterprise. And the production problems of such an enterprise are, as one might imagine, immense, and these will be shortly reviewed. But there is an equal if not even more difficult problem that had to be overcome, especially in wartime: how would Nazi Germany get such "facsimile"[15] notes into circulation? Heydrich was alive to this difficulty, and consulted with an SS security service specialist, Dr. Willi Holten, who in addition to being an historian based in Vienna, was also closely connected to the Vatican (and with that, we have the introduction of another player in the financial aspects of the breakaway civilization).

[14] Adolf Burger, The Devil's Workshop, p. 122.

[15] I am adopting the term "facsimile" here to denote the difference between such notes and ordinary counterfeit notes. The distinction will become quite important in the remainder of this part of the book.

Heydrich, through an intermediary, ordered Holten to produce a paper entitled “An Investigation into the Hungarian Franc Forgery Affair with Full Details and Background Information.”[16]

This little-known affair concerns the attempt by members of the Hungarian elite, many of them conservatives, to counterfeit French francs—again on a massive scale—to fund their restoration in the aftermath of World War One and the forced disintegration of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Holten, with only a month to complete the task Heydrich had ordered him to finish, consulted old newspaper morgues in the city for information on the affair, and eventually sought and obtained permission to travel to Budapest to consult with his contacts in Hungary.

His friends, however, refused to provide any information, and attempted to dissuade Holten from interviewing the principal figure involved in the forgery scandal, Prince Windischgrätz “who had been beggared and disgraced by it.”[17] Undettered, Holten sought and obtained an interview with the prince. Windischgrätz agreed to answer detailed questions but stipulated that no detail be published “until after the disappearance from public life of the many prominent people involved, such as Admiral Horthy.”[18] Lest we forget who Admiral Miklos Horthy was, he was eventually the regent for Hungary, in effect, a dictator, and a virtual puppet of Adolf Hitler for much of the war. In other words, the eventual ruler of Hungary and a former flag officer of the Austro-Hungarian navy, had been involved in a scheme to counterfeit French francs after World War One.

In any case, Holten, who was compiling the secret report for Heydrich, had nothing to lose by consenting to Windischgrätz’s stipulation, since the report would never be published anyway, and so he agreed to the condition.

The prince told Holten that beginning in 1919, the Hungarian elite had founded a secret society called Eksz, whose goal was to recover “the two-thirds of Hungary which had been lost to it under the Treaty of Trianon,”[19] the treaty which concluded World War One between the Allies and Hungary. The goals of this secret society, in other words, were political. It funded its covert activities, Windischgrätz said, primarily through counterfeiting operations, counterfeiting Czech and Rumanian currencies. Eventually, Windischgrätz himself was recruited to oversee the forgery of French francs, and the then-Hungarian primeminister Count Bethlen had "cooperated by supplying official buildings for the purpose."[20]

Unfortunately, the notes were not of sufficient quality to be undetectable, and the first attempt to circulate them not only ended in a complete failure, but the Bank of France was able to trace the forgery to Budapest, where, making its own secret inquiries, it was able to collect enough evidence to force a trial. "Prince Windischgrätz and others were asked to sacrifice themselves to save the government."[21]

For our purposes of the moment, it is crucial to note the pattern here: a secret society or faction with close ties to a government was engaged in more-or-less officially and secretly sanctioned counterfeiting in order to fund a political goal, a goal in itself that had to remain covert, since it was a goal that flew directly in the face of the established geopolitical order dictated by the Allies after the end of World War One. This, too, is a pattern that we will see repeated again, on a much larger scale, after World War Two, and again, in conjunction and connection to intelligence agencies and "secretive societies" engaged in secret state-sponsored counterfeiting.

We will return to the problem of distribution in a moment, but now our attention must shift to the other three problems of the operation, the problems of paper, plates, and quality control; we must consider the problems of production.

5. Production and Quality Control

The lessons of the Hungarian franc-forgery episode obviously hovered in the background of Heydrich's directive that the Nazi facsimile sterling notes be undetectable, and this inevitably posed problems for the counterfeiters somewhat different from ordinary counterfeiting. The ordinary counterfeiter wants notes that can pass the examination of an ordinary individual. Heydrich effectively wanted his facsimile notes, optimally, to pass the scrutiny of the Bank of England itself, and, failing that, at least to give it endless headaches and difficulties.

This Naujocks readily appreciated, and hence, he turned to the SS officer who would eventually lend his name to the counterfeiting operation, SS Sturmbahnführer (Major) Bernhard Krüger, who was assigned to the SS's personal documents forgery workshops. Naujocks had wanted Krüger to test the reliability of Nazi forged Swiss passports, and Krüger selected a non-commissioned officer and sent him to Switzerland using one of the passports. Unbenknownst to the "volunteer" for this operation, Krüger himself had alerted Swiss authorities to be on the lookout for him, and told the Swiss he suspected that the man was travelling with a false passport, which, of course, he was. The man was promptly arrested and detained by the Swiss, who sent the passport to Berne, where it was "examined by every known test, and then returned with profuse apologies to the young man,"[22] who was released and eventually returned to Germany.

The SS's forged Swiss passport had passed the thorough scrutiny of the one nation in Europe that most zealously guarded its official documents.

By this time, the decision had been taken to forge British five pound notes, though eventually the operation would expand to cover ten, twenty, and fifty pound notes. This decision taken, the next problem was one of intelligence, for Naujocks now had to dispatch agents to Britain to determine how many five pound notes had been issued during the previous twenty years, and "the date, the designation (a letter and number), the number and Chief Cashier's signature" on every note.[23]

It is worth pausing to consider this very important point, for again, it will become a crucial component to the argument in chapters ahead. Recall that Heydrich's directive specifically required that the facsimiles be "unauthorized production" of notes that were undetectable. They were, in effect, to be British pound notes, but not notes that had ever come from the Bank of England's printing presses. Thus, in addition to the normal two components of any counterfeiting operation:

1) Production of the "product"; and,
2) Distribution of the "product";

there was added a third:

3) Accurate intelligence concerning the actual amount of genuine product issued.

[23] Ibid., p. 17.

This element of intelligence or "insider knowledge" will become in the chapters ahead a key signature of state-sponsored fraud, counterfeiting, and facsimile production.

a. Reverse Engineering the Sterling Banknote Paper

The first production problem was the British banknote paper itself. Work on reproducing it proceeded slowly because it "soon became clear that it would have to be made by hand."[24] Nonetheless, Naujocks had assembled a team to reproduce the first samples of paper by early 1940.[25] It was this team that produced a paper that to the naked eye and even under microscopic examination was undetectable from real British banknote paper.[26] But ultraviolet light "revealed a defect,"[27] namely, the genuine British banknote paper under ultraviolet was a vivid lilac color, but the facsimile Nazi paper was a much duller lilac color.[28] Heydrich's directive had called for "undetectable unauthorized production" of facsimile sterling notes, and thus, such paper would never do, since the British bank examiners—if they suspected counterfeit pounds—would certainly subject notes to ultraviolet examination. The search was soon on to clear up the problem:

> At this point, someone discovered that the "pure" flax supplied for linen manufacture by German producers was not 100 per cent pure, and that such pure flax was unobtainable in Germany. Landau discovered that Turkish flax was "pure," so a few tons of it were imported.
> Paper made with rags from Turkish flax very nearly, but not quite, matched the original (British banknote paper). With the scientific experts helpless, Naujocks solved the problem by common sense. He reasoned that British paper makers almost certainly used second-hand but thoroughly clean linen; the Germans used brand-new material. Was that the trouble? Linen woven from Turkish flax was sent for use as cleaning rags to various factories. When thoroughly dirty, the rags were returned, cleaned and made into bank-note paper. This proved by any known test to be identical with the genuine article.[29]

The paper production problem thus solved, actual production of the paper was handed to Hahnemühle mill in Berlin.[30]

The next problems to be solved were:

b. The Watermark, the Fonts, and the Plates

British banknotes of the period contained a watermark of wavy lines, of deliberately varied thickness, that required the SS counterfeiting operation to reproduce molds for the watermarks that were made from wires of varying thickness.[31] A glance at actual Operation Bernhard five, ten, twenty, and fifty pound notes will show this feature:

Operation Bernhard Fifty Pound Note, While the Watermark is barely visible, it is of the same type of style as that on other British sterling banknotes

The watermark problem solved, the final one was that of the fonts, images, signatures, and printing of the notes themselves, and of course these problems were eventually overcome, and facsimile pound note plates were produced. One gains a measure of the industrial sized scale of production by examining the amount of facsimile British pound notes that Operation Bernhard printed during the war:

£5 notes:	£19,729,330	or 3,945,866 notes
£10 notes:	£23,989,800	or 239,898 notes
£20 notes:	£26,746,680	or 1,337,334 notes
£50 notes:	£64,145,000	or 1,282,900 notes
Total:	£134,610,810	or 6,805,998 notes[32]

I have quoted Burger's figures here because they are conservative. Other sources give the total amount of Nazi facsimile pound sterling notes as being around £300,000,000, and there are even higher amounts that are sometimes cited. But even on Burger's amounts, such figures obviously mean that the SS operation was not a typical "hidden office" or "garage" counterfeiting operation, so where was it conducted?

As most people who have studied Operation Berhnhard are aware, the actual forgery was conducted by conscripted counterfeiters—inmates of concentration camps otherwise slated for slave labor and eventual extinction- who were accorded special privileges, increased food rations, and who worked at block 19 at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp outside Berlin. It was literally "a camp within a camp,"[33] whose privileged prisoners were surrounded and cut off from the rest of the camp by a seven foot high wooden wall and barbed wire, with controlled access subject to the approval of the project's new head, Major Bernhard Krüger, who had selected each man from camps throughout occupied Europe for his "unusual skill in composing, engraving, printing or foreign exchange banking."[34]

Krüger also took elaborate steps to ensure quality control of the "product:"

> The newly printed forgeries were examined nearly a dozen times on glass-topped desks illuminated from beneath, by three groups of inspectors using very high-power magnifying glasses. The first group assessed the note's printing and color, the second, the watermark, the > third, the combined effect of printing, color and watermark. On these criteria, the notes were divided up into three quality classes. Only (Ernst) Kaltenbrunner, (Walther) Schellenberg and (Friedrich) Schwend knew the real significance of the classification. Quality I notes were used solely for German agents in enemy countries; Quality 2 for collaborators in occupied countries, for dubious business deals and for black market operations; Quality 3 notes were kept for small deals with unimportant people and for any miscellaneous need which might arise.[35]

Note that the classification of Quality 1 and 2 notes implies that they were of high enough quality in order to be able to pass undetected, particularly by German agents in enemy countries, for passing counterfeit currency in any quantity was certainly to cast suspicion on the passer of such currency, and thus, these notes had to be of the finest quality. Similarly, Quality 2 notes had to be of high quality, since using the black market as a means of distribution would insure that such notes would eventually pass into British hands and undergo close scrutiny. This is also a clue on the byzantine cunning with which Operation Bernhard notes were circulated, for they were circulated by means and methods nominally illegal under Nazi occupation. In other words, the "enemy" and his ultimately underground and "illegitimate" channels of circulation were employed to circulate the notes!

Burger, however, presents a slightly different classification scheme, but one that tends to the same result:

> The finished notes were divided into four categories. First-class forgeries went into the first category. The second contained notes with slight, almost invisible flaws. In the third category were notes with printing errors: these were to be dropped over England by German planes and would serve to devalue English currency. The fourth category was for poor-quality forgeries, which were destroyed. The selected notes were then dirtied and crumpled, to make them look like used notes. Then they were put in bundles of 500 and entered in the register again.[36]

As we shall see however, the Germans never resorted on any large scale to dumping their hard-won forgeries by the simple expedient of drops from airplanes. More effective means of distribution were found.

[36] Adolf Burger, The Devil's Workshop, p. 148.

In any case, it remained to be seen, prior to the first mass distribution of the facsimiles, if the Quality 1 notes would indeed past the scrutiny of the most severe experts.

> …Naujocks felt ready for the supreme test. He got Krüger to provide a sheet of notepaper with the forged heading: "Deutsche Reichsbank, Forgeries Department," used it for a letter with an illegible signature, sent for a trusted agent, gave him the letter, twenty brand-new five-pound notes and detailed instructions.
> The agent went to a bank in Switzerland where his large account ensured him excellent attention. He produced his bundle of British notes and his letter from the Deutsche Reichsbank asking Swiss help in deciding whether or not the notes were forged. In three days, he got his reply—the notes were unquestionably genuine. Pretending, as instructed, to be still uncertain, the German asked the Swiss to check with the Bank of England if his notes had actually been issued. The Bank replied that they had. Still feigning uncertainty, the customer took back his money and returned to Germany.
> This good news made Naujocks say that that date, March 1, 1941, was "the proudest day of my life."[37]

Using a Swiss bank was the next-best choice for testing the notes after the Bank of England itself, for as Swiss banks were then among the world's top international banks, detection of counterfeit foreign currency was a requirement and service of any normal Swiss bank. Once the categorization had occurred, all the forged notes, their quality control category determination, denomination, and serial numbers, were entered into a registry.[38] This, too, is an important point, for as we shall see, it is a hallmark of state-sponsored "facsimile production" that someone, somewhere, knows it is a fraud, and why.

B. The International Distribution Networks and Uses of State-Sponsored Currency Facsimile Production

1. Friedrich Paul Schwend

But what of the distribution of this "facsimile fortune"?

Ultimately, distribution fell to Friedrich Paul Schwend, a German businessman with contacts throughout the world, including China, and, of course like so many German international businessmen, South America.[39] Because of his experience, Schwend came to the attention of, and eventually acted as a consultant, to Reichsmarschal Hermann Göring in his capacity of overseer of the Reich's Four Year economic plans. It was Schwend, in fact, who first proposed that the Operation Bernhard facsimiles be used to fund covert intelligence operations on a worldwide scale,[40] though this was not immediately acted upon.

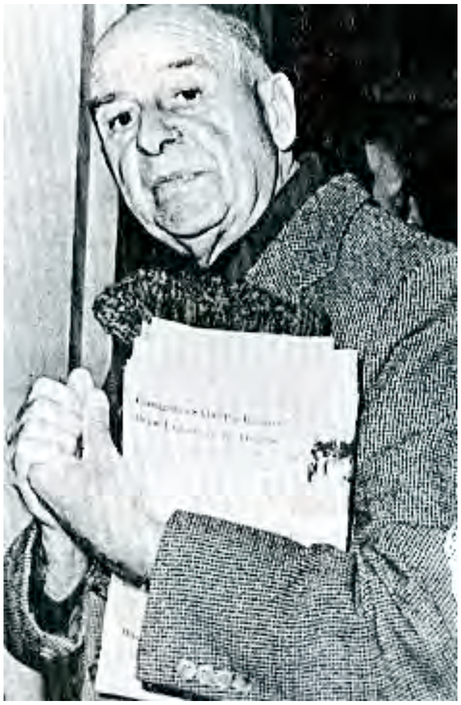
[40] Ibid.



Friedrich Paul Schwend Later in life, during the period he was living in Peru

Nonetheless, Schwend persisted, even pointing out that by using such facsimiles as a basis for funding of covert activity, Nazi intelligence would be free of any reliance upon state financing; it would have its own independent mechanism of finance,[41] and to that end, he proposed a vast network of "agencies, sub-agencies, and representatives" all coordinated from a central office, a "sort of international bank"[42] based upon counterfeiting and facsimile money, a shadow "Bank of England, Nazi Branch!" At one point, this network even included Yugoslavia's partisans, from whom the SS would purchase arms, using the forged facsimile notes![43] Schwend also expanded the network to Swiss banks, since the Quality 1 notes had already passed muster, converting the facsimiles to real hard currency.[44] This is also an important point, for it illustrates the necessity, in any "industrial scale" counterfeiting operation: a "neutral point of entry" for the facsimile monies—or, as we shall see later, securities—is needed to ensure their "authenticity" and hence their convertibility into real money. This process was further aided and abetted by seeding genuine notes with the facsimiles when being converted to other hard currencies.[45]

[44] Ibid., p. 32.

Schwend's distribution network was so vast that his agents could be found in Africa, the USA, Argentina, Chile, Brazil, Uruguay, the Honduras, Japan, China, India, every European country, and, under his cover as a technical assistant to the German Embassy to the Vatican,[46] Schwend maintained close ties to that entity, and doubtless to its bank, the Institute for Religious Works. This is, as we shall see, not the only time we will encounter the Vatican's involvement with dubious financial dealings, and Nazis.

2. The Postwar Ties and Possibilities

Schwend's proposition that the Operation Bernhard facsimile money be used to provide Nazi intelligence an independent (and, so long as the scheme went undetected, nearly inexhaustible) source of funding independent of the Reich itself suggests the possibility that the operation continued in some form or fashion after the war, for even though the concentration camp inmates who provided the technical expertise would no longer have been available to the operation, the basic techniques and the hardware of industrial-scale counterfeiting had been perfected. It is additionally a well known fact that the Nazis did indeed hide much of the facsimile money and the plates used to produce it in various places in Europe after the war, indicating at least the intention of having the operation survive, presumably as a source of post-war Nazi covert activities. Additionally, Schwend's conversion of the Operation Bernhard facsimiles to real hard currency assets strongly suggests that his role in the operation was to aid in the preparation of the Nazi plans for the strategic evacuation of Europe and continuation underground after the war, by converting the facsimile money to real hard currency.

These possibilities gain additional strength when one considers the odd relationships of Schwend himself. He was, for example, related by marriage to Edouard Bunge,[47] part of the Bunge family corporation, which, of course, did business in Argentina under the company name of Bunge and Born. Bunge and Born was one of the leading companies to profit by massive stock manipulations just prior to the assassination of President Kennedy, suggesting to many (including this author), a connection to that event.

Just how large was Schwend's operation? Just how much, really, did Operation Bernhard and Schwend's distribution network accomplish? Burger, whose "conservative" figures we have cited previously, states that "By the end of the war the forged money would have amounted to 40 per cent of the authentic money in circulation."[48] Forty per cent, or, to put it more crudely, almost half of British money in circulation. Indeed, so much was in circulation that the Bank of England was simply forced to redesign all its banknotes completely after the war.

C. Conclusions

An interesting pattern has now emerged, and it is a pattern that will only grow in coming chapters and become more and more evident:

1) State-sponsored counterfeiting, or, to put it with Heydrich's more accurate, and chilling, phraseology, "unauthorized production" of undetectable facsimile banknotes was undertaken on an industrial scale, to the point that the fraud became a significant part of the circulating money supply, and could only be removed with difficulty;
2) Initially conceived as a means of economic warfare, Friedrich Schwend changed the motivation and purpose of the operation completely, by suggesting that such industrial scale forgery was a means of the virtually inexhaustible, and independent, means of financing Nazi intelligence and covert activities. It is a very short step from this realization, to the realization that it could be an independent funding mechanism for black research projects as well. It is therefore the funding mechanism itself—via industrial scale counterfeiting—that forms the link between covert operations and covert research projects;
3) Such independent funding also allowed the possibility that any such intelligence bureaucracy and/or secret research entity could conceivably, by dint of any such vast "unauthorized production" enterprise, become virtually independent of its controlling state and its financial institutions, whether public or private. Indeed, the Hungarian episode of forging French francs after World War One began as an effort of a disenfranchised elite more or less independently of the Hungarian government, but quickly came to rely on that government. It is conceivable therefore that, with sufficient scale, such a fraudulent enterprise could co-opt or at least greatly influence the financial sovereignty of a nation and its public and larger private financial institutions;

4) In the distribution of such facsimile money, it was crucial to have one or more "neutral points of entry" into the circulation stream, such as would be provided by banks with long practice in international banking. As was seen, this was accomplished through Switzerland and the Vatican.

As we will see in the coming chapters, these two "neutral points of entry" will recur in the story again, but to see how, we must journey forward in time, before, eventually, journeying back in time and half a world away from Europe, where the other Axis partner was constructing the other pillar of the finance of a breakaway civilization. Like Operation Bernhard, which reverse engineered the British pound sterling banknotes, we are having to reverse engineer a vast and hidden system of finance being used for vast and covert purposes. We have seen one of the players in this structure—Nazis. Now it is time to look at other players, namely, banks, and bishops…

"Tisserant waved that away. He was not at all concerned, he said, nor were any of those he had discussed this with. They all agreed that the American government would never accuse the Vatican of knowingly dealing in counterfeit stocks and bonds."
Richard Hammer[1]

The burden of the next three chapters will be to argue the case that industrial scale counterfeiting—or to use Heydrich's more accurate description, "unauthorized production of undetectable facsimiles" of money and securities—survived World War Two to become the favored method of the independent financing of the covert research and operations of the breakaway civilization. Like that civilization itself, this mechanism of finance, while deeply fraudulent, interfaces with the "real" world of public institutions to the point that it is part of what Professor Peter Dale Scott would call the "deep politics" of the age.

To put this point more succinctly, Operation Bernhard, at least conceptually, survived World War Two, as did the Fascist ideology which gave it birth. However, as will be suggested in the coming pages, there is also the possibility that it survived World War Two as a component of the post-war Nazi International, and interfaced with similar operations being conducted by quasi-independent or rogue groups within the American military-industrial-intelligence-finance complex, and with counterfeiting operations being conducted by the international criminal underground.

This is to say that the major factional structure of the breakaway civilization, in so far as its financial underpinnings are concerned, is composed of the following elements:

1) As noted above, a "rogue" or "deep political" element within the American military-inductrial-intelligence-finance complex.

[1] Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection, p. 212.

While the national composition of this faction is predominantly American and reflective of the dominant role of the U.S.A. within the global geopolitical situation, this faction has strong ties to similar oligarchical interests within Great Britain, and may be referred to as the Anglo-American elite. As an adjunct structure to this faction, one would also, for completeness' sake, have to mention that this elite interfaces with the elites of other countries—Japan, Germany, France, and so on—whose geopolitical, economic, and cultural interests are seen to coincide with that of the Anglo-American faction;

2) the international criminal underground, or Cosa Nostra, or Mafia;
3) an international Fascist element, or "Nazi International".

In this and the next two chapters, this factional structure, representing the major financial interests and commitments, will become clearer by an examination of…

A. The Bearer Bonds Scandals
1. The Japanese Bearer Bonds Scandal
a. General Comment

At the outset of our exploration of the "bearer bonds scandals," and their vast implications, it is important to bear a few principles in mind.

Suppose, for a moment, that someone is the member of a ring of counterfeiters intent—as all counterfeiters are—at making money by using counterfeit bills to buy a small item, and to receive "real" money in change. The technique is simple: the group has counterfeited a small quantity of twenty, fifty, or one hundred dollar bills, and has then used those bills to make small purchases, and receiving change from the cashier. Thus do counterfeiters make money.

This short overview contains within it the three essential methodological assumptions of any counterfeiting scheme:

1) One does not counterfeit something that does not currently exist as a medium of exchange, or that is not convertible into it. For example, it would be pointless to go to all the effort to produce a three dollar bill, for while they were once briefly issued by the Republic of Texas for the brief period of its existence, they are not now legal currency. Similarly one would not produce a four pound bill, or a seven yen bill, for such denominations of currency do not exist. One only counterfeits, or mimics, something real.

2) Similarly, one does not counterfeit five hundred, one thousand, five thousand, or ten thousand dollar bills, for while such denominations are genuine and were in circulation, two reasons would preclude the typical counterfeiting ring from making counterfeits of such large denominations. First, since the whole point of counterfeiting is to gain real currency in change for a transaction in which a counterfeit bill is tendered, normal transactions would preclude the use of large denominations for that reason, and additionally, the general use of such large denominations is not widespread and would attract attention. Large denominations are legal tender and have been circulated, but they are not generally circulated. Their use would draw suspicion. Secondly, large denominations would lie outside the normal affluence of the target group. One would not tender a five hundred dollar bill to purchase a roast and a few vegetables, and expect to get change easily. One only counterfeits what one can reasonably expect to tender in a transaction to a target group, and thus must tailor its counterfeit function to the target's scale of affluence, and do so without raising suspicion.
3) It follows from the two previous considerations that one must produce a "product" that is of sufficient quality to pass the scrutiny of the target group. One does not go to the expense and effort of producing a fraudulent product that cannot be used because it
   a) does not exist, or
   b) is too large a denomination to be traded with the target group, or
   c) is too poor in quality to be traded.

   To state the point differently, quality must be sufficiently high to ensure "first sight" acceptance of its authenticity by the target, even though it is not authentic.

b. Special Considerations of Industrial Scale Counterfeiting

The situation changes somewhat when the context is "industrial scale" counterfeiting, as was seen in the previous chapter, for problems of distribution arise that a typical counterfeiting operation does not encounter. Additionally, the situation changes if the target group is to be the very wealthy. In this instance, instruments of very large denominations, usually securities—stocks, bonds, and so on—become the favored vehicle. But a problem arises. The very wealthy will be much more cautious about parting with their (authentic) money, and the higher the denominated value of the counterfeited instrument, the more cautious the target group is likely to be. Additionally, a wealthy target group is likely to be privy to the existence of instruments most ordinary people do not even know exist, and are also able to call upon private intelligence resources to verify information. Nonetheless, the principles remain the same: one does not counterfeit what does not exist, and every effort must be made to present the "product" in as genuine a way as possible. There is, however, at this juncture an important additional consideration: since in this case one is counterfeiting much larger denominated instruments, one can only do so by dint of a similar access to information about various securities that is not generally available to the wider public. Trade in instruments of ten, twenty, fifty, or a hundred million dollars, or half a billion or a billion dollars, occurs at a rarefied level accessible only to a very few, and hence, any counterfeiting done at this level must likewise have access to information about that trade and the instruments traded. But the principle remains:

One does not counterfeit what does not exist.

Or to put that point even more subtly:

One does not counterfeit something that the very wealthy do not suspect exists, or know to exist.

With these thoughts in mind, we may now examine the first of the Bearer Bonds Scandals.

c. The Japanese Bearer Bond Scandal

On June 18, 2009, the website AsiaNews.it-en ran the following story:

> Mystery Surrounding 134.5 "Fake" Billion US Dollars Seized in Ponte Chiasso
> Milan (AsiaNews)—US government bonds seized by Italy's financial police (Guardia di Finanza) at Ponte Chiasso, an Italian town on the border with Switzerland, are "clearly fakes," Stephen Meyerhardt, spokesman for the US Bureau of the Public Debt, is quoted as saying in a news report by the Bloomberg agency. AsiaNews contacted the divisional headquarters of Italy's financial police in Como, which is responsible for Ponte Chiasso, asking for an explanation but none has come forth yet.

For some days the affair has been in the limelight. Importantly, at the time of the bonds were seized it was not possible to determine whether the US government bonds and US Federal Reserve certificates were real or fakes.

Right after the seizure Colonel Mecarelli, Guardia di Finanza commander in Como, said that for at least some of the securities, especially the 'Kennedy Bonds', there were doubts about their authenticity. As for the others, some were so well made that it was hard to tell them apart from real ones.

The seizure was carried out two weeks ago. The bonds were in the possession of two Oriental-looking individuals in their fifties with Japanese passports. The two men, were travelling from Milan to Chiasso, in Switzerland, on a local train used primarily by Italian workers commuting to-and-from Switzerland for work.

At the customs office both men said they had nothing to declare but a check by financial police agents revealed a false bottom in their respective suitcases, each containing a fortune in US securities.

Also inside the agents found extensive and detailed original bank documents about the bonds.

If the latter were real the two Asian men had in their possession (although not necessarily in their ownership) a big chunk of the US debt which would have made them the fourth largest creditors of the United Sates.

Despite what US Treasury spokesman Meyerhardt said, and until more information is forthcoming from Italy's financial police in Como for AsiaNews the mystery is still there.

Under Italian law when law enforcement agencies seize fake bonds or counterfeit money they are under the obligation to arrest the bearers. And in order to avoid misappropriation, the agency seizing the material, in this case the financial police, must quickly proceed to its destruction (i.e. incineration).

However, in case of real securities, after the securities holders are identified, the financial police must release them immediately after issuing a statement of confiscation and imposing a fine valued in this case at € 38 billion (US$ 53.4 billion). In this case, why were the two men released right away without any fine imposed?

That is not the only discrepancy. It is not clear how statements by US Treasury spokesman Meyerhardt and Italian financial police can be reconciled. For the former the bonds "are clearly fakes"; for the latter, speaking at the start of this whole affair, some bonds were indistinguishable from the real ones when it comes to quality and detail.

Italy's Guardia di Finanza has a reputation for being a highly specialised and expert financial police agency. How could it be so > easily duped! And if the bonds are "clearly fakes" why did it take US authorities two weeks to find out.

> Another discrepancy is the fact that, along with the securities, original and recent bank documents were seized as proof of their authenticity.
> If what Meyerhardt says is true, some major financial institutions have been deceived by the securities carried by the two Asian men. This would be a bombshell and raise serious questions as to how many bank assets are actually made up of securities that for Meyerhardt are "clearly fakes."
> If counterfeit securities of such high quality are in circulation the world's monetary system, let alone that of the United States, is in danger. International trade and exchanges could come to a halt.
>
> Whether it is counterfeit money or money laundering, what happened is potentially more dangerous for the stability of the international system than the results of Iran's elections.
> If the bonds are real it means someone with a lot of cash no longer trusts the US dollar as a reserve currency. If this is the case then it would spell the end of the Bretton Woods system and most likely negatively impact world trade.
> Unfortunately the international press and main TV networks, with some exceptions, have ignored the whole affair. These days this is actually the real news.[2]

Asia News was not the only media source to pick up the story, as it was repeated throughout Europe, but strangely, it was almost completely absent in the American media. Briefly covered, it was forgotten by the major media, but certainly not in the alternative research community. Interest grew until the point that even President Obama, during a press conference, had to issue bland assurances that the recovered bonds were nothing but fakes. As this and the next two chapters will suggest, there may be deep covert reasons to suspect that they were not.

d. My Own Personal Coverage of the Story

As Asia News and others were reporting the story, there appeared to me to be problems, and I began to follow this story on my website where I posted a number of articles on the Japanese, and subsequent Spanish, Italian, and Filipino bearer bonds scandals, which are reviewed here.

[2] http://www.asianews.it/news-en/Mystery-surrounding-134.5-%E2%80%9Cfake%E2%80%9D-billion-US-dollars-seized-in-Ponte-Chiasso-remains-15556.html.

In a series of articles entitled "Japan: Connecting Some Dots", I outlined what the anomalies of the Japanese bearer bonds scandal were. As outlined in the Asia News and other sources, the basic story is as follows:

"On June 3, 2009, the Italian financial police, the Guardia di Finanza, seized two Japanese men who were traveling by an early train into Switzerland at the border town of Ponte-Chiasso. The two men were travelling on a train heavily populated by Italian workers commuting into the country for work. The two men were apprehended carrying a briefcase with a false bottom, which contained 249 bearer bonds in $500,000,000 denominations, plus ten so-called "Kennedy bonds", each denominated with the unheard of value of $1,000,000,000 each. Some of the $500,000,000 bearer bonds were dated as far back as 1934.[3] This date, as we shall see later in this chapter and again in chapter 4, is a crucial component to the story.

"As the story unfolded in the press, various U.S. government sources were quoted as stating that no bearer bonds in five hundred million dollar denominations were ever issued by the U.S. government. Yet, according to the media stories, even though these statements were being made, "the Italian authorities at the time of the arrest were waiting for the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission to make a declaration as to their authenticity."[4] This, though I did not know it at the time, was an important clue that indeed the Italian authorities may have known something.

"Indeed, the anomalies of the story only grew. Bloomberg and a number of other sources, including Der Spiegel in Germany and Asia News, reported the almost "Heydrich-like" quality of the bonds "were all so well executed that they were 'indistinguishable from the real ones.'"[5] Others began to notice the anomalies and inconsistencies in the story, J.S. Kim among them (I reproduce his important internet article here for completeness' sake):

[5] Ibid.

Here's yet another huge financial story that has been virtually blacked out by the US financial media. Although on the surface, this story appears to be a non-event, if we consider some of the released facts about this case, you will understand why I consider it to be a huge story. On June 8th, the Asia News reported the following story:

"Italy's financial police (Guardia italiana di Finanza) has seized US bonds worth US 134.5 billion from two Japanese nationals at Chiasso (40 km from Milan) on the border between Italy and Switzerland. They include 249 US Federal Reserve bonds worth US$ 500 million each, plus ten Kennedy bonds and other US government securities worth a billion dollars each. Italian authorities have not yet determined whether they are real or fake, but if they are real the attempt to take them into Switzerland would be the largest financial smuggling operation in history; if they are fake, the matter would be even more mind-boggling because the quality of the counterfeit work is such that the fake bonds are undistinguishable from the real ones."

Here are just a few fascinating facts about this case (at least they are being reported as "facts" at this current time):

(1) Though the smugglers have been identified in the press as "Japanese nationals" there has yet to be any confirmation if the smugglers were indeed Japanese or of some other ethnicity. How difficult is it to confirm the ethnicity of the smugglers and why is this information being kept secret?

(2) According to a brief Bloomberg article regarding this story, the seized bearer bonds allegedly were dated as of 1934. Since bearer bonds in denominations of $500 million did not exist in 1934, the bonds were deduced as fake, though the Italian police are still waiting for a declaration regarding the bonds' authenticity from the SEC. There is something truly "off" about this declaration. How can the quality of the forged bearer bonds be so meticulous that they "are indistinguishable from the real ones", yet the people involved in the alleged forgery so ill-informed as to not date the bearer bonds with a more recent year that would not immediately identify them as fraudulent? How hard would it have been to date the bearer bonds with a more recent year? An equivalent analogy would be if an expert art forger meticulously re-created a Picasso oil canvas and then erroneously signed the work with the wrong artist's name. This story just does not add up.

(3) The Bloomberg story also reported that there is no known existence of the alleged 10 Kennedy bonds that were discovered in the smuggler's suitcases, each with a denomination of $1 billion. Again, this discovery defies any logical explanation. Why would expert counterfeiters make 249 bearer bonds with denominations of $500 million apiece, each indistinguishable from the real thing, and then instead of just making 20 more such bonds, decide to make 10 bonds in denominations of $1 billion a piece in a bearer bond design that has never existed? Were the alleged counterfeiters just too lazy to confirm if Kennedy bearer bonds were ever a legitimately issued security? Again, this story makes no sense.

(4) On March 30, 2009, the US Treasury Department announced that USD $134.5 billion remained in its Troubled Asset Relief Program [TARP]. The stated amount of seized bearer bonds was $134.5 billion. Coincidence?

(5) The two well-dressed Japanese men opted to travel to Chiasso on a local train normally full of Italian manual laborers commuting to Switzerland. If they were really intent on successfully smuggling these bonds, counterfeit or real, why would they not take more care to select a travel route in which it was literally impossible for them not to stick out like two sore thumbs? Again, this part of the story defies all logic.

(6) The bearer bonds were discovered in a hidden briefcase compartment after a customs inspection. Again, if the bonds were indeed authentic and owned by a nation state, they could have been transported in a diplomatic pouch exempt from customs searches that would have guaranteed transport without detection. Thus, all of the above irreconcilable and illogical points, other than the coincidence of the amount of the bearer bonds exactly matching the remaining TARP fund amount declared on March 30th, seem to indicate that not only were the seized bearer bonds counterfeit, but also that the smugglers were intent on being caught. Before I continue, let's review the purpose of bearer bonds.

Here is the Wikipedia definition of bearer bonds:

"A bearer bond is a debt security issued by a business entity, such as a corporation, or by a government. It differs from the more common types of investment securities in that it is unregistered—no records are kept of the owner, or the transactions involving ownership. Whoever physically holds the paper on which the bond is issued owns the instrument. This is useful for investors who wish to retain anonymity. The downside is that in the event of loss or theft, bearer bonds are extremely difficult to recover."

If you recall the Michael Mann movie "Heat", starring Robert DeNiro and Al Pacino, during a daring daytime armored car robbery, the criminals specifically targeted millions of dollars of bearer bonds for theft precisely because of the above qualities of bearer bonds that make them very difficult to trace. Again, due to the properties of bearer bonds, it seems highly unlikely that $134.5 billion of bearer bonds would be transported, if they were real, by two men with no security, since theft almost guarantees that they would be lost forever.

Thus far, about the only piece of information that appears to be reliable as reported by various news sources regarding this huge mystery is the remarkable authenticity of the 249 seized bearer bonds in denominations of USD $500 million. If any of the other facts, as they are being reported, are remotely accurate, then the bearer bonds were likely counterfeit. Still, the interesting part of this story, at least to me, is that the smugglers seemed intent on being caught with the counterfeit bonds. This leads me back to my previous question. What possible reason would the smugglers have for wanting to be caught? One of the quickest ways to sabotage and usher in the death of a currency is to raise legitimate questions about its ability to withstand counterfeiting efforts. Prove that counterfeiting is not only possible but highly likely, and the world's confidence in the sabotaged currency will undoubtedly plummet.

In fact, this very tactic was applied during World War II when the Nazis launched Operation Bernhard in an attempt to crash the British economy by producing, by 1945, 132 million expertly counterfeited British pounds, a figure that represented roughly 15% of all real British pounds in circulation at the time. The counterfeit pounds were produced by expert printers and engravers supervised by an SS officer named Bernhard Krueger. As well, historical evidence exists that the Allies considered launching a counter-counterfeit plan against the Nazis as well. During this time, it was also alleged that the Bank of Italy counterfeited their own money by issuing the same securities twice with identical registered numbers and codes in order. The purpose of this counterfeiting was to secretly expand monetary supply without public transparency or accountability. Perhaps then, this $134.5 billion bearer bond mystery was an attempt of a nation state to shake the world's confidence in the position of the US dollar as the world's reserve currency.

There should be little debate that the world's emerging economies in Russia, Brazil, China and certain Gulf Nations are at economic war today with the world's Western nations and their economic allies. The currency war being fought today is sure to get much uglier in the foreseeable future, in both open tactics as well as secretly executed tactics. Currently, if the currency war were the world series of poker, the US and the UK would be holding a pair of 2s and relying on nothing but bluffs to keep the rest of the world at bay. Conversely, the Chinese and other emerging nations with large surpluses would be holding straight or royal flushes, and likely quietly maneuvering to go "all in" at some point.

Given that the discovery of $134.5 billion of bearer bonds in the suitcases of two Japanese nationals in Chiasso, Italy on the border of Switzerland qualifies as one of the largest smuggling operations in history, and given the various implications of such an act and the possible players involved, the silence regarding this huge story is simply stunning. It is not a huge story, per se, because of the counterfeiting operation, because accusations and revelations of > massive money counterfeiting operations have occurred in the past. It is a huge story, rather, due to all the inconsistencies of the story and the potential explanations that could explain these inconsistencies. The larger story at hand is, who are the players (nations) involved, and what was the intention of this likely counterfeiting operation? Maybe the future will reveal the answers to these questions. But maybe not.[6]

As Kim notes, how can one maintain on the one hand that the bonds were so flawlessly executed as to be indistinguishable from the real thing, and yet counterfeit denominations that did not ever exist not according to American securities experts? Moreover, as Kim also notes, the billion-dollar "Kennedy bonds" were never known to exist at all, so a similar problem, though larger, looms with respect to them. The inclusion of the ten fake "Kennedy" billion dollar bonds among a stash otherwise "flawlessly executed" would only serve to draw attention to the possibility that the other bonds were forgeries. Kim asks the logical question:

> …(This) discovery defies any logical explanation. Why would expert counterfeiters make 249 bearer bonds with denominations of $500 million apiece, each indistinguishable from the real thing, and then instead of just making 20 more such bonds, decide to make 10 bonds in denominations of $1 billion apiece in a bearer bond design that never has existed? Were the alleged counterfeiters just too lazy to confirm if Kennedy bearer bonds were ever a legitimately issued security? Again, this story makes no sense.

Others quickly pointed out other anomalies. For example, on March 30, 2009, barely sixty days before the Italian authorities seized the smugglers, the U.S. Treasury reported that its Troubled Asset Relief Program had exactly $134.5 billion" remaining, exactly the amount seized in Italy.

At this juncture, I commented as follows:

> This fact led some to speculate that, in fact, the bonds—including the so-called Kennedy bearer bonds—were real, but that they had been secretly issued by elements in the American government to keep the economy afloat. Others continued to maintain the counterfeit story. Some began to advance the argument that the Treasury's announcement in March of 2009 would have allowed two months for forgerers to counterfeit the exact amount of bonds and then allow them to be caught, in a murky economic warfare operation.

There is, however, one fact of the story that is overlooked, and I am surprised no one has mentioned it: the so-called $1 billion denominated "Kennedy" bonds, a denomination that never existed, so we're told. But consider the supreme irony that one of America's last presidents to challenge the "authority" of the Federal Reserve by an executive order to issue $4 billion-plus in debt-free United States Notes during his presidency, was murdered a mere five months after signing the order to do so. We'll get back to the "Kennedy bonds" …because in my opinion, they may hold the key to the story.

This raises two possibilities to my mind: (1) if these "Kennedy" bonds were legitimate, or at least, counterfeits of legitimate but secretly issued "Kennedy" bonds, then this means, as others have pointed out, that someone in the American government was issuing securities secretly, and it means that whoever was behind this operation had access to that extraordinarily secret knowledge, and it also means that someone within the American government had a rather droll sense of irony, denominating such large bonds with Kennedy's image in a bizarre "message"; (2) if they were straightforwardly counterfeit with no basis in reality, then again, the choice of Kennedy as the image on the bonds was again a rather droll "message."

These possibilities highlight an inescapable conclusion: If we assume that all these bonds were counterfeit, then the mere fact that they were such excellent—almost "indistinguishable"—exemplars of the genuine articles means that whoever was behind the counterfeiting operation ultimately had to be a nation-state in possession the genuine article. Only the genuine article could have provided any counterfeiters with an exemplar to imitate, and thus, ultimately, there is a holder of US securities behind this operation at some point. This means, additionally, that the context by which to interpret the Kennedy bonds changes dramatically, for if the counterfeits are based on secret exemplars then a clear message is being sent to whatever circles in the American parapolitical power structure as secretly issued them: We know the game. And little changes if the Kennedy bonds are totally illegitimate.

The question is, who would that nation-state behind the counterfeiting be? Obviously, they would be large holders of American debt, and with an ability to counterfeit near-perfect bonds, implying technological sophistication.[7]

In other words, whoever was behind the counterfeits had to have "inside knowledge" concerning the originals, and the technological ability to produce "unauthorized facsimiles."

We may state the possibilities of analysis here somewhat differently than when I first examined the case: if the bonds or any portion of them were real, then why would two men be traveling to Switzerland with them? The answer seems obvious: Switzerland would be the logical place to make a sale, even at discount, to whatever customer waited on the other end, for Switzerland had the international banks familiar with, and able to authenticate, such bearer bonds. If, on the other hand, the bonds or any portion of them were indeed counterfeit, then it would appear the two men were deliberately trying to attract attention. The question is, why? That question must await its answer to a later point in this chapter, after our examination of the Spanish, Italian, and Filipino bearer bonds scandals, each variations on the theme.

In any case, the most crucial point of my analysis then remains the central core thesis of these chapters: a covert system of finance is represented by the bearer bonds, and this thesis, as we shall discover, only grows in strength the closer one looks at the details of the story. Indeed, in this respect, it is important to note that it took U.S. officials some two weeks to make a public statement to the Italian authorities that the securities that they had seized were counterfeit. Why the delay, unless the "fakes" were so good that they raised serious questions? Or unless they were genuine and a cover story had to be worked out, and a course of action be agreed upon as to what to do with the securities?"[8] Or unless the "fakes", as all counterfeits and facsimiles are, were based upon some real world exemplar, an exemplar that, for whatever reason, the financial powers did not wish known?[9]

[9] Another difficulty with the story, as I observed in the article, was why the Italian authorities did not allow the Japanese men across the border, and simply place them under surveillance, to see who their contacts might be? In other words, the Italian financial police seemed, for whatever reason, to violate a cardinal principle of intelligence work.

e. The Billion Dollar Fake Kennedy Bonds, and a Message from Japan, and from Space

As indicated in the citations from my own articles on the Japanese Bearer Bond scandal quoted above, I believe the key to the story lies, paradoxically, with the bonds that are self-evidently fake, the so-called "Kennedy" bonds.

Shortly after the episode, alleged samples of the "Kennedy Bonds" began to be circulated on the Internet:

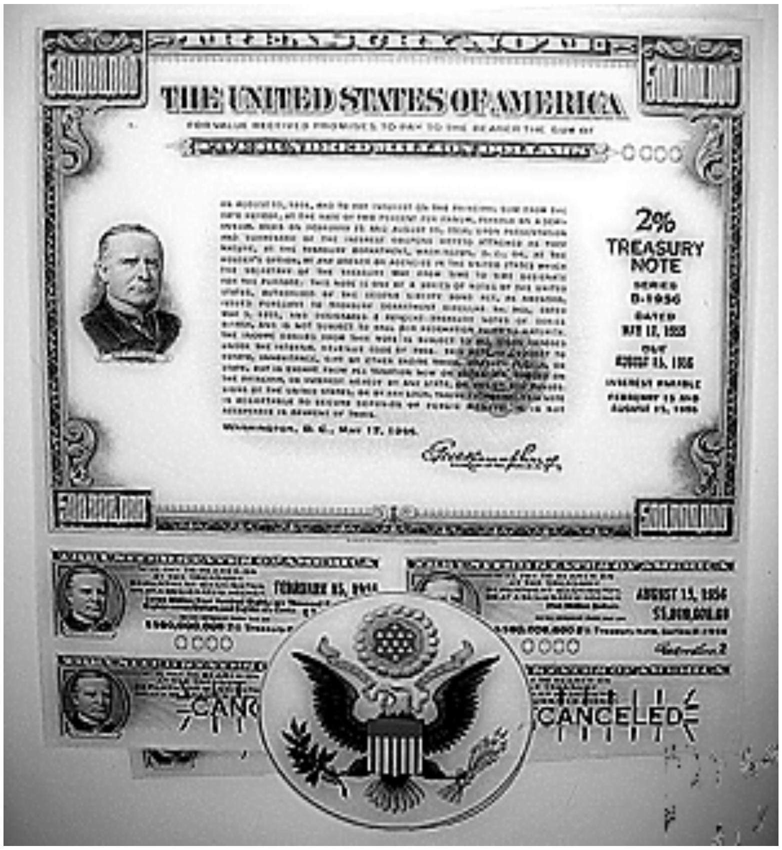
The Billion Dollar Fake Kennedy Bearer Bond

Before proceeding with reproducing the analysis I offered on my website, it is important to note that no evidence or proof was ever forthcoming on the internet to demonstrate that these were indeed images of the "Kennedy bonds" seized by the Italian authorities. Consequently, we are left with two possibilities, implying two slightly different scenarios and bases of interpretation: (1) the images have no connection to the bonds actually seized in Italy, or (2) the images are images of the bonds actually seized by the Guardia di Finanza. At the time I composed my original analysis, I assumed the second case for purposes of analysis:

> Now, on the surface of it, this (Kennedy bond) looks entirely faked. Before we consider this image, let's compare it to an image of a legitimate $500,000,000 US Treasury bearer bond:



THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

2% TREASURY NOTE

CANCELED

> Now let's compare. (1) The legitimate bond immediately above has the red seal of the United States Treasury clearly stamped on the obverse right side of the header, with the coupons clearly visible beneath the note; (2) this seal is clearly missing from the "Kennedy bond," lending credence to the publicly stated evaluations of these bonds as plain counterfeits.

But let us consider once again the implication of the view that the "Kennedy bond" is a counterfeit. First, why would anyone issue such a counterfeit bond, with no evident connection to anything real, or place a facsimile of the seal of the US Treasury on the bond itself thus only drawing attention to its potential counterfeit nature? Second, why would anyone issue a counterfeit bond for such an extremely high amount of money, an amount virtually guaranteeing that any potential purchaser would immediately seek to verify the bond?

I submit that there is a message being sent by this bond, and it is a message that works regardless if one views this strange securities instrument as legitimate or faked, for note the reverse of the bond: we have a clear image of the Moon, a clear image of the space shuttle lifting off, and on the obverse, the image of President John F. Kennedy, and a red seal of some sort. Consider then the imagery and the message being sent here. A red seal of the US treasury only appears on American currency notes—United States Notes—issued directly and debt-free by the US Government. Kennedy was the last president to order the issuance of such money. He was also, of course, the president that set the goal of American space exploration in the 1960s with his designation of the Moon as the target for manned landings before the 1960s had closed.

So to my mind, there is another message being sent in the bearer bonds episode, and that is, it has something to do with space. The important question here is: why would a bond-smuggling operation, whether or not the bonds were real or counterfeit, be smuggling such instruments, and my conclusion is, that we may be looking at a part of the funding mechanism for a vast covert space program, with the "collateral" clearly imaged on the reverse of the bond header itself: space, and whatever might be found out there. Hence, the use of a red seal—connoting a debt-free money—might be significant. We might, in short, be looking at a funding mechanism for covert space activities and programs, and hence, be looking at a very real bond, with, quite literally, the Moon as collateral. We might, so to speak, even be looking at a hidden funding mechanism for Mr. Richard Dolan's idea of a "breakaway civilization." If so, that would account for the virtually total absence of news coverage of the story in American media and its virtual disappearance as a story in the rest of the world's media. If this admittedly wild and radical, not to mention completely speculative scenario is at all true, it may be the hidden reason why the USA has not publicly gone back to the Moon, and why other nations are so intent on getting there.

All this now places the Japanese political context once again in a peculiar perspective, for recently the Japanese Space Agency, JAXA, began releasing images of the Moon…

We can easily imagine that the High definition tv images that Japan's mission gathered were equally impressive.[10]

On the view that the Kennedy billion dollar bearer bonds were faked by the counterfeiters themselves, then it would appear that the message might indeed have been that whatever reality as lies behind the counterfeits concerns space in general, and more particularly, the Moon and whatever might be upon it (a possibility whose implications are enormous, if the claims of some that there are artificial and possibly ancient structures on the Moon are true). In addition, a more basic message is present, namely, that a hidden tier of finance exists, represented by bearer bonds denominated in extraordinary amounts of money, amounts that imply that the owners of such bonds are in an elite circle of wealth, power, and knowledge.

However, on the view that the Kennedy billion dollar bearer bonds were merely images circulated by someone other than the counterfeiters, the message would still appear to be the same, and in each case, the one is dealing with people in possession of exclusive, hidden knowledge.

Is there any evidence to corroborate such speculations, reasonable though they may be?

There is, but in order to appreciate it, one must examine the image of the Kennedy bearer bond more closely:

Close Up of Obverse of the Fake One Billion Dollar Kennedy Bond

What concerns us here is the large seal in the center right of the bond's face, which clearly says "Money World" and which in the original image on line, is in red, in a color reminiscent of the red color of the seal of the U.S. Treasury on United States Notes.

A visit to Money World's website at http://www.moneyworld.com.sg/ disclosed the following, which I reviewed in yet another internet article after a friend brought it to my attention:

> MoneyWorld Asia first started as a numismatic company dealing in money collectibles and commemorative products. Our humble beginning has enabled us to forge close relations with major central banks in the world, including the Bank of England, the US Bureau of Printing & Engraving, The Reserve Bank of Australia and New Zealand, as well as the Board of Commissioners of Currency-Singapore (BCCS). "
> MoneyWorld Asia is one of the region's most trusted and reliable Foreign Exchange and Remittance dealer, with offices in seven countries and a presence across the Asia Pacific. We are the world's leader in Foreign Exchange and Electronic Funds Transfers, constantly innovating and developing new products and forging new channels for the benefit of our clients.

> A significant milestone was our active participation at the Handover of Hong Kong to the People's Republic of China in 1997, where we co-ordinated the commemorative notes to mark this momentous occasion"
> MoneyWorld Asia is a foreign exchange operator, specializing in cash handling services to enable individuals and businesses to conduct cross-border transactions. Our clients include Multi-National Corporations, educational institutions, government agencies, retailers, duty-free concessions and hotels.
> Since our inception in 1991, MoneyWorld Asia has enlarged our business focus in the world of money. We have established a two-pronged business strategy: money changing and remittance services, and numismatic products.
> MoneyWorld has today entrenched itself firmly in the global forex markets, with the added specialization in niche currencies such as the Chinese RMB (Yuan), Malaysian Ringgit (MYR) and the Indonesian Rupiah (INR). As these are non-tradable currencies, MoneyWorld's correspondent offices in these countries have provided our clients with a constant availability of these currencies, allowing them to transact with their partners in these currencies quickly and without fuss.[11]

In other words, a corporation like Money World, specializing in international currency transactions to nations with non-convertible currency—such as the People's Republic of China—would conceivably know about a hidden system of finance represented by large denomination bearer bonds, and indeed, this is not the only time we will encounter a Chinese component to the story, for there will be an astonishing corroboration of this Chinese component in chapter four (and it will come as corroboration of the hypothesis that such bonds are indeed based upon some form of real life authentic exemplar). In any case, such a company would also possibly be accustomed to handling large bearer bonds. Finally, such a company would also be in a position to know about a hidden system of finance represented by such bonds.

Thus, even on the view that the images of the fake Kennedy bonds did not come from the actual instruments confiscated by the Italian authorities, but from someone else, it would appear that "someone else" was very well-informed.

What of the two alleged Japanese men who were detained by Italian authorities? Unbelievably, they were released and made their way back to Japan, a fact that invites its own speculations. Why, after apprehending two individuals with an enormous sum of money in the form of allegedly faked securities, would they subsequently be released? under normal circumstances, those accused of counterfeiting are normally detained until trial, and for amounts of forgery far less than one hundred thirty-four billion five hundred million dollars!

[11] Joseph P. Farrell, "More Information on the Japanese Bearer Bonds," May 4, 2011, http://gizadeathstar.com/2011/05/more-information-on-the-japanese-bearer-bonds/

Were they released because they knew something and blackmailed the authorities? or, ultimately, because they blackmailed even the United States? Or were they released because they had diplomatic immunity from the Japanese or some other Asian government? Or, finally, were they released because, in reality, none of the seized securities were counterfeit at all?

Regardless of the answers to these questions, we have then, the following set of facts and tentative conclusions and implications:

1) There is an Asian connection to this first bearer bonds scandal, via
    a) the two alleged Japanese men detained, and subsequently released, and
    b) via the Kennedy bonds' connection to "Money World," a currency and securities trading company with obvious experience in Asian and Chinese business;
2) The amount of money concerned was large, if not huge: $134,500,000,000;
3) This money was contained in instruments of bearer bonds, denominated in amounts of $500,000,000 and in the case of the Kennedy bonds, $1,000,000,000 each;
4) Some of these bonds were dated 1934, a significant date as will be seen, for it becomes part of a consistent pattern in similar episodes, as will eventually be seen;
5) The U.S. government, two weeks after the event, denied that any of the bonds were authentic, and that any bearer bonds in one billion dollar denominations, had ever been issued. Nonetheless, Italian authorities had to wait two weeks before such denials were firm, and finally released the two Japanese men, in itself an inexplicable event if indeed they were suspected as being part of a counterfeiting ring or smuggling ring, facts which suggests that at least some aspects of the "counterfeit bonds" were indeed genuine;
6) Finally, on any view, it seems evident that the episode was designed to send messages, namely, that there is a hidden tier of system of finance of very large, though hidden, scale in the > world, and that it has something to do with local outer space and whatever may be present in it, and indeed, we have seen the suggestion that outer space has been collateralized as a component of this structure, implying, of course, a means of steadier access to it than chemical rockets and small payloads.

With these tentative implications and conclusions in hand, we may now turn to other bearer bonds scandals.

2. The Spanish Bearer Bonds Scandal

Had the Japanese Bearer Bond Scandal of 2009 been the only one, the forces attempting to deny any substance behind the "fakes" would doubtless have rested easier.

But it was not the only such story. In fact, there were repeat performances, in Spain, and later, in Italy once again, and both involved such astronomical sums of "counterfeited" securities that the incidents became national security concerns. This in itself, as we shall discover, raises implications, but before these can be considered, a review of the Spanish and Italisn incidents is necessary, beginning with the Spanish incident which, like the Japanese scandal, occurred in the same year, and the same month: June 2009. I reported on this incident in a paper written on my website for the members' subscription area, and reproduce it in full, with accompanying pictures, since the arguments made in it are crucial to the case we are building here, namely, that these scandals are based on a real, though covert, system of finance, and that this system of finance is being used to fund black research projects and covert operations:

> The story originated in Barcelona, Spain, in 2009, and of course, was not reported in any mainstream or independent media in the USA, making the rounds only recently on the internet. The story was first reported in June 2009:

$1.64 Trillion Of Federal Reserve Note Series 1934 Bonds In Spain Seizure (2009) by, Unwanted Publicity Intelligence—Staff Writer

October 18, 2010 08:47:42 Update (Original: October 10, 010 09:42:08)
USA, Washington, D.C.—October 14, 2010—Combining criminal intrinsic and face values of what federal law enforcement authorities seized in Spain, should have stopped counting at $1,664,082,000,000 trillion U.S. dollars (that-is: $1,664 billion) by June 2009 by what 'only local news reports' identified as an investigation that actually began beforehand during March 2009 when federal law enforcement investigators began "Operation Morgenthaus."

Summarized detailed information highlights of this, the world's largest 'face value' federal law enforcement seizure of U.S. Federal Reserve Bank paper, i.e. Federal Reserve Notes and Federal Reserve Bonds, currency cash, gold coins, microfilm plus what is believed to have actually been 'multiple serial numbered' blue colored 'non-reprographic matte card engraving plates' recently determined by a private researcher for the Unwanted Publicity Information Group deciphering multiple language translations and conversions [Catalan into English and Spanish into English] extrapolated information from Spain and Catalan news articles (a few of which—but not all—viewed below) then performed further research and analysis surrounding "Operation Morgenthau," involved:

- Multiple seizure locations:
- Financial institution locations (Terrassa, Spain and Barcelona, Spain);
- Initial detection location (Catalonia, Spain (aka) Cataluña, España);
    - Other suspected location (Catalan, Spain);
    - Believed origination location (Manila, Philippines);
    - Target victims wealthy 'businessmen';
- 57-year old unidentified businessman (Marbella, Spain)—largest seizure;

- British (UK) unidentified businessman (Ibiza, Spain);
- Millionaire unidentified—imprisoned beforehand—home (Centelles, Spain);
- 60-year old unidentified resident (Terrassa, Barcelona, Spain);
- 5 suitcases (2 metal);

- 1 briefcase;
- $1,500,000,000,000 trillion dollars (USD)—face value—(believed bearing multiple sequential serial numbers) on blue card stock ('non-reprographic blue' color 'matte' engraving plate card stock used in a printing press);
- $126,500,000,000 billion dollars (USD)—face value—total amongst many U.S. Federal Reserve Note Series 1934 Bonds (interest bearing coupon bonds);
- $20,000,000,000 billion dollars (USD)—face value—total of ten (10) at $2 billion each "International Bill Of Exchange" (bills of exchange / drafts);
- $16,582,000,000 billion dollars (USD)—face value—total amongst many U.S. Federal Reserve Bank Series 1934 Federal Reserve Notes (FRNs); and,

The investigators believe that more people could buy false billion bonds

Two Entrepreneurs Fall Into A Millionaire Holy Card Scam by, Albert Martin Vidal (Barcelona)

June 3, 2009 2:00 Updated: June 3, 2009 2:01

At least two [2] Spain people, obsessively raised by the following (immediately below), the same two [2] known victims of a scam that the regional police detected yesterday:

OUESTION: "Would you buy a tattered bag for between 30,000 and 40,000 euros?"

ANSWER: “I would, if thousands of millions of dollars were inside.”

QUESTION: “Do you suspect such a treasure would be sold in exchange for a few thousand dollars?”

The Catalan [Catalonia (also known as) Cataluña] police, in an operation in which they worked with the U.S. Secret Service, warned yesterday there may be dozens of entrepreneurs in Spain victims of this scam.

From detainees, with the operation still open, investigators intercepted three [3] bags with counterfeit currency and bonds worth 16.5 billion dollars.

The scammers, who are still being sought, offered the bags with their fraudulent content to wealthy entrepreneurs. In return, they demanded between 30,000 and 40,000 euros.

The central area chief investigator of organized crime, Jordi Oller, said that fraudsters were in contact with their victims, in most cases economic entrepreneurs, highly liquid, with staged careful study, to lend legitimatization to their deception.

The thieves explained that they possessed valuable 1934 documents—of the U.S. Federal Reserve—found after World War II in some cases that were sent to the area of Japan, but those had redemption problems. To solve that, they wanted to litigate against the Federal Reserve. They claimed that once the case was won, the bonds would be redeemed generously by the beneficiaries. If the victims agreed to pay, to defray the expenses of the trial, the scammers would give them the aged bags—giving the appearance of authenticity—but then disappear.

In the bags were all suitably-aged certificates of guarantee, gold coins, microfilm, counterfeit bonds plus $100,000 [Series 1934 ‘gold seal’ Federal Reserve Notes] issued by the U.S. Treasury to be used interbank [between U.S. Central Bank branches within the Federal Reserve System].

Wet Paper

The investigators began their investigation after locating in Terrassa (Barcelona) a person who visited various banks asking how he could collect a series of bonds issued by the United States in 1934. Once located, the Catalan police found the businessman had counterfeit bonds, currencies and notes worth $126,500,000 million dollars plus two [2] bills of exchange [international bill of exchange] amounting to $1,000,000,000 billion (USD) and $20,000,000,000 billion (USD) dollars.

Subsequently, in Marbella, investigators found another businessman who acted on behalf of an Englishman living in Ibiza [Spain] with 16,000,000,000 billion in fake paper money, in addition to a stack of blue cards they made him believe were worth $1.5 trillion (USD).

Between one and the other, they had a total of three [3] cases with the same face of astonishment.

Let us pause and take note of a significant, and obvious, fact, but one which is scarcely commented upon. The $100,000 Woodrow Wilson gold certificate note is a genuine piece of American currency, but it was never issued for use in general circulation. Rather, it was used in private circulation between the branch banks of the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank system itself.

This means that while the general public is circulating the Federal Reserve's monetized debt notes, privately the Federal Reserve Banks themselves are circulating a wholly different kind of money, a money based on gold certificates. One is looking directly at a different kind of money, and therefore, since this was never circulated publicly, at a different tier, a private tier, of finance. This important point will become crucial to remember as the bearer bonds story unfolds, to which, in its Spanish version, we now return:

As I noted in the members' paper on my website, the cited article on the Internet contained a further expansion to the Spanish Bearer Bond story:

> It has the support of the United States Secret Service.

At this juncture, the presentation of the other internet articles concluded, and I began my own analysis:

> For the sake of argument here, we shall assume the story, and the pictures, are real and authentic. In this case, we draw attention to the following facts laid out by the Spanish press:
> - The financial institutions involved were located in Terrassa and Barcelona, Spain

- The scam was initially detected in Catalonia
- The believed origin of the scam and its faked securities and monies was in Manila, the Philippines
- Two businessmen were apparently involved, one 57 years old and unidentified, and another unidentified businessman apparently of British origin
- the amount of the bearer bonds was an unheard of $1,500,000,000,000
- another $126,500,000,000 was apparently in 1934 Federal Reserve bonds with coupons
- $20,000,000,000 were in international Bills of Exchange
- $1,000,000,000 was in US 100,000 gold certificate currency notes, banded with J.P Morgan-Chase metal bands of bundles of $10,000,000 each (doing the math here means that there was a total of one hundred such bands)
- An unspecified amount of the money was in the form of gold coins
- The haul included documentation and microfilm, the contents of which are not specified, but it may be assumed that the documents and microfilms constituted some sort of authentication of the various securities.

B. A Brief Speculative Analysis

When one reads the articles and the numerous comments accompanying it, the following points must be stressed:

1. The 100,000 gold certificate was indeed issued by the US government, and some 42,000 were eventually printed, though these bills were only used in circulation between banks of the Federal Reserve System and never in general circulation. This appears to be known by the scammers, since the bills were found in cases and strongboxes purportedly originating from the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Texas.
2. The use of such gold certificates circulating between the banks of the Federal Reserve system, which the money in general circulation at the time was not gold-backed, suggested that a secret two-tiered money system was put into play ca. the earliest days of the Administration of Franklin Roosevelt. This has two further implications:
    a. The first implication is precisely that we are looking at a hidden system of finance, and thus possibly at the first steps toward the creation of a breakaway civilization.
    b. The second implication is that the scammers—in both the case of the Japanese bearer-bond scandal, and in this instance—were aware of this system, and of the fact that a certain upper tier of the world's super-rich were aware of this system as well, thus enabling the possibility that their scam would have some chance of success. To put this point differently, the market must exist for such frauds to be perpetrated, and that strongly implies that such a two-tiered financial structure has been covertly put into place.

3. Points 2a and 2b above thus imply a third implication, namely, that both the Japanese and Spanish bond scandals are in fact sophisticated operations, based upon possible insider intelligence concerning the nature of this two-tiered financial structure—a public one and a covert one—and upon some specialized knowledge of the nature of the securities issue in the covert one, official US Government denials of the authenticity of such securities notwithstanding.
4. It is further to be noted that these bond scandals have emerged in a time period coterminous with the move of the BRICS nations—Russia, China, India, and Brazil—away from the dollar as a reserve currency, thus suggesting the possibility that the Japanese and Spanish bond scandals are not isolated incidents from each other, but rather, connected in some deep fashion, perhaps having to do with economic warfare. It is to be noted that in the comments section of the blogsite sited here, that the Philippine connection strongly suggested a connection to the gold hidden there by Japanese general Yamashita toward the end of the Pacific War. This gold in turn represented the looting of China's god stocks by the Japanese during the war, and hence, further enhances the implication that one is looking at a kind of economic warfare, and that, indeed, the possibility arises that this gold was used as backing of covert securities, just as it has been alleged in the open literature that it was also used as a source of covert funding for the US State Department's Office of Policy Coordination under Frank Wisner, and later as a source for the covert operations of General Ed Lansdale. In short, one is looking at a second implication strongly suggestive of a breakaway civilization, namely, the standard mechanisms of secret finance are being utilized to fund covert operations, as I outlined in Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops.

C. Conclusions

In my opinion, for the above reasons, we may draw the following tentative conclusions:

1. Distinctive and discrete steps were being put into place by the American financial elite during the 1930s to establish a covert two-tiered system of finance, with the covert system being based upon bullion-backed currency and securities;

2. This effort was renewed after the Second World War, with the addition of Japanese gold stocks looted from China during the war, thus enabling a vast, though covert, expansion of the American Federal Reserve's credit making ability;
3. These hidden and covert securities were employed in the funding of covert operations and projects, via the Office of Policy Coordination;
4. The Japanese and Spanish bond scandals thus imply that someone else, or some other faction external to this covert financial structure and/or civilization was aware of this arrangement, and have begun operations to obfuscate and interfere with the stability of this structure by issuing false securities, thus calling into question the authenticity of whatever covert securities as actually may exist. This is corroborated by the recent public moves of the BRICs nations away from the dollar, and by my analysis elsewhere that the possibility exists that the International Fascista or whatever one wishes to call this group, has possibly also reneged on the post-war detente struck between it and the very same western financial elite.

With respect to the last point, it is important to note that the US secret Service, in cooperation with the Spanish authorities, code-named the operation to bust this latest forgery scam ”Operation Morgenthau” after the 1930s US Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau. It is to be noted that Morgenthau was, of course, the originator of the notorious Morgenthau Plan for postwar Germany, which would have de-industrialized that country and split it into two or more nations to prevent its resurgence as a major military power. The Morgenthau plan was apprehended by Nazi intelligence during the war and became a strong weapon in the propaganda arsenal of Dr. Josef Goebbels, who used it effectively to stiffen German resistance by pointing to the fact that the Morgenthau plan would have spelt the end of the German Reich, and caused an untold amount of postwar famine and suffering for the German people. Perhaps, by code-naming the operation ”Operation Morgenthau,” a finger is being pointed at the possible real sources behind the two bond scandals, and the nature of what may be transpiring in them. At the minimum, it strongly suggests in my opinion that we are dealing with a full-scale though quite hidden covert financial war. [12]

Lest the reader have missed the basic point here in all the forest of details, the main argument is that ca. 1934 someone in the US government and/or financial elite created a hidden system, or tier, of finance, for whatever reason. As will be seen in chapter four, there are abundant confirmations of this view, and of the details of the bearer bonds scandals, and once again, they take us back to World War Two, and to the Axis powers.

By now the reader will have noticed something very peculiar, namely, the unusual role of people or countries formerly associated with the Axis (Italy and Japan), or with countries aided and abetted by the Axis and closely associated with them at one point (Spain).

Indeed, it is once again to one of those former Axis powers that we must now return, to examine yet another episode of enormous sums of money in the form of "fake bearer bonds."

3, The Italian Bearer Bonds Scandal

On February 17, 2012, "Tyler Durden" submitted the following article on the Zero Hedge website:

> $6 Trillion In US Bonds Seized In Zurich, Said To Pose "Severe Threats To International Financial Stability"
> Back in the summer of 2009, a peculiar story circulated when two Japanese individuals were arrested trying to smuggle $134 billion in US bonds into Switzerland from Italy. The story quickly died down after it was subsequently reported that the bonds were merely fake bearer bonds. Nobody heard much about it since then. Until today, when out of the blue we get a new story which blows that one out of the water. According to Bloomberg, "Italian anti-mafia prosecutors said they seized a record $6 trillion of allegedly fake U.S. Treasury bonds, an amount that's almost half of the U.S.'s public debt." From here the story just gets weirder: "The bonds were found hidden in makeshift compartments of three safety deposit boxes in Zurich, the http://gizadeathstar.com/2012/02/more-fake-bonds-found-in-spain-a-speculative-analysis-of-the-fake-bonds-scandals/

It should be pointed out that this article first appeared as a paper in a subscription area on my website. I include it here for the sake of completeness of the argument.

prosecutors from the southern city of Potenza said in an e-mailed statement. The Italian authorities arrested eight people in connection with the probe, dubbed "Operation Vulcanica," the prosecutors said. The U.S. embassy in Rome has examined the securities dated 1934, which had a nominal value of $1 billion apiece, they said in the statement. Officials for the embassy didn't have an immediate comment." …And weirder: "The individuals involved were planning to buy plutonium from Nigerian sources, according to phone conversations monitored by the police." …And really, really weird: "The fraud posed "severe threats" to international financial stability, the prosecutors said in the statement." Ok great, however one thing we don't get is just how can $6 trillion in glaringly fake bombs be a "threat to international financial stability."

More from Bloomberg:

The financial fraud uncovered by the Italian prosecutors in Potenza includes two checks issued through HSBC Holdings Plc in London for 205,000 pounds ($325,000), checks that weren't backed by available funds, the prosecutors said. As part of the probe, fake bonds for $2 billion were also seized in Rome.

HSBC spokesman Patrick Humphris in London declined to comment when contacted by telephone.

Phony U.S. securities have been seized in Italy before and there were at least three cases in 2009. Italian police seized phony U.S. Treasury bonds with a face value of $116 billion in August of 2009 and $134 billion of similar securities in June of that year.

The U.S. Secret Service averages about 100 cases a year related to bonds and other fictitious instruments.

As a reminder, total US debt in circulation is just over $10 trillion. So if the allegedly "fake" bonds were sufficiently threatening to put international financial stability at risk, just what is going on here?

Some more from the BBC:

US officials confirmed that the bonds were counterfeit.

Fake US securities have been seized in Italy before and there were at least three cases in 2009.

But this case is on a different scale to previous investigations as the fake bonds have a value equivalent to almost half of the entire US debt pile.

"Everything began with an investigation into mafia clans in the Vulture-Melfese area in the southern Basilicata region," said Giovanni Colangelo, the head of the prosecutor's office in Potenza.

Here is what the bonds look like:[13]

ONE BILLION

WASHINGTON D.C.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ONE BILLION DOLLARS IN GOLD

Italian "Billion Dollar Bearer Bond"

At this juncture, we must pause again, to observe that the "billion dollar bearer bond" has a number of peculiarities. First, and rather obviously, it is based on the genuine Woodrow Wilson $100,000 gold certificate notes that were indeed circulated privately between branches of the Federal Reserve Bank system. But secondly, this "bond" is clearly stated to be a "gold certificate," in other words, a "bond backed by gold." Finally, note the serial number—seemingly a dead giveaway that the bond is a fake—of "G11111111G". With this, we return to Durden's final few remarks, and the remaining picture. "And here," he said, "is where they," i.e., the "bonds," were "kept":

CHICAGO
FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM
MOTHER BOX
TREATY OF VERSAILLES

Chicago Federal Reserve Bank Strong Box Containing the Woodrow Wilson Billion Dollar Gold-Backed Bearer Bonds

Note again the following peculiarities:

1) The amount of "counterfeit bonds" seized is some $6 trillion dollars, an amount, notes Durden, that is almost half of the entire U.S. public debt;
2) The "bonds" were seized in Zurich, an important clue, for Switzerland would be a likely place to sell or trade large denomination securities on the international market;
3) The "bonds" were once again dated 1934;
4) They were supposedly being used to purchase plutonium covertly, and this, again, is an important clue, for a vast sum of money of a fraudulent nature was being used in a covert operation involving technologies linked to weapons of mass destruction; and, finally,
5) The "bonds" were stated to be a "threat to international stability."

This last point is, again, a significant clue that, while the seized bonds may indeed have been completely fake, they must be based on something really existent. Here's why:

The very enormity of the amounts involved on just one bond—one billion dollars—would restrict any hoped-for return on the counterfeit, even at the extreme discount of one cent on the dollar, to a very narrow group of targets. The circulation of such counterfeit bonds, again in denominations we're told never existed, is itself interesting, for how could denominations of bonds that never existed pose any sort of threat to international financial stability, unless, again, there was a real exemplar? Once again, the old principle holds true: one does not counterfeit a seven dollar bill. It would be un-spendable, unsellable, and of no use to the counterfeiter to go to all the expense and effort to produce. Such bonds can only exist if there is a market for them, and such a market, in turn, can only exist if indeed there is some kernel of truth to the existence of such bonds, dated from that period.

And note one final implication. The amount seized in this particular episode of the Bearer Bonds Soap Opera was six trillion dollars, and these were in bonds that were *backed by gold. So there is yet another implication:

6) Is the amount of gold in existence able to cover such an astronomical amount of money? What is the actual amount of gold in existence?

That implication brings us to the strange allegations of Great Britain's David Noel James, Lord (Baron) Blackheath, made almost concurrently with the bearer bonds scandals, on the floor of the British House of Lords in Parliament… and to an equally strange comment made decades ago by the president of the German Reichsbank, Dr. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht, on the occasion of a friendly visit to the New York Federal Reserve Bank… but first, it's time for an intermission, to catch our breath, and summarize what we have thus far…

Investigative Reporter Danny Casolaro, 1947-1991, Murdered to Keep a Huge Financial Secret?

INTERMISSION

"(Zokosky) explained that the NSA does not have to account for money. The NSA makes a 'profit.'... He said drugs are called 'gold' and used as currency worldwide. Real gold takes up space and is difficult to transport."
Cheri Seymour[1]

Distinctive patterns have now emerged when one compares the three bearer bonds scandals reviewed thus far, and with these patterns, deeper shapes and outlines of deep principal actors - the factional components of an international financial, criminal, and military-scientific elite - are faintly discernible. The presentation of the bearer bonds scandals is therefore interrupted here, to review those patterns comprehensively, and to comment further regarding the discernible outlines of the principals of the libretto beginning to appear on stage:

1) One only counterfeits or mimics something real; one does not counterfeit a seven dollar bill, or stocks and bonds that do not exist;[2]
2) One only counterfeits what one can reasonably expect to tender in a transaction to a target group, and thus must tailor one's counterfeiting operation to the target's scale of affluence, and do so without raising suspicion;[3] thus one does not go to the expense of counterfeiting a fraudulent product that cannot be transacted because
    a) it does not exist, or
    b) is too large a denomination to be traded with the target group, or
    c) is too poor in quality to be traded. To put this point differently, the quality of the counterfeit must be sufficiently high to ensure a "first sight" acceptance of its authenticity by the target;[4]
3) Trade of fraudulent instruments in the tens, twenties, and hundreds of millions, or billions, of dollars can only occur at a very rarefied level (if it occurs at all), and thus, any counterfeiting of instruments of such a level of trade must be based on inside information not generally or publicly available;[5]

4) With respect to the Japanese Bearer Bond Scandal the facts and implications are:
    a) $134.5 billion was seized by the Italian Guardia di Finanza at Ponte Chiasso on the Italian Swiss border;
    b) this amount of money was in the form of bearer bonds in the denominated in the amount of $500,000,000, and dated 1934;
    c) some of the amount was in the form of ten one billion dollar Kennedy bonds which were clearly faked;[6]
    d) many of the $500,000,000 bonds were so carefully done that the fraud could hardly be distinguished from the genuine article,[7] i.e., one was dealing with facsimiles;
    e) the bonds were accompanied by "authenticating" bank documents;[8]
    f) the bonds were discovered in the false bottom of a briefcase being carried by two allegedly Japanese men on a commuter train from Italy to Switzerland;[9]
    g) The two men were arrested and detained according to Italian law, which also required the imposition of a fine (that would have amounted to $53.4 billion), but no fine was imposed, and the men were released;[10]
    h) The Asia News article cited in chapter 2A also notes that it took US authorities some two weeks to make a determination that the bonds were fake,[11] a story which does make some sense when the assertion that some of the "fakes" were barely distinguishable from the general article;
    i) If securities of such high quality are indeed in circulation such that it took the issuing authority (the US government) two weeks to make a determination, then "international trade and exchanges could come to a halt";[12]

j) Some of the bearer bonds were dated to the year 1934;[13]

k) Some US authorities and media sources stated that no bearer bonds of denominations of $500,000,000 were ever issued,[14] raising the question of why it would have taken American authorities two to make a determination on their authenticity, an authenticity otherwise stated to be so good in quality as to be virtually indistinguishable from the real thing. This implies that such $500,000,000 bearer bonds were indeed issued, but in such a limited and unusual fashion that they were not generally known and thus a mystery to the US authorities seeking to authenticate them. They quality suggested recalls the operational parameters of Unternehmung Bernhard, namely, that they may have been the products of an "unauthorized production" of facsimiles. The question is who committed the fraud. Given the nature of the case thus far, the possibility that the fraud originated within the upper echelons of America's governmental and financial elite must be held open;

l) The amount seized by the Italian authorities was exactly the same amount in the U.S.A. Troubled Asset Relief Program;[15]

m) The inclusion of ten self-evidently faked "Kennedy" billion dollar bonds appears designed to draw attention to the status of the other bonds seized, and, as reviewed, suggests that a message was being sent by one party to another: all such bonds are fraudulent, and they concern, in some fashion, space issues;[16]

n) the implication that such bonds could only be counterfeited by someone in the know of similar genuine bonds appears to be strengthened by the fact that the Kennedy bonds were printed with the seal of "Money World," an Asian corporation dealing with international currency transactions on a daily basis;[17]

o) thus, an Asian connection is implied by the alleged participation of

        i) the two Japanese nationals carrying the bonds and seized by the Italians and
        ii) by the presence of self-evidently faked bonds bearing the seal of a known Asian currency trading company, implying other Asian connections (Korea, China, Indochina, and so on);

5) With respect to the Spanish Bearer Bond Scandal the facts and implications are:
    a) The occurrence of the scandal in Spain suggests an historical and geopolitical connection to World War Two and to the Axis powers, since the Japanese Bearer Bond scandal allegedly involved nationals from a former Axis power (Japan), occurred on the soil of another former Axis power (Italy), and, with the Spanish scandal, on the soil of a nation that had been aided and abetted by Germany and Italy in the installation of the Axis-friendly government of Francisco Franco;
    b) The story occurred at the same approximate time as the Japanese bearer bond scandal, in June of 2009;[18]
    c) The amount involved was even more astronomical, some $1.64 trillion dollars;[19] this haul was in the form of the following:
        i) U.S. Federal Reserve Note Series 1934 Bonds, bearing coupons, which claimed to be gold-backed.[20] It should be noted that this has its own implications, for normally, only the U.S. Treasury issues and sells bonds, while normally, only the Federal Reserve becomes the privileged first buyer. But it should likewise be observed, that as a private corporation, the Federal Reserve can sell stock, and has the right to issue and sell bonds just like any other corporation. Thus, the securities in question are not, at one level U.S. securities at all, but rather, Federal Reserve securities. Thus, the U.S. authorities can legitimately claim that no bearer bonds of $500,000,000 dollar denominations were ever issued by the U.S. government, but that does not say anything about the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank, a private corporation. In short, the possibility remains that one is looking at legitimate securities, but ones of a very privileged and confidential nature;

  - ii) The Spanish haul was also represented in bundles of $10,000,000 of $100,000 gold certificate Woodrow Wilson notes, notes never issued for general circulation, but only used in exchanges between branches of the Federal Reserve System. These notes, like the alleged bearer bonds, were gold backed, and this, as will eventually be seen, is another very significant clue;
  - iii) These bundles were banded with metal bands stamped with the modern stylized swastika corporate logo of J.P. Morgan Chase bank;[21]
  - iv) the haul was discovered in bronze strong boxes from the bearing the stamp and seal of the Dallas Federal Reserve Branch bank,[22] along with other authenticating contexts such as certificates of authenticity;
  - v) the suspected point of origin for the faked securities and strong boxes was Manila, the Philippines,[23] a fact that will have enormous significance in the remaining chapters of part one of this book;
- d) These points, bearing in mind that one does not counterfeit things (or strong boxes!) that do not exist, allow one to conclude tentatively that:
  - i) "Distinctive and discrete steps were being put into place by the American financial elite during the 1930s to establish a covert two-tiered system of finance, with the covert system being based upon bullion-backed currency and securities";[24]
  - ii) This covert system of finance could become the perfect independent vehicle for the funding of covert operations, wars, and research;
  - iii) It is quite the crucial point to observe what all these tentative implications and patterns mean, for if one does not counterfeit what does not exist as a real medium of transaction, then to concoct a system of bearer bonds, and then deny their existence, means that there are two levels of fraud being perpetrated:

1] the principal fraud, which would be perpetrated by the designers of the system and bonds itself; and

2] the secondary fraud, which would be perpetrated by the counterfeiters counterfeiting the original fraudulent instruments of that system!

6) With respect to the Italian Bearer Bonds Scandal, the facts and implications are these:
   - a) Six trillion dollars was seized;[25]
   - b) this six trillion dollars was in the form of "US Treasury bonds"[26] an assertion that may be an inaccuracy, for in the other cases of such bonds, they are in the form of U.S. Federal Reserve bonds, not actual U.S. Treasury bonds;
   - c) this amount is almost half of the U.S. public debt,[27]
   - d) the bonds were again dated 1934;[28]
   - e) and were denominated in amounts of one billion dollars apiece;[29]
   - f) the bonds were indeed slated to be part of a covert operation to purchase plutonium in Nigeria;[30]
   - g) the bonds were based upon the $100,000 Woodrow Wilson gold certificate bill used for private exchange between Federal Reserve branch banks, and the bonds were stamped with the same "gold certificate" seal;[31]
   - h) and as in the Spanish bearer bond scandal of the same period, they were found in a strong box of a Federal Reserve Branch bank, this time, that of the Chicago branch;[32]
   - i) the whole affair was said to be a threat to international financial stability.[33]

A pattern has now become clear, a pattern involving the former Axis nations (in some form or fashion), a pattern of industrial scale counterfeiting of securities with mystifying and mutually contradictory properties, for they are said to be "so good" that they are difficult to distinguish from originals, and yet, they are so bad by implication, since they are counterfeits of something U.S. government officials maintain never existed at all. There is yet another pattern: the securities are for the most part dated 1934, and bear some relationship to gold.

COSA NOSTRA CON MEN, COUNTERFEITERS AND CARDINALS, PART TWO

"As to the existence of a 'secret' secondary market, such a notion defies reason. There is no basis for such a market which would add to the costs of all parties, and especially the entity of such funding, while producing no explainable gain to anyone but the secret players*. That a major issuer of investment grade paper would subject its financial obligations to the vagaries of such a market is absurd."*

Professor James E. Byrnes[1]

There is another problem with the bearer bonds scandals as thus far reviewed, and the reader will immediately have seen what it is: gold. These bonds, it will be recalled, were in denominations of one billion, or more often than not, a mere five hundred million dollars each, with coupons, and the bonds were, moreover, "gold certificates," i.e., they were allegedly backed by gold, or rather, issued against gold as the underwriting collateral. That is to say, the sheer amount of all the alleged gold-backed bearer bonds floating around in the various bearer bonds scandals would seem to imply an amount of gold nearly equal to if not exceeding all the gold in existence by orders of magnitude. A moment's reflection on this circumstance reveals that this presents certain enormous "implications" for our emerging scenario, and none of them are entirely pleasant. However, our examination of those implications will have to wait. For the moment, our attention must be focused on this new principal actor on the scene, the gold itself, and upon:

4. The Strange Allegations of Lord Blackheath and Some Strange Behavior from Dr. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht[2]

As the bearer bonds scandals began to make their rounds in the media, another meme was quickly attached to them by various "commentators," who quickly "connected" the scandals to the alleged activities and promises of a secret society or societies based in Asia, waging covert and secret financial war against the abyssally corrupt oligarchs of the Anglo-American elite. Briefly put, according to these versions of the story, this secret Asian oligarchy was literally promising to step in as a kind of institutional "messiah" and pull the West's fat out of the financial fire its own elite had put it in.

While I do not subscribe to these scenarios, it is worth noting what the real underlying memes are:

1) There is hidden or covert economic warfare taking place between an essentially Anglo-American financial oligarchy, and some secret group that has suggestive ties to Asia;
2) The whole story is connected to a hidden tier or system of finance, as represented by the bearer bonds scandals; and,
3) The whole story concerns a vast amount of gold.

These memes reached all the way into the British House of Lords, where David Noel Baron James of Blackheath noted, in comments made on the floor and recorded in Hansard's, that the amount of gold appeared in existence appeared to be obfuscated.[3]

a. David Baron James of Blackheath's Remarks of Nov 1, 2010 to the House of Lords

Lord Blackheath first drew attention to the problem in a round-about way a year after the Bearer Bonds Scandals had broken, in remarks he made late on Nov. 1, 2010 on the floor of the House of Lords. In his remarks, he also brushed up against the financial aspects of international terrorism. Here is the actual Hasnard transcript of his remarks. I have

---

[2] Note we are resuming the outline exactly as we left it off in chapter 2A.

[3] Hansard's is the British equivalent of the Congressional Record, i.e., an official transcript of all statements made on the floor by a sitting peer of the House of Lords.

Italicized the remarks that will concern us subsequently, but I present them here in the original context in which Lord Blackheath stated them. Additionally, I have inserted numbers in parentheses to assist in the analysis which follows this citation:

> At this point, I am going to have to make a very big apology to my noble friend Lord Sassoon, because I am about to raise a subject that I should not raise and which is going to be one which I think is now time to put on a higher awareness, and to explain to the House as a whole, as I do not think your Lordships have any knowledge of it. I am sorry my noble friend Lord Strathclyde is not with us at the moment, because this deeply concerns him also.
> For the past 20 weeks I have been engaged in a very strange dialogue with the two noble Lords, in the course of which (1) I have been trying to bring to their attention the willing availability of a strange organisation which wishes to make a great deal of money available to assist the recovery of the economy in this country. For want of a better name, I shall call it foundation X. That is not its real name, but it will do for the moment. Foundation X was introduced to me 20 weeks ago last week by (2) an eminent City firm, which is FSA controlled. Its chairman came to me and said, (3) "We have this extraordinary request to assist in a major financial reconstruction. It is megabucks, but we need your help to assist us in understanding whether this business is legitimate". I had the biggest put down of my life from my noble friend Lord Strathclyde when I told him this story. He said, "Why you? You're not important enough to have the answer to a question like that". He is quite right, I am not important enough, but the answer to the next question was, "You haven't got the experience for it". Yes I do.(4) I have had one of the biggest experiences in the laundering of terrorist money and funny money that anyone has had in the City. I have handled billions of pounds of terrorist money.
> Baroness Hollis of Heigham: Where did it go to?
> Lord James of Blackheath: Not into my pocket. My biggest terrorist client was the IRA and I am pleased to say that I managed to write off more than £1 billion of its money. I have also had extensive connections with north African terrorists, but that was of a far nastier nature, and I do not want to talk about that because it is still a security issue. I hasten to add that it is no good getting the police in, because (5) I shall immediately call the Bank of England as my defence witness, given that it put me in to deal with these problems.
> The point is that when I was in the course of doing this strange activity, I had an interesting set of phone numbers and references that I could go to for help when I needed it. So people in the City have known that if they want to check out anything that looks at all odd, they can come to me and I can press a few phone numbers to obtain a reference. The City firm came to me and asked whether I could get a reference and a clearance on foundation X. For 20 weeks, I have been endeavoring to do that. (6) I have come to the absolute conclusion that foundation X is completely genuine and sincere and that (7) it directly wishes to make the United Kingdom one of the principal points that it will use to disseminate its extraordinarily great wealth into the world at this present moment, as part of an attempt to seek the recovery of the global economy.

I made the phone call to my noble friend Lord Strathclyde on a Sunday afternoon-I think he was sitting on his lawn, poor man-and he did the quickest ball pass that I have ever witnessed. If England can do anything like it at Twickenham on Saturday, we will have a chance against the All Blacks. The next thing I knew, I had my noble friend Lord Sassoon on the phone. From the outset, he took the proper defensive attitude of total scepticism, and said, "This cannot possibly be right".(8) During the following weeks, my noble friend said, "Go and talk to the Bank of England". So I phoned the governor and asked whether he could check this out for me. After about three days, he came back and said, "You can get lost. I'm not touching this with a bargepole; it is far too difficult. Take it back to the Treasury". So I did. Within another day, my noble friend Lord Sassoon had come back and said, (9) "This is rubbish. It can't possibly be right". I said, "I am going to work more on it". Then I brought one of the senior executives from foundation X to meet my noble friend Lord Strathclyde. I have to say that, as first dates go, it was not a great success. Neither of them ended up by inviting the other out for a coffee or drink at the end of the evening, and they did not exchange telephone numbers in order to follow up the meeting.

I found myself between a rock and a hard place that were totally paranoid about each other, because the foundation X people have an amazing obsession with their own security. They expect to be contacted only by someone equal to head of state status or someone with an international security rating equal to the top six people in the world. This is a strange situation. My noble friends Lord Sassoon and Lord Strathclyde both came up with what should have been an absolute killer argument as to why this could not be true and that we should forget it. (10) My noble friend Lord Sassoon's argument was that these people claimed to have evidence that last year they had lodged £5 billion with British banks. They gave transfer dates and the details of these transfers. As my noble friend Lord Sassoon, said, if that were true it would stick out like a sore thumb. You could not have £5 billion popping out of a bank account without it disrupting the balance sheet completely. But I remember that at about the same time as those transfers were being made the noble Lord, Lord Myners, was indulging in his game of rearranging the deckchairs on the Titanic of the British banking community. If he had three banks at that time, which had had, say, a deficiency of £1.5 billion each, then you would pretty well have absorbed the entire £5 billion, and you would not have had the sore thumb stick out at that time; you would have taken £1.5 billion into each of three banks and you would have absorbed the lot. That would be a logical explanation—I do not know.

(11) My noble friend Lord Strathclyde came up with a very different argument. He said that this cannot be right because these people said at the meeting with him that they were still effectively on the gold standard from back in the 1920s and that their entire currency holdings throughout the world, which were very large, were backed by bullion. My noble friend Lord Strathclyde came back and said to me that he had an analyst working on it and that this had to be stuff and nonsense. He said that they had come up with a figure for the amount of bullion that would be needed to cover their currency reserves, as claimed, which would be more than the entire value of bullion that had ever been mined in the history of the world. (12) I am sorry but my noble friend Lord Strathclyde is wrong; his analysts are wrong. He had tapped into the sources that are available and there is only one definitive source for the amount of bullion that has ever been taken from the earth's crust. That was a National Geographic *magazine article 12 years ago. Whatever figure it was that was quoted was then quoted again on six other sites on the internet-on Google. Everyone is quoting one original source; there is no other confirming authority.(13) But if you tap into the Vatican accounts-of the Vatican bank-you come up with a claim of total bullion-

Lord De Mauley: The noble Lord is into his fifteenth minute. I wonder whether he can draw his remarks to a conclusion.

Lord James of Blackheath: The total value of the Vatican bank reserves would claim to be more than the entire value of gold ever mined in the history of the world. My point on all of this is that we have not proven any of this. Foundation X is saying at this moment that it is prepared to put up the entire £5 billion for the funding of the three Is recreation; the British Government can have the entire independent management and control of it-foundation X does not want anything to do with it; there will be no interest charged; and, by the way, if the British Government would like it as well, if it will help, it will be prepared to put up money for funding hospitals, schools, the building of Crossrail immediately with £17 billion transfer by Christmas, if > requested, and all these other things. These things can be done, if wished, but a senior member of the Government has to accept the invitation to a phone call to the chairman of foundation X—and then we can get into business. This is too big an issue. I am just an ageing, obsessive old Peer and I am easily dispensable, but getting to the truth is not. We need to know what really is happening here. We must find out the truth of this situation.[4]

Now let us take each of the italicized portions of Lord Blackheath's remarks and examine them more closely.

b. Analysis of Lord Blackheath's Remarks of Nov 1, 2010

When one summarizes the basic points of Lord Blackheath's very odd remarks in the House of Lords, one derives a set of statements truly mind-boggling in their implications:

1) There is a secret group with lots of money, previously unknown in the world, which Lord Blackheath is calling "Foundation X", suggesting that this entity, at least in its public face, if indeed it has one, is a foundation (point number 1 in the citation above);
2) This foundation or secret group has some connection to the City of London, the financial district of the United Kingdom, suggesting, as would be expected, that any secret group with vast and hitherto unknown amounts of money would have connections to major financial centers (point number 2 in the citation above);
3) This secret group is offering to step in, almost as a kind of institutional messiah, and resolve Europe's, and Britain's, financial difficulties by using Britain as a "port of entry" to do so (point numbers 3 and 7 in the citation above);
4) Lord Blackheath himself has some experience with a financial "underworld" since, by his own admission, he was involved in laundering money for the Irish Republican Army, apparently acting as an agent for the Bank of England, which was impounding IRA funds (point number 4 in the citation above);

5) Lord Blackheath can call the Bank of England as a defense witness to attest to these activities, a strange remark to make, as if he feared his revelations on the floor of the House of Lords would lead to investigation and perhaps indictment and trial (point number 5 in the citation above);
6) Based on his investigations—which he never details—Lord Blackheath asserts that the secret group, or Foundation X, is "completely genuine and sincere," i.e., really exists (point number 6 in the citation above);
7) When urged to contact the Bank of England by fellow peer Lord Sassoon, the Bank of England's governor, after three days, informed Lord Blackheath "You can get lost. I'm not touching this with a bargepole; it is far too difficult. Take it back to the Treasury," (point number 8 in the citation above), indicating or suggesting that the Bank of England neither could confirm nor deny the legitimacy of Foundation X or its claims to vast wealth and the ability to help Britain and Europe, and suggesting also, perhaps, that it may have known the reality of what Foundation X represented, and either did not wish to get involved, or, was maintaining a secret;
8) When Lord Blackheath "took it back to the Treasury" (i.e., to Lord Sassoon), it responded: "This is rubbish. It can't possibly be right," (point 9 in the citation above), which implies either that the secret group, and/or its claims, were not genuine. Notice an important, vital point here: the private monopoly central bank, the Bank of England, would neither confirm nor deny the claims, but said only, "It's too difficult", while the official government agency, the U.K.'s treasury, responded that it is rubbish. Observe carefully how this fits the pattern thus far revealed in the bearer bonds scandals, for official U.S. government spokesmen denied that bonds of such amounts and denominations were ever issued (especially in 1934), while the media is simultaneously reporting that some of the "Fakes" (of bonds that supposedly never existed) were done so well that they were almost as good as the real thing, and note that said bonds were not claimed to have been issued by the U.S. Treasury, the government agency, but directly by the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank, a private central bank. The pattern is the same, though the contexts are different;
9) The "difficulty" that appears to be surfacing is that the secret group—Foundation X—claimed to have deposited

£5,000,000,000 in British banks, and supplied the details of "transfer dates and the details of the transfers" and yet, according to Lord Blackheath's recollection of Lord Sassoon's remarks, Lord Sassoon apparently stated that if such an amount had been lodged with British banks, it would show up on the balance sheets; it would "stick out like a sore thumb." This remark implies that the amount was not showing up on the balance sheets nor at the U.K. Treasury, (point number 10 in the citation above) and this suggests either that the deposits were never made, or that they were fraudulent (remember the Bank of England's response), or that they were deliberately kept off the books. Since the Bank of England's response was nothing less than obfuscation, one may reasonably conclude that it was neither of the first two alternatives, and that a hidden tier of finance was in play, one that Lord Sassoon did not know about, but one that Lord Blackheath had very evidently stumbled into. After all, he is the one originally stating that all of this had to do with a secret group, with vast money, and hence one may conclude that the basic implication of Lord Blackheath's remarks is that there is a hidden system of finance, the central banks know about it, but some agencies and agents of governments, do not. This pattern, again, fits the pattern we have seen emerge in the bearer bonds scandals thus far examined;

10) The mystery only deepened when Lord Strathclyde pointed out that Foundation X's claims had to be nonsense, since its claims were based on being backed by gold bullion, and that such vast amounts of money would lead to the claim of having more bullion than had ever been mined in the world (point number 11 in the citation above). Thus, Foundation X is making claims very similar in nature, and fitting the overall pattern, of the bearer bonds scandals: gold backing of whatever form of securities it was allegedly depositing in British banks;
11) The source for the figures of gold available in the world apparently, according to Lord Blackheath, stem from a National Geographic magazine article (see point 12 in the citation above); and finally,
12) When the Vatican Bank figures are consulted, a different amount of available gold bullion apparently obtains (see point 13 in the citation above). Thus, we have the introduction—without explanation of how or why it fits—of another principal, the Vatican, in the story.

As we shall see later in this chapter, the Vatican is a crucial key to understand the nature of this hidden tier of finance, who manages it, what it is for, and how it all fits into the conception of a "breakaway civilization." But for the present, we are not quite done with Lord Blackheath.

c. David Baron James of Blackheath's Remarks of Feb. 16, 2012 to the House of Lords: "Something is Very Seriously Wrong"

After the initial and typical Internet conspiracy theory and apocalypse mongering ruckus surrounding Lord Blackheath's remarks had died down (even following rumors that he had been "suicided" or "heart attacked" or just outright murdered), Lord Blackheath followed his November 2010 remarks up with an even more bizarre and astonishing set of remarks made to the House of Lords on Feb 16, 2012. Again, I present the official Hansard transcript, italicizing those portions of his remarks that will concern us in our analysis. As before, I have inserted numbers in parentheses which will assist in the analysis which follows the citation:

I have been engaged in pursuit of this issue for nearly two years and I am no further forward in getting to the truth.*
> There are three possible conclusions which may come from it. (2) First, there may have been a massive piece of money-laundering committed by a major Government who should know better. (3) Effectively, it undermined the integrity of a British bank, the Royal Bank of Scotland, in doing so. (4) The second possibility is that a major American department has an agency which has gone rogue on it because it has been wound up and has created a structure out of which it is seeking to get at least €50 billion as a pay-off. (5) The third possibility is that this is an extraordinarily elaborate fraud, which has not been carried out, but which has been prepared to provide a threat to one Government or more if they do not make a pay-off. These three possibilities need an urgent review.

(6) In April and May 2009, the situation started with the alleged transfer of $5 trillion to HSBC in the United Kingdom. Seven days later, another $5 trillion came to HSBC and three weeks later another $5 trillion. A total of $15 trillion is alleged to have been passed into the hands of HSBC for onward transit to the Royal Bank of Scotland. We need to look to where this came from and the history of this money. I have been trying to sort out the sequence by which this money has been created and where it has come from for a long time.

(7) It starts off apparently as the property of Yohannes Riyadi, who has some claims to be considered the richest man in the world. He would be if all the money that was owed to him was paid but I have seen some accounts of his showing that he owns $36 trillion in a bank. It is a ridiculous sum of money. However, $36 trillion would be consistent with the dynasty from which he comes and the fact that it had been effectively the emperors of Indo-China in times gone by. A lot of that money has been taken away from him, with his consent, by the American Treasury over the years for the specific purpose of helping to support the dollar.

(8) Mr Riyadi has sent me a remarkable document dated February 2006 in which the American Government have called him to a meeting with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, which is neither the Federal Reserve nor a bank. It is a bit like "Celebrity Big Brother". It has three names to describe it and none of them is true. This astonishing document purports to have been a meeting, which was witnessed by Mr Alan Greenspan, who signed for the Federal Reserve Bank of New York of which he was chairman, as well as chairman of the real Federal Reserve in Washington. It is signed by Mr Timothy Geithner as a witness on behalf of the International Monetary Fund. The IMF sent two witnesses, the other being Mr Yusuke Horiguchi. These gentlemen have signed as witnesses to the effect that this deal is a proper deal. There are a lot of other signatures on the document. I do not have a photocopy; I have an original version of the contract.

(9) Under the contract, the American Treasury has apparently got the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to offer to buy out the bonds issued to Mr Riyadi to replace the cash which has been taken from him over the previous 10 years. It is giving him $500 million as a cash payment to buy out worthless bonds. That is all in the agreement and it is very remarkable. Establishing whether I have a correct piece of paper is just two phone calls away—one to Mr Geithner and one to Mr

Greenspan, both of whom still prosper and live. They could easily confirm whether they signed it. Mr Riyadi, by passing these bonds over, has also put at the disposal of the US Treasury the entire asset backing which he was alleged to have for the $15 trillion. (10) I have a letter from the Bank of Indonesia which says that the whole thing was a pack of lies. He did not have the 750,000 tonnes of gold which was supposed to be backing it; he had only 700 tonnes. This is a piece of complete fabrication.

(11) Finally, I have a letter from Mr Riyadi himself, who tells me that he was put up to do this, that none of it is true, and that he has been robbed of all his money. I am quite prepared to recognise that one of the possibilities is that Mr Riyadi is himself putting this together as a forgery in order to try to win some recovery. But it gets more complicated than that because each of the $5 trillion payments that came in has been acknowledged and receipted by senior executives at HSBC and again receipted by senior executives at the Royal Bank of Scotland. I have a set of receipts for all of this money. Why would any bank want to file $5 trillion-worth-$15 trillion in total-of receipts if the money did not exist? The money was first said to have come from the Riyadi account to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and from there it was passed to JP MorganChase in New York for onward transit to London. The means of sending it was a SWIFT note which, if it was genuine, ought to have been registered with the Bank of England.

When this came about, I took it to my noble friend Lord Strathclyde and asked what we should do with it. He said, “Give it to Lord Sassoon. He is the Treasury”. So I did, and my noble friend Lord Sassoon looked at it and said immediately, “This is rubbish. It is far too much money. It would stick out like a sore thumb and you cannot see it in the Royal Bank of Scotland accounts”. He went on to say, (12)”The gold backing it is ridiculous. Only 1,507 tonnes of gold has been mined in the history of the world, so you cannot have 750,000 tonnes”. That is true. The third thing he said was, “It is a scam”, and I agree with him. The problem is that at that point we stopped looking, but we should have asked what the scam was instead of just nodding it off.*

We have never resolved it. (13) Today, I have this quite frightening piece of paper, which is my justification for bringing it into this meeting. It is available on the Internet and I am astonished that it has not already been unearthed by the Treasury because every alarm bell in the land should be ringing if it has. It is from the general audit office of the Federal Reserve in Washington-the real Federal Reserve-and its audit review to the end of July 2010 on the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. It has on it some 20 banks listed to which $16.115 trillion is outstanding in loans. That is the sore thumb that was being looked for by my noble friend Lord Sassoon. But more particularly there are two other interesting things. The first is that Barclays Bank has $868 billion of loan, and the Royal Bank of Scotland has $541 billion, in which case one has to ask a question, because they could have earned back in three weeks their entire indebtedness and could pay off the taxpayers of Britain. Why have they not done so and could we please ask them to put a cheque in the post tonight for the whole $46 billion?

(14) The next thing that is wrong with it is that every bank on this list, without exception, is an MTN-registered bank, which means that they are registered to use medium-term notes to move funds between themselves with an agreed profit-share formula, in which case these banks are investing this money and, most extraordinarily, not a penny of interest does the Federal Bank of New York want paid on that vast amount, $16 trillion. Anyone who knows what the IMF rules are will immediately smell a rat. The IMF has very strict rules for validating dodgy money. There are two ways of doing it. You either pass it through a major central bank like the Bank of England, which apparently refused to touch this, or you put it through an MTN-trading bank, which is then able to use the funds on the overnight European MTN trading market where they can earn between 1 per cent and 2.5 per cent profit per night. The compound interest on that sum is huge. If it is genuine, a vast profit is being made on this money somewhere.

I believe that this is now such an important issue that I have put everything that I have got on the subject on to a 104-megabyte memory thumb. I want the Government to take it all, put it to some suitable investigative bureau and find out the truth of what is going on here, because (15) something is very seriously wrong. Either we have a huge amount of tax uncollected on profits made or we have a vast amount of money festering away in the European banking system which is not real money, in which case we need to take it back. I ask for an investigation and for noble Lords to support my plea.

5.30 pm

Lord Lea of Crondall: My Lords, I am quite happy to believe everything that the noble Lord, Lord James of Blackheath, has said. I will be very disappointed if the noble Lord, Lord Pearson of Rannoch, is unable to explain how this is all a conspiracy by Brussels. Will the Minister confirm that if you want to buy up the whole world you need a quadrillion? That is the latest figure.

This debate began with a presumption that what happened on 9 December was something of a mystery. It remains a mystery. In answer to the question posed by the noble Lord, Lord Kerr, as to why we walked away on that fateful night, I can only assume, because no other explanation has been offered, that in the middle of the night David

It is worth quoting against that background of bulldogs from volume 3 of Churchill's A History of the English-Speaking Peoples, which he wrote in the late 1930s although it was published only in 1956. He said:

d. Analysis of Lord Blackheath's Remarks of Feb 16, 2012

These comments are even more pregnant with significance as will now be demonstrated:

1) Lord Blackheath begins his remarks by stating that the whole episode, which he has been investigating for two years, is "mischief" and that he is no nearer a resolution than before (see point 1 in the citation above), a significant admission, for as his remarks on the floor of the House of Lords on Nov. 1, 2010 revealed, Lord Blackheath was able to call upon contacts both within the U.K. royal treasury and within the Bank of England. As we saw previously, the Bank of England's response was to obfuscate the issue, and return Lord Blackheath to the royal treasury, which simply stated the whole thing was rubbish, and that the claims to gold backing were simply untrue, since there was not enough gold in the world to back the claims being made by Foundation X. As we shall see, there does appear to be a great deal of obfuscation on the amount of available gold in the world;
2) These admissions thus stated, Lord Blackheath then begins to reveal that his two years' worth of investigations have not proven entirely fruitless, for he first states that there has been massive money-laundering "by a major Government who should know better;" (point 2 in the citation). Let us pause once again and consider the implications. We have seen that the bearer bonds scandals, which had clearly emerged by the time Lord Blackheath made both sets of remarks being examined here, were based upon

a) gold-backed bearer bonds,
b) that they were of such high quality as to be virtually indistinguishable from the original, but that
c) U.S. Government officials denied that such bonds in such denominations ($500,000,000 and $1,000,000,000) had ever been issued, particularly in 1934 as most of the bearer bonds had been dated;
d) the bonds, however, were not issued by the U.S. government at all, but by the American privately-owned central bank, the Federal Reserve.

In the context of all the available information that would have been inevitably encountered by Lord Blackheath in his investigations, we conclude that his remarks are meant to be understood as indicating the U.S.A. and its central bank; and, given his earlier encounter with this issue in inquiries made to the Bank of England, it seems to be suggested that the Bank of England, at some level, knew about this American money laundering. Now let us note one final thing: both Lord Blackheath, and the bearer bonds scandals, involve a great deal of money. The question now becomes: what is the connection between the vast industrial scale counterfeiting that the bearer bonds scandals imply, and money laundering? One clue has already been given, namely, that "gold" in some contexts, meant not bullion, but drugs. In effect, one may be looking in part at drug-backed bearer bonds.

3) Lord Blackheath then suggests that the "mischief" he referred to, which included the massive money laundering by a "Government which should know better," undermined the integrity of the Royal Bank of Scotland (see point number 3 in the citation above. The Royal Bank of Scotland, let it be noted, is a bank that the British Royal Family is alleged to be major shareholders of, and hence, an assault on the Royal Bank of Scotland would be an assault on the British Royal Family), and hence, though we have suggested that the Bank of England appears to have known about this hidden financial system, it would also appear that one element or faction within this structure is attacking another (via the Royal Bank of Scotland);

4) That it is the U.S.A. that is the subject of Lord Blackheath's remarks is confirmed by remarks that literally drop a bombshell of major financial mega-tonnage over the landscape. Here, it is best to cite his remarks verbatim once again: "The second possibility is that a major American department has an agency which has gone rogue on it because it has been wound up and has created a structure out of which it is seeking to get at least (fifty billion euros) as a pay-off." Note the expression "a major American department has an agency which has gone rogue." This is the careful and deliberate coded language of a man who knows he is in dangerous territory. Note that a "department" clearly implies a department of government, since that is, in American parlance, how the bureaucracies of the federal government are referred to. He then notes that this department has an agency that has "gone rogue."

There are two basic ways to analyze this statement. The first, since Lord Blackheath's remarks concern financial matters, and since the pattern of financial dealings detected in them is virtually identical to that detected in the bearer bonds scandals-i.e., vast amounts of money, backed by gold, the involvement of a central bank, and denials by a government body that such securities existed—then we must assume that Lord Blackheath means the US Department of the Treasury, and its "agency" the Federal Reserve (which, indeed, in a certain loose way, could be understood to be an agency of the Treasury, even though it is completely separate and a private body), or even possibly the U.S. Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which is an "agency" in the classic sense of the U.S. Treasury. The Federal Reserve is an obvious and logical candidate here, since the Bearer Bonds Scandals—especially in the Spanish and Italian versions—clearly involved "counterfeit" securities of the Federal Reserve. Lord Blackheath's remarks may thus in part have been based upon his own private investigations of these scandals, and if so, he has come to a novel conclusion: some agency of, or an entity associated with, the US government has gone rogue and is perpetrating a vast system of financial fraud, and that agency may be the Federal Reserve itself. It is important to remember that Lord Blackheath began these remarks by mentioning money laundering.

However, there is another possible way to interpret Lord Blackheath's remarks. I have argued in previous pages that one does not counterfeit what does not exist, no matter how ridiculous a counterfeit security may seem (one billion dollar Kennedy Bearer Bonds for example). Thus, I also argued that anyone issuing such counterfeits by the nature of the case would have to have inside information. This information inevitably would have to have come from the upper reaches of bureaucratic power, and most likely would come from an intelligence agency, and thus Lord Blackheath's choice of words here may be indicating the American intelligence establishment via its most well-known face: The Central Intelligence Agency. On this view, Lord Blackheath's remarks would be construed to mean that there is a vast system of hidden finance, its basis is in some measure or degree fraudulent, and that the American intelligence apparatus has some element within it that has broken away, gone rogue, and is connected intimately to the hidden financial system here being hypothesized and argued.

And finally, there is the possibility that both interpretations are true, that is to say, that some element within both the Federal Reserve-US Treasury nexus, and within the US intelligence community, has broken away, gone rogue, and is intimately connected to the hidden system of finance that now appears to be emerging. It is, indeed, this last possibility that will become the most plausible interpretation not only of Lord Blackheath's remarks, but of the actual structure of the entity behind this financial system, as will be suggested in chapters 3 and 4;

5) The next possibility of interpretation that Lord Blackheath mentioned in his remarks of Feb 16, 2012, was that of "an extraordinarily elaborate fraud" perpetrated as a threat "to one or more governments if they do not pay off," (see point 5 in the citation above), a possibility that, as we shall see, need not be disassociated from the possibilities already previously enumerated. That is to say, we may possibly be looking at
    a) a rogue agency within the U.S. that is behind a massive hidden system of finance, and various central banks are at least knowledgeable of it, or complicit in it, and that this group is trying to pressure various governments—by implication, the United Kingdom—to pay hush money to keep the matter secret; or,

b) that same rogue group perpetrated a massive system of finance, based upon fraud, and someone else, falling outside of that rogue group, knows about it, and is demanding hush money of all parties concerned. These two possibilities—of a rogue breakaway U.S.A. group blackmailing governments, or that of another player or faction knows about the system and is using it in a form of covert economic warfare and blackmail, will be born in mind as we proceed in the remaining chapters to outline this hidden system of finance, who it represents, and what it is for;

6) Lord Blackheath then mentioned the transfer, in allotments of $5,000,000,000,000 each, to the HSBC (see point number 6 in the citation), a very large British banking and holding company, based in London, with a world-wide presence. This bank was founded in 1991 by the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation (hence the initials HSBC), and has a capitalization of around one hundred billion pounds sterling. This bank thus gives us yet another suggestive tie to Asia, a tie first encountered, it will be recalled, when the Asia News service, a Vatican-associated news service (!) first revealed the Japanese Bearer bond story;

7) The Asia connection is once again emphasized by Lord Blackheath by mention of a Yohannes Riyadi, the representative, allegedly, of an ancient Indo-Chinese dynasty, again, with a vast fortune of bullion (see points 7 and 8 in the citation);

8) Riyadi claimed to have documentation from the New York branch of the Federal Reserve System, indicating its involvement. the document was signed by Mr. Alan Greenspan (former chairman of the Federal Reserve System) and by Timothy Geithner, Secretary of the U.S. Treasury during the first Obama Administration. And notably, Lord Blackheath maintains that this document was also witnessed by two witnesses for the International Monetary fund, one of whom was a Mr. Yusuke Horiguchi, giving yet another, and notably Japanese, Asian connection once again (see point 8 in the citation). Note once again the consistency of the pattern: the Federal Reserve, and an Asian (Japanese) connection;

9) The terms of this document appear to be an agreement of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to buy back bonds issued to

Mr Riyadi. Note now what Lord Blackheath states: “It (the Federal Reserve Bank of New York) is giving him $500 million as a cash payment to buy out worthless bonds.” (See note 9 in the citation). The mention that these bonds are “worthless” suggests quite strongly a link to the bearer bonds scandals, for those bonds were indeed “worthless” since they were stated to be counterfeit. So why offer to buy back worthless bonds at all, unless, once again, they are really genuine, or at the minimum, represent something genuine that the rogue element does not wish to be known?[6]

10) Lord Blackheath then notes, once again, that Riyadi’s claims are based upon the claim that the entire sum is gold-backed, and that the Bank of Indonesia—Asia again!—says that “the whole thing is a pack of lies” since it would have meant that Riyadi had 750,000 tons of gold, an amount far in excess of any officially reported amount of gold in existence, and in excess by two orders of magnitude and more(see point 10 in the citation). Once again, one encounters the familiar claim of gold-backing to whatever is going on, and once again, one encounters the discrepancy between the amount of gold implied by the backing—which we already encountered in the bearer bonds scandals—and the amount of gold officially said to be in existence. Recall, for example, that Lord Blackheath mentioned one figure given to him by Lord Sassoon, and another figure apparently obtained from the Vatican Bank!

    This “little gold problem” surfaces again toward the end of Lord Blackheath’s statements in the House of Lords, when he notes that Lord Sassoon informed him that “only 1,507 tonnes of gold has been mined in the history of the world.” (See point 12 in the citation.) Bear this in mind for we will shortly see that there is a wildly different figure being reported by another reliable public source. At this point, Lord Blackheath states that Lord Sassoon had concluded that the whole thing was a scam, and that he, Lord Blackheath, agreed with the conclusion.

[6] The possibility suggested by “official” explanations promoted by the U.S. Government and the Federal Reserve, as by a variety of independent researchers into the bearer bonds mysteries, is that these false instruments are used to gain legitimate letters of credit from banks. This possibility, as a hypothesis, declines dramatically when one considers the facts that will be presented in chapters 3 and 4.

However, he goes on to mention that instead of stopping any investigation work, they should have continued looking to find out what the scam really represented.

11) After all this, then Lord Blackheath reveals that Riyadi was "put up to" all of this, implying hidden players (see point 11 in the citation); "But…
12) "…it gets more complicated than that" precisely because the three five trillion dollar deposits were acknowledged and receipted by senior executives at Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank Corporation and by executives of the Royal Bank of Scotland! (See point 12, in the citation). In other words, so far as the HSBC and Royal Bank of Scotland were concerned, the money was real and the deposits were made. Thus, if as Lord Blackheath stated under point 10 above, the whole thing was a scam, then either very major banks were scammed, or were in on the scam;
13) That it might not be a scam, however, was indicated by Lord Blackheath who, citing a document of audit of the Federal Reserve, states that there were $16.115 trillion in outstanding loans, almost the same amount as was deposited in the HSBC and Royal Bank of Scotland (see point 13 in the citation);
14) Each one of the banks on the Federal Reserve's audit list, which was a recipient of some portion of this $16.115 trillion dollars, was a MTN bank, that is to say, a bank authorized to do medium-term trade on notes issued to them. Note carefully once again Lord Blackheath's comment: "Anyone who knows what the IMF rules are will immediately smell a rat." Why? Because, as he points out, any such trades must either go through a central bank "like the Bank of England, which apparently refused to touch this" (see point 14 in the citation) or it must go through an MTN bank;
15) Finally toward the end of his remarks Lord Blackheath spells out the two general implications (see point 15):
    a) there is either a vast sum of money at large in the world financial system, from which huge profits are being made; or,
    b) there is a huge amount of money in the world financial system "which is not real."

It is worth noting that within a few days of Lord Blackheath's remarks of Feb 16, 2012 to the House of Lords, an Internet article appeared that suggested that he, too, had fallen victim to some sort of scam. The article, "Lord Blackheath Exposes Possible Monumental Financial Fraud," was posted on Feb 19, 2012, by Keelan Balderson. It began by citing a Federal Reserve System warning concerning Mr. Riyadi:

> The Federal Reserve is aware of a fraudulent scam involving individuals using the names Yohannes Riyadi and/or Wilfredo Saurin, or persons claiming to be representatives of these two men. In a typical version of this scam, Mr. Riyadi and/or his delegates falsely claim that they have on deposit with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York several U.S. Treasury Checks issued to Mr. Riyadi amounting to billions of dollars.
> The Federal Reserve Bank of New York has been contacted by several brokers and financial institutions worldwide inquiring about the validity of this fraudulent account documentation, which is being offered as collateral for lines of credit or other types of asset based financing. The fraudulent scheme includes multiple documents which purport to have the signatures of various Federal Reserve officials, including Chairman Ben Bernanke.
> In some instances, individuals involved in this fraudulent scheme claim to have met with Federal Reserve officials and claim to have verified that the alleged account is in order. We have also learned that the fraud may include the purchase of certain documents by the introducing brokers.
> If you have information regarding this fraud please contact either Robert Amenta, Special Investigator at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, or Erik Rosenblatt, Senior Special Agent at the Department of Homeland Security, Immigration and Customs Enforcement.[7]

Notwithstanding this caveat, it will be recalled that Blackheath did not deny there was fraud involved, but rather, pointed the finger clearly at agencies of the U.S. government, and moreover, indicated that there was a "rogue element" within them perpetrating the fraud, and that the fraud had entered into the world financial system. This possibility Balderson admits in the article:

> There is clearly a monumental fraud going on here. The gold clearly doesn't exist, the bonds therefore are clearly not real. It's easy to pass this off as a complete fabrication. However according to Blackheath the $5 trillion transactions, totaling $15 trillion, do actually appear on the books of HSBC and RBS!

[7] Kaleen Balderson, "Lord Blackheath Exposes Possible Momumental Financial Fraud," Feb 19, 2012, http://wideshut.co.uk/lord-blackheath-exposes-possible-monumental-financial-fraud/

> "Why would any bank want to sign 5 trillion dollars worth, 15 trillion total, of receipts if the money didn't exist?" He asks his peers.[8]

The article notes, quite correctly, that none of Lord Blackheath's documentation has been verified, nor even made available.

However, I am bold to suggest that in this one instance it is not so much the documentation that is important, but rather, the pattern which has emerged, a pattern including vast sums of money, denominated in bond amounts that, according to the U.S. Government, never existed, bonds moreover that were, according to the scandals thus far examined, issued not by the U.S. Treasury at all but rather by the Federal Reserve directly, and that were gold-backed. Additionally, Lord Blackheath pointed out the Asian connection via the HSBC bank, the Japanese representative of the IMF, and the mysterious Mr. Riyadi himself. And in one final detail, Lord Blackheath also mentioned the involvement of J.P. Morgan Chase, which, as we saw in the Spanish Bearer Bonds scandal, was at least implicated in the scam. But, for the moment, we must examine the other component of Lord Blackheath's statements: the discrepancies in amounts of gold.

e. The Gold Discrepancy: the House of Lords, Der Spiegel Magazine in Germany, and Dr. Hjalmar Schacht

Amid the many detailed assertions in Lord Blackheath's comments to the House of Lords, there was, it will be recalled, a figure he cited from his friend Lord Sassoon at the Royal Treasury, namely, that there was only some 1,507 tons of gold in existence. Then, it will be recalled, Lord Blackheath consulted the Bank of Indonesia in respect to Mr. Riyadi's claims, and it stated that it had only 700 tons of the stuff on hand (which would make the Bank of Indonesia a holder of almost 50% of the world's bullion supply according to the figure cited by Lord Sassoon and referred to in Lord Blackheath's remarks!).

There is an important context for the reader to bear in mind here.

As the bearer bonds scandals were being "broken" and then "ignored" in various media, and as Lord Blackheath was making his comments in the House of Lords from 2010 to 2012, another phenomenon was occurring: various nations were gently "requesting" of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York—the central bank that allegedly maintains most nations' gold reserves on deposit in its vaults—that their gold reserves be physically repatriated to their countries. Hugo Chavez of Venezuela was first, but was followed very quickly by Germany, which demanded a complete accounting of its reserves.

---

[8] Kaleen Balderson, "Lord Blackheath Exposes Possible Monumental Financial Fraud," Feb 19, 2012, http://wideshut.co.uk/lord-blackheath-exposes-possible-monumental-financial-fraud/

But again, the story is murkier than such a simple summary might suggest:

> Germany has gold reserves of just under 3,400 tons, the second-largest reserves in the world after the United States. Much of that is in the safekeeping of central banks outside Germany, especially in the US Federal Reserve in New York. One would think that with such a valuable stash, worth around €133 billion ($170 billion), the German government would want to keep a close eye on its whereabouts. But now a bizarre dispute has broken out between different German institutions over how closely the reserves should be checked.
> Germany's federal audit office, the Bundesrechnungshof, which monitors the German government's financial management, is unhappy with how Germany's central bank, the Bundesbank, keeps tabs on its gold. According to media reports, the auditors are dissatisfied with the fact that gold reserves in Frankfurt are more closely monitored than those held abroad.
> In Germany, spot checks are carried out to make sure that the gold bars are in the right place. But for the German gold that is stored on the Bundesbank's behalf by the US Federal Reserve in New York, the Bank of England in London and the Banque de France in France, the German central bank relies on the assurances of its foreign counterparts that the gold is where it should be. The three foreign central banks give the Bundesbank annual statements confirming the size of the reserves, but the Germans do not usually carry out physical inspections of the bars.
> 'No Doubts'
> According to German media reports, the Bundesrechnungshof has now recommended in its confidential annual audit of the Bundesbank for 2011 that Germany's central bank check its foreign gold reserves with yearly spot checks.
> The Bundesbank has rejected the demand, arguing that central banks do not usually check each others' reserves. "The scope of the checks that the Bundesrechnungshof wants does not correspond to the usual practices among central banks," the Bundesbank said in a statement quoted by the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung newspaper.

> "There are no doubts about the integrity and the reputation of these foreign depositories."[9]

Note again the now familiar pattern:

- the involvement of the U.S. Federal Reserve, and more particularly, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York;
- the involvement of an official agency of a government (Germany), making inquiries of;
- a private central bank (the Bundesbank, successor to the Reichsbank, or, if one prefer, the old Reichsbank under a different name).

The Bundesbank, like the Bank of England, is obfuscating its response by steadfastly refusing to inspect its gold reserves physically, since this would imply a breach of trust. But that is exactly what is implied by the demand for a physical audit. For nations to call for an audit of their gold reserves, much of which is in the New York Federal Reserve bank, is merely to point out the obvious fact that, for whatever reason, those nations have begun to have cause for suspicion.

In other words, the behavior of official agencies and people high in government from the U.K. to Germany are signaling, either by clear statements to that effect (Lord Blackheath), or by demands for a physical audit, that there has been a breakdown of trust between governments and central banks, and particularly, the U.S. Federal Reserve, and even more particularly, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. And all this, again, at a time concurrent with the outbreak of the bearer bonds scandals, and hence, it argues strongly that these events are connected.

Lest we think this is the only time in history that suspicions were raised about the gold reserves of national account at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, we need to look back to a little-known episode during the late 1920s, when Reichsbank President Dr. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht visited his friend, Benjamin Strong Jr., then president of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, and was given a personal guided tour of the vaults of the bank by Strong. Here are Schacht's own words recounting this visit from his autobiography:

[9] No Author, "Germans Fret About their Foreign Gold Reserves," Der Spiegel, May 15, 2012, http://www.spiegel.de/international/germany/debate-breaks-out-in-germany-over-foreign-gold-reserves-a-833289.html

> Another amusing incident arose from the fact that the Reichsbank maintained a not inconsiderable gold deposit in the Federal Reserve Bank in New York. Strong was proud to be able to show us the vaults which were situated in the deepest cellar of the building and remarked:
> "Now, Herr Schacht, you shall see where the Reichsbank gold is kept."
> While the staff looked to the hiding place of the Reichsbank gold we went through the vaults. We waited several minutes; at length we were told: "Mr. Strong, we can't find the Reichsbank gold."
> Strong was flabbergasted but I consoled him. "Never mind: I believe you when you say the gold is there." Even if it weren't you are good for its replacement."[10]

An "amusing incident"!? And the president of the Reichsbank himself does not want to know where his country's gold is?

Or is there something else going on here?

Most likely, the latter, for again, it concerns the New York Federal Reserve Bank, and now, not only obfuscated gold figures, but simply, missing gold. One must entertain the possibility that Schacht—no fool by anyone's estimations—knew good and well what was going on, and that by publishing the incident in his memoirs, he was sending a message to the financial powers of New York. It is noteworthy that the Der Spiegel article is implying that the very same attitude is in place in the successor Bundesbank to this day!

5. The Filipino Bearer Bond Saga, and Some Miscellanies

Incredibly, the Japanese, Spanish, and Italian Bearer Bonds scandals were preceded by a similar episode, showing the now familiar pattern, earlier in the decade. This story began when, on Jan 18, 2012, Bloomberg reported on the Internet of the recovery of $300,000,000,000 in bearer bonds by Flipino nationals who claimed that they were from the crash of an American aircraft in the Philippines in the 1930s.[11] The find was discovered by Chris Estrella who claims he made the discovery in the year 2000 of a "weather-beaten iron and leather box" that was stuffed with $25 billion dollars' worth of U.S. bearer bonds.[12] Once again, the familiar pattern emerged:

1) Some bonds were in denominations of $100,000,000, but these, unlike real U.S. government securities, were lithographed and not engraved;[13]
2) The bonds were stated to be "United States of America Federal Reserved Bonds".[14] This, as we will discover in chapter four, is one of the most significant clues in the whole mystery, for again, the Federal Reserve does not issue bonds, the U.S. Treasury does, or at least, that's the story we've all been told. And note now the two crucial details: the bonds were lithographed and not engraved, and the title on the bond contains a misprint or typographical error in any case: they are described as Federal Reserved bonds and not as Federal Reserve bonds. This mistake, as we will discover in chapter four when we encounter this pattern again in a wholly different context, may have been deliberately made by the issuers of the bonds. Note also an implication of the idea of a "reserved" bond. The very title suggests something out of the ordinary, unavailable to all but a selected few.
3) Additionally, the bonds were printed with fonts that, according to the U.S. securities expert consulted to identity them, did not exist in the year 1934, the year the bonds were dated.[15] This again fits the pattern of 1934 bonds we have encountered before, and it raises a significant question: If no such bonds existed in 1934 (along with type face and so on) why do the counterfeiters keep attempting to run the same scam?
4) The bonds were accompanied by a microfilmed "Federal Reserved Bond Inventory List."
5) The bonds were, like the bonds in the Spanish and Italian bearer bonds scandals, contained in strong boxes, each of which was emblazoned with the Great Seal of the United States and stamped with the Atlanta Federal Reserve Branch Bank;

6) The bonds were supposedly issued by the Federal Reserve Branch Bank of Atlanta in the aforementioned year 1934 and, as such, were signed by then U.S. Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau (hence, these "fraudulent" bearer bonds are often called "Morgenthaus");
7) The bonds were accompanied by "gold" coins stamped with George Washington's image.[16]

6. Summary and Implications

It is time once again to pause and take stock of the enormous implications and patterns in the bearer bonds scandals, and to consider them in the context of a sitting peer of the British House of Lords' remarks:

- In each of the four instances of the Japanese, Spanish, Italian, and Filipino Bearer Bonds scandals, the bonds were apparently based upon genuinely circulating U.S. currency notes. In the case of the Spanish and Italian versions this was based on the design of the U.S. $100,000 gold certificate bill; in the case of the Filipino bearer bond story, the "bond" was apparently based on the U.S. silver certificate design;
- In the Filipino, Spanish, and Italian versions, the "bonds" were accompanied by "authenticating contexts" which included documents of authenticity, microfilmed "inventories" of such bonds, and Federal Reserve Branch Bank Strong Boxes. In the Spanish case, these boxes were from the Dallas branch, in the Italian case, the Chicago branch, and in the Filipino case, the Atlanta branch;
- Some denominations of bonds—$500,000,000 and the $1,000,000,000 Kennedy bonds—were in amounts the U.S. Treasury never issued. In the case of the Kennedy bond, this was apparently tied to the Asian currency exchange company, "Money World";
- The Bonds were dated "1934" and signed by then sitting U.S. Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, and were, furthermore, not U.S. Treasury bonds at all, but issued by the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank and, in the case of the Filipino Bearer Bond story, titled "Federal Reserved Bond;"
- The bonds were all bullion backed bearer bonds, and since the total amount of all four bearer bonds scandals is in the trillions of dollars, the amount of bullion implied exceeds—as Lord Blackheath pointed out—all the bullion amounts thought to be in existence, though, as noted, there seem to be discrepancies in the actual numbers of gold in existence.[17]

[17] Joseph P. Farrell, "Now It's Filipino Bearer Bonds: A Closer Look: Part One; Details", April 13, 2012; Now It's Filipino Bearer Bonds: A Closer Look:

- We have also noted, however, that "gold" is also a code-word for "drugs," and hence, the possibility arises that the genuine exemplars of these bonds (if the bonds are not themselves really genuine) are not so much gold-backed as drug-backed. This possibility would then, perforce, mean that at some deep level, international criminal syndicates are involved in whatever operation the bearer bonds scandals might represent.
- The "Kennedy" bearer bond, as suggested, contained clues that the whole scandal might have something to do with space, and even with the possibility that something out there is being used as collateral.

We are confronted therefore with the distinct possibility of a monstrously large counterfeiting operation, based on real exemplars, and inside knowledge, and moreover, an operation that at some element would appear to represent a rogue element, a breakaway element deeply hidden within the U.S. power structure. The only question is, what would such vast sums of money be used for? And who is doing all this?

We are also confronted with another distinct, and disturbing, possibility, namely, that whoever is behind the counterfeiting represented by the bearer bonds scandals may be an entirely different group than the group behind the originals upon which the counterfeits are based. In this case, it would appear that someone is not only sending messages, but perhaps in doing so, is waging a kind of covert "counterfeiting war." It has been implied that part of the motivation for such a vast and hidden system of finance is a covert one, a covert space or scientific-technological venture. But such a vast sum of money could also fund a great deal of covert operations here on earth.

The reason that this message is not being sent by those involved in the establishment and maintenance of this hidden and huge system of finance, and the covert research and operations empire that it funds, is rather simple: why would those involved with it expose it? To expose it is to reveal just how corrupt and fraudulent the western financial oligarchy and its major public and private financial institutions really are. It is also to expose the major source of all manner of covert operations, a subject that will be covered in part two. It is to expose the very life-blood of the breakaway group. Hence, one must reach the tentative conclusion that this exposure is coming from someone else with inside knowledge of the whole operation. This "someone else" will be explored in due course, when the full history and structural outline of the operation has been presented.

For now, however, if it be true that one does not counterfeit (1) something that cannot be transacted, and (2) something that does not exist, then how would one launder such counterfeits? One would have to go to a place with access to banking, and to a place which carried with it the aura of the highest moral probity.

One would have to go to the Vatican.

B. An Earlier Episode: The Vatican, The Mob, Industrial-Scale Counterfeiting, and More Connections

1. De Lorenzo and Rizzo

The Vatican connection is best illustrated by an event from 1971 to 1973, in which a New York City police investigation of Mafia activities quickly led to a large-scale Mafia counterfeiting ring, and to highly positioned and powerful hierarchs within the Vatican City-State itself. While a detailed presentation of the event is not possible here, there are certain aspects of the case that are worth noting.

Matteo de Lorenzo was a Mafia boss during the 1970s, specializing in moving the syndicate's moneys into legitimate investments, and this meant into stocks, bonds, and other types of corporate and government securities. The man overseeing the day-to-day activities of this portfolio of investments was one Vicent Rizzo. Richard Hammer, whose book The Vatican Connection first detailed this complex story, observed that this portfolio was:

> …worth close to a billion dollars and it was filled with such choice blue-chip investments as United States Treasury bills, bonds, and notes, bonds of the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank and the Federal National Mortgage Association, common stock and bonds in major corporations such as National Aviation Company, Unishops Inc., General Portland Cement Company, International Business Machines, Beneficial Finance Company, California Computer Corporation, First Union, Inc., Capital Holding Corporation, Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Los Angeles, Occidental Petroleum Corporation, Norton Simon, Inc.,

> American Telephone and Telegraph Company, General Electric Corporation, and more.[18]

But, as Hammer points out, "legitimate" means one thing to ordinary society, and quite another to the secretive world of crime lords:

> Their definition of stock trading and legitimate business was unique to them, could be found in no dictionary unless it was one they wrote themselves. They had not bought their stocks and bonds, notes and bills in the ordinary manner, through brokerage houses of from banks. They had accumulated them from the mail sacks of the United States Postal Service, from private homes, from the vaults of such major banks and brokerage houses as Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company, Bankers Trust Company, Security Pacific Bank, Continental Illinois Trust Company, Blair and Company, Shearson Hammill, Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner and Smith, and a lot of others, and from the private engravings and printing presses of their friends, allies and employees.
> ...
> They had their hands in everything. They were the men who controlled the distribution of stolen and counterfeit American securities throughout the world.[19]

By dint of its worldwide extent, an extent connected inextricably and ineluctably to its international drug smuggling and arms dealing, the Mafia was also one of the few organizations capable of carrying out a worldwide trade in counterfeit securities and currencies. In effect, it is in its own right a kind of breakaway civilization, with its own hierarchy and bureaucracy, its own "laws" and "codes of ethics," and with a clear interface with the "normal" public world.

In any case, De Lorenzo and Rizzo were both part of the Genovese crime family, and this too bears an important though rather obvious implication for any consideration of the structure of the breakaway civilization as it emerged after World War Two, and how that structure in turn is related to its finances. Like all secretive bureaucracies and organizational structures, its organization paralleled the publicly visible demarcations of jurisdiction in political society; for each and every German Länder, there was not only a government figure, but a corresponding Nazi Party Gauleiter; for every Oblosk in Russia, a corresponding Communist Kommisar, and, in the Mafia, for every city or state, a corresponding Capo or "boss" of the territory. The powerful Genovese crime family of New York, in turn, had close and deep ties to American intelligence, dating back to World War Two and the "alliance" between then Genovese crime boss Lucky Luciano, and General Wild Bill Donovan's Office of Strategic Services, the OSS, forerunner to the CIA.

[19] Ibid., pp. 2-3,. emphasis added.

In any case, through a series of wiretaps on local Mafia personnel, obtained in response to what were purely local matters of law enforcement,[20] the New York City police department soon found itself following a case, via close surveillance of Vincent Rizzo, that quickly became international in scope. While Rizzo had, and carefully cultivated, the image of being a low-level soldier in the New York syndicate,[21] it quickly became clear to the New York police surveilling and reporting on Rizzo that he was far more, for he would be regularly seen in the company of the highest Mafia bosses.[22] It was another De Lorenzo, Anthony, that had persuaded the Mafia bosses that vast profits could be made by dealing in Wall Street—and, of course, in stolen and counterfeit securities—and his soldier or point man in coordinating all this activity was Vince Rizzo.[23]

Rizzo was also involved in another activity for the Genovese crime family, and that was running guns to South America, [24] a fact that suggests there is some connection between the Mafia and the post-war "Nazi International" in that continent, as well as a connection to American intelligence's arms and drug trade in that region.

In any case, as the NYPD continued its surveillance of Rizzo, it soon found him frequently in the company of one William Benjamin, a well-known, and capable, forger, and dealer of counterfeited and stolen securities, and, notably, stolen and counterfeit airline tickets, a fact which quickly turned their city investigation into a federal one.[25] The FBI, however, was not initially interested in the case,[26] leaving the NYPD to pursue the matter as best as it could.

The pursuit and surveillance of Rizzo soon led to an unlikely place, and to an unlikely meeting.

The place was Munich, Germany.[27]

The NYPD quickly arranged for wiretaps on Rizzo's hotel room in conjunction with their counterparts in Munich, and were soon listening into a strange exchange between Rizzo, American Mafia "handler," and one Winifred Ense. German police quickly checked their record to discover that he was "a businessman of uncertain reputation. He had been questioned by the police about his link to the sale in Brussels eighteen months before of a stolen $100,000 United States Treasury certificate. He was also suspected of being deeply involved in spreading stolen stocks and bonds around Europe."[28]

Rizzo's purpose in coming to Munich, the police soon learned, was for the purposes of collecting $350,000 which Ense and one of his associates, Alfred Barg, apparently owed the Mafia.[29] Barg and Rizzo agreed to set up a meeting in Rizzo's hotel room, a room which was, of course, tapped.

2. Dr. Leopold Ledl and "Ricky" Jacobs

When the meeting occurred, the New York and Munich police soon learned that Rizzo's mission was not only to collect the $350,000 owed to his bosses back in New York, but also to conclude a mysterious "arrangement."[30] In surveillance and detective work, patience is often the most rewarding virtue, and the same was true in this case, for the American and German police surveilling Rizzo soon found Rizzo not only keeping the strange company of the German businessman Ense, with all his suspicious activity dealing in stolen and counterfeit securities, but once again dealing with the well-known Mafia forger William Benjamin, and a newcomer, and quite an infamous one at that, one "Dr. Ledl."

Viennese "Dr." Leopold Ledl was the consummate image of a suave, sophisticated European grifter and confidence man. Seller of faked academic degrees, titles of nobility, even certificates of diplomatic immunity, Ledl was able by these means to gather around him a network of friends and contacts, and was sooner collecting genuine credentials and academic degrees, including honorary doctorates from the University of Rome, from the University of the Vatican State. These credentials then became the basis for his own counterfeiting of credentials from prestigious institutions, which he could then sell to anyone… for the right price.[31] He was thus able to number in his network of friends and acquaintances some very powerful people, as we shall see shortly.

[28] Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection, p. 67.

[29] Ibid., pp. 68-69.

[30] Ibid., pp. 73-73.

As the police listened to a conversation between Rizzo and German "businessman" Ense, Ledl's name was first mentioned, and mentioned in a context that the eavesdropping detectives could scarcely believe. Ense, while talking to Rizzo, suddenly let slip certain details of the mysterious "arrangement":

> "And Ricky asked me not one or two or three times, twenty times, 'ask him again. Is he quite sure that the people in Rome, in the Vatican, his friends, that they want counterfeit?' And Dr. Ledl says, 'They want all I can get. I can only say, yes, that's what they want.'"[32]

The Vatican. Counterfeits in unlimited amounts. The Mafia.

This raised the stakes entirely beyond even the American federal level.

The case had become not only international, but very deep, and, with the mention of Dr. Ledl, and "Ricky," had just moved into the "dangerous" and "stratospheric" category.

We have already touched briefly on Dr. Ledl, and shall do so again, but what about "Ricky"?

"Ricky" was one Manuel Richard Jacobs,[33] a high-level Mafia securities "trader", and intimate of Los Angeles and Chicago Mafia capos Johnny Roselli, and Sam Giancana.[34] So powerful, and necessary, to the syndicate's securities trade was "Ricky," that even while serving a prison sentence in a federal minimum security prison, Jacobs managed to continue his "business,"[35] a fact that suggests at least some level of federal government acquiescence or complicity in his activities, an odd thing, since the FBI had also become convinced that "Ricky Jacobs was the man behind several million dollars' worth of stolen and counterfeit blue-chip American corporate and government securities that had been turning up all over the United States and around the world."[36]

[35] Ibid., p. 97.

[36] Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection, p. 98.

In other words, while the FBI had fingered Jacobs as a crucial figure in a Mafia-sponsored industrial scale and worldwide counterfeiting ring, Jacobs, while serving a prison sentence, continued to conduct his affairs; it was business as usual.

As the mystified American and German police began to connect the dots of this bizarre set of characters and activities, they quickly came to one conclusion: the international industrial scale counterfeiting ring with some sort of mysterious connection to the Vatican that they had stumbled into was "a combine of German swindlers and Americans who had once served in the military stationed in Germany or who were frequent travelers in and out of Munich."[37] Such a vast counterfeiting effort, as we have argued previously, would require at some level, an access to inside intelligence information as well as access to a vast intelligence network. In this case, the Mafia may have had such information from its contacts with the CIA, or, conversely, via some arrangement with German intelligence headquartered just outside of Munich in Pullach,[38] or both.

In any case, Rizzo returned to New York City, his "business" in Munich and the mysterious "arrangements" apparently concluded. It was back in New York that the New York police wiretaps on one of Rizzo's frequent haunts turned up yet another connection to the swindling and counterfeiting underworld when they intercepted a telephone call between the mob boss and a suave British confidence man, Tony Grant.[39] Grant's base of operations at the time was in Argentina,[40] a fact which raises its own interesting and obvious questions. Subsequent wire-tapped conversations between Rizzo and Ense also revealed that Grant was somehow connected to the "arrangement" in Munich between the Mafia, Dr. Ledl, and the Vatican.[41]

As the police wiretaps continued and the dots were increasingly connected, another astonishing, chilling, fact soon became clear: the centerpiece of the "arrangement" being conducted between Rizzo, Benjamin, Jacobs, Ense, and Dr. Ledl included, as its very key and centerpiece, the counterfeiting of U.S. Treasury bills on a massive scale.[42]

But it was only when they concentrated on the notorious international grifter, Dr. Ledl, that police uncovered the dark heart of the matter, and the truly awesome scale of what they were dealing with.

3. Dr. Ledl, Bishop Paul Marcinkus of the Vatican Bank, Michele Sindona, and Eugene Cardinal Tisserant

Ledl moved in some very heady circles of power via his contacts in Rome, including circles that put him in direct contact with the head of security for Pope Paul VI, American Bishop Paul Marcinkus.[43] Marcinkus in turn maintained close ties to the Vatican bank, the Institute for Religious Works, an institution that he also headed into the pontificate of John-Paul II.[44] A contact between a known grifter and swindler, whose contacts included Mafiosi conducting industrial-scale counterfeiting, and the Vatican bank was bad enough, but Marcinkus in turn was a known close associate of the notorious Mafia-connected and quite ruthless banker, Michele Sindona, a member of the notorious Italian Masonic Lodge, Propaganda Due, about which we shall have much to say in part two. Marcinkus and Sindona were so closely connected that the two bankers shared a common private numbered bank account in the Bahamas.[45] As head of the Vatican bank, and security chief to the pope, Marcinkus was literally the papal gatekeeper; it was he who decided who got to see the pope, and who did not.[46] He was, so to speak, an ecclesiastical version of Martin Bormann: faithful "secretary" to The Leader, with fingers, like Bormann, in every financial pie imaginable.

But Ledl's contacts went much farther and higher in the Vatican that just Bishop Paul Marcinkus. As Richard Hammer notes, a special bond had been forged between Ledl and Part of these securities, as Hammer notes, were to be used for "the economic rape of Panama"(See p. 172), yet another darkly suspicious connection, in view of the U.S. invasion of that country a little over a decade and a half later under the administration of former CIA director, and then sitting U.S. President, George H. W. Bush.

> Eugene Cardinal Tisserant, dean of the college of cardinals… still actively running the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and distributing funds to the church's foreign missions. Instantly recognizable by his long, white beard and patrician bearing, the scholarly, sophisticated French-born Tisserant, perhaps the cardinal closest to Pope Paul VI, appeared to be charmed by Ledl and saw in him, perhaps, a man he might one day put to good use.[47]

Cardinal Tisserant, let it also be noted, was also the Cardinal that for many years was in charge of the Vatican archives, and was involved in numerous other "activities" as we shall see.

Eugene Cardinal Tisserant

---

[47] Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection, p. 210.

Eugene Cardinal Tisserant

As Ledl finally told the story to FBI and other officials, once they had finally decided to become involved in the case, he and Eugene Cardinal Tisserant met in 1971, with only an unnamed archbishop—the Cardinal's assistant—with them. According to Ledl, Cardinal Tisserant asked him if he had "any suggestions or ideas as to how the church might find the means to solve some of its pressing monetary problems, and those of Italy, as well."[48] Ledl had ideas, but not any of the sort that one "might put to a man like Cardinal Tisserant in the heart of the Roman Catholic church."[49]

[48] Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection, p. 211.

[49] Ibid., p. 211.

At this point, the conversation unfolded in a very bizarre way:

> "No ideas at all, my friend from Vienna?" Tisserant pressed.
> Ledl could not bring himself to give voice to those ideas.
> Tisserant sighed, looked at the archbishop. Surely, he said, Ledl, with all his vast experience in such matters, must know how to obtain a great many securities that would assist the Vatican and the Italian nation.
> Ledl asked what kind of securities?
> Tisserant laughed. "First-class securities, of course," he said, "in large American companies."
> Ledl sensed the drift of the conversation, but he wanted to be sure. He said it might be difficult to obtain such paper.
> "If they are counterfeit?" Tisserant asked mildly.
> Now, Ledl knew. He asked what amounts was the cardinal talking about?
> Close to a billion dollars, Tisserant said. To be precise, the figure they had in mind was $950 million. Half, he said, would be channeled through Bishop Marcinkus and the Vatican Bank, to make up for some of the losses the Vatican had suffered as a result of Marcinkus's investments….[50]

We have now come to one of the hearts of the matter, one of the key points of contact between any hidden tier of system of finance, based upon fraud, for any breakaway civilization, and the "real" world, for a private bank that is the direct ancillary of a sovereign state like the Vatican, with the penumbra of religion and piety cast over its dealings, would be in a position to use counterfeit or "unauthorized production" (to employ Heydrich's term once again) of any securities as a means of extending genuine lines of credit, or, alternatively, selling them for real money to unwitting customers.

But the implications of the outlines of this emerging structure do not stop there. As Ledl subsequently told authorities, his conversation with Cardinal Tisserant continued:

> Weren't the cardinal and the others, Ledl asked, at all concerned what might happen if it were discovered that the Vatican was dealing in counterfeit American securities? It was one thing for a businessman, or even a large company, to venture into such treacherous waters. But for an institution such as the Vatican to do so…

[50] Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection, pp. 211-212, emphasis added.

> Tisserant waved that away. He was not at all concerned, he said, nor were any of those he had discussed this with. They all agreed that the American government would never accuse the Vatican of knowingly dealing in counterfeit stocks and bonds. In fact, if it was discovered that such paper existed in the Vatican, the United States would undoubtedly believe the church had been taken by some unscrupulous swindlers and so would secretly step in and make good the losses.
> If he could, indeed, find such first-class counterfeit merchandise, Ledl asked, how much was the church willing to pay for it?
> If Ledl could make such a delivery, which the cardinal and his friends were sure he could, Tisserant said, then the Vatican and the Bank of Italy would pay him and his sources sixty-five percent of the face value, or about $625 million. Of course, Ledl and his people must understand that they wuld be expected to kick back a quarter of that amount, or about $150 million, to Tisserant, Marcinkus and the others who had developed this plan. Still, that would leave Ledl and his people about $475 million. That should be enough to pay for their troubles.[51]

Cardinal Tisserant's remarks to Ledl—that the American government would never challenge the Vatican for dealing in counterfeit securities, and that it would "secretly step in and make good the losses" should such counterfeit paper ever to be exposed—ring hollow.

It is far more likely that the whole proposal was of the "two can play the official counterfeiting game" variety, and that any exposure of the Vatican-based operation to U.S. authorities would have been of such a nature to communicate the message, "if you can do it, so can we." In short, Cardinal Tisserant probably knew something, and that something, as we have averred earlier in this chapter with our examination of the remarks of Lord Blackheath, and the recurring bearer bonds scandals, was that there was vast fraud taking place within, and in the name of, the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank and the U.S. Treasury.

And…

…there is one final thing that must be remembered about Eugene Cardinal Tisserant…

He, along with the Pope whom he served, Paul VI—Giovanni Cardinal Montini—was intimately involved in the Vatican's ratline operations, helping Italian Fascists, German Nazis, Croatian Ustashi,

SACRA CONGREGAZIONE
DEI RELIGIOSI

To whom it may concern:

Following our meeting whic took place today, we wish to confirm the following points:

1) We are willing to buy the complete stock of the merchandise up to the sum of $ 950, - mio.

2) We are agreed upon the terms and dates of consignment, as indicated bellow:

9.3.71	per	100
10.9.71	"	200
10.10.71	"	200
10.12.71	"	200

It is understood that the last two consignments, most probably, could be made together on the 10.11.71.

3) We guarantee that the merchandise will not be resord up to and not after 1.6.1972.

Yours faithfully

Rome, Jun. 29. 1971.

SECRET AGENTS, SECRET BONDS, SECRET ALGORITHMS AND SECRET FINANCE:

SAM ISRAEL, DANNY CASOLARO, THE INSLAW OCTOPUS AND QUANTUM MECHANICS

" The American dollar, the global economy, all of it could be seen as one vast Ponzi scheme."
Guy Lawson[1]

"You see, I've had a side theory about another reason why PROMIS was taken. And it was that PROMIS could also be modified to track money laundering."
John Cohen[2]

There is another contemporary aspect of this industrial-scale counterfeiting story that we must now consider, one even more darkly revealing of the structure and associated principal players of the hidden system of "breakaway finance," before returning once again to World War Two, to consider the underpinnings of that structure, and why we keep encountering the same pattern of official denials, central bank obfuscation, and underground criminal agents and the implied inside knowledge that can only come from intelligence agencies. This is the case of high flying Wall Street hedge fund manager and broker, Sam Israel, and the embrace of the tentacles of an Octopus that he inadvertently walked into.

In this case, the tentacles of the Octopus that he walked into strongly suggest a component to this hidden structure of finance that should be obvious: how would one track all that extra and "suspect" money in the system? Obviously, the advent of computers, and database management software, would simplify the problem enormously, and additionally, with certain "modifications," would allow the masters of such a hidden system not only to track their money, but to spy on competitors, and to cook their own, or an opponent's, books at the push of a button.

These possibilities inform the case of Sam Israel.

Israel was born in 1959 to a family of well-to-do commodities traders in New Orleans, specializing in coffee, sugar, precious metals, and so on.[3] He is currently incarcerated, serving a 22 year sentence, two years of which was for faking his own suicide to escape the 20 year term for fraud. But this is no ordinary fraud case, and indeed, as we shall see, aspects of the case fit a now well-known pattern of secret bonds and secret markets. Indeed, the first question that might be asked about the entire affair is why federal prosecutors placed much of the evidence of the case under seal.[4] Just what some of this evidence is will emerge as the story unfolds.

Long before he had become a high profile Wall Street broker and hedge fund manager, Israel learned how markets could be manipulated when his family would stockpile secret caches of commodities—cocoa for example—on barges along the Mississippi, and when the fake shortage had driven prices up, would unload the stockpile and make a large profit.[5] It was in the rarefied atmosphere of computer-aided high-frequency trading on Wall Street that began to emerge in the late 1980s, however, that Israel began to see enormous possibilities, and if he saw them, one can be certain others did too.

A. High Frequency Trading, Computers and Quantum Mechanics

The essence of high frequency trading is large volume, trading very rapidly in the shortest movements of time, in response to slight movements in the market. These types of trades are pre-programmed into computers which place buy and sell orders for particular securities according to pre-determined conditions written into the program. Thus, several trades can be programmed into a computer and these can all be executed, if market conditions are right, within mere minutes or even seconds, if the conditions being monitored by a computer trigger the pre-programmed conditions: a fall before, or a rise above, a certain price for a certain stock or type of stock, a buy order or a sell order, and these can be executed in high volume and as rapidly as the computer can process them, which is, of course, far faster than a human trader waving papers and hollering buy or sell orders on the floor of a stock or commodities exchange.

A moment's reflection will show that only computers can execute such trades, and that such trades conceivably can gain immense profits, or losses, for their programmer-trader, in a very short period of time. Equally, a moment's reflection will show that such trades could be completely out of step with actual market and financial conditions. One is, so to speak, already looking at a kind of virtual market whose anchorage in reality could potentially be very tenuous, and in these conditions, a hidden financial system could thrive and grow, provided one had the right kind of sophisticated programming knowledge to exploit any hidden structures that may already have been in place.

A little further reflection upon this practice and the technologies that enable it will also disclose that if an individual trader—such as Sam Israel—knew even a few minutes in advance of such a trade, that a good profit could be made, and hence, high frequency high volume trading also invites, by the nature of the case, the temptation to "insider trading," i.e., trading and manipulation of markets based upon advanced knowledge of even only a few minutes.[6]

Finally, there are, upon reflection, two inherent dangers to such a system. One began to be written about almost as soon as the practice of high frequency-high volume computer-generated trading became commonplace. Guy Lawson, whose excellent investigation of the Israel case we are reviewing here, puts it this way:

> In the fall of '87 there were stirrings in the press that the new preprogrammed trading systems contained an inherent flaw—a contradiction that could lead to a fiasco. The problem was so obvious it beggared belief that it hadn't been noticed by the supposedly smartest traders on earth. If all the program traders had set their machines to sell in a falling market, then it followed that when the market fell all the program trades would be selling at the same time, creating a crash.[7]

But there is another inherent danger to such a system, and that is the deliberate manipulation of such trading programs via secret back doors that would allow a programmer to hack into the computer systems of banks and brokerage houses, and program trades tailor made to generate a specific situation: bubbles, then crashes, and so on. This possibility, as we shall discover, looms larger and larger the deeper one probes the Israel case.

[6] See the short discussed in Guy Lawson, Octopus, pp. 16-17.

[7] Ibid., p. 42. As Lawson notes, this is exactly what happened in the crash of 1987, when the Federal Reserve Bank directly intervened. (See p. 43)

As he pondered the wonders of computer-aided trading, however, Sam Israel was alive to none of these possibilities, becoming obsessed, rather, by the possibility that such programs could literally represent, in a certain sense, the "algorithms of the future", and in that, he similarly perceived, like so many others at the time, the deep connection that this implied between finance, and physics. Becoming a close reader of the German physicist Jurgen Ehlers, Israel was fascinated by Ehler's "study of 'hidden symmetries' and the predictive possibilities of 'frame theory'" and in "how quantum physics might enable him to anticipate movements in the market as if stocks were particles of light."[8] Combining his insights from years as a trader with his newfound love for "econophysics," Israel designed his own computer trading program which he called "Forward Propagation:"

> The word forward spoke to the software's soothsaying powers. Propagation aimed to conjure wave theory, biological reproduction, and religious evangelicism(sic), all with a whiff of mathematical mysticism. Like fractals, the multiplying self-similar geometric shapes that occur in coastlines and snowflakes and lightning bolts, there were shapes to be divined inside the seemingly incoherent data, Israel maintained. With some fine-tuning, the machine could give him the ability to see those hidden patterns in stock prices.[9]

With this tool in hand, Israel founded his own hedge fund in 1996, Bayou, and thus did his slide into fraud, and his collision with the "Octopus", begin.

1. Bayou's Good Start

Starting with only $600,000 and the "Forward Propagation" program to guide them, Sam and his partners initially followed its forecasts closely, to the extent that, within the first three and a half months, the firm had performed at 17.6 percent, and on an annual basis this would have meant a "performance of over 50 percent return, an incredible feat."[10]

---

[8] Ibid., p. 41. The connection between physics and finance and the cosmological views implied by both is very ancient, and has been known to the financial sectors of human civilization for some time. See my Babylon's Banksters (Feral House, 2010) and my The Financial Vipers of Venice (Feral House, 2013).

[9] Guy Lawson, Octopus., p. 51.

So incredible was this feat that a Park Avenue investment firm called Redstone Capital Corporation approached Sam and his partners about the possibility of taking the fund public and selling it to investors. One of Redstone's employees even sent a letter to a prospective investor trumpeting the ability of the program to predict good trades.[11] The program worked, according to the letter, by analyzing a data stream on markets fed to it by a satellite, and was accurate in its predictions 86 percent of the time.[12] Using the program, and staying strictly within ethical bounds, Israel and his partners were able in a matter of months to almost double their money.

2. Problems and the Decision to Cook the Books

The slide into fraud began when one of Sam's partners urged purchasing a gold company stock, Barrick, which had just announced an agreement with Indonesian dictator Suharto to acquire the majority interest into "the largest gold deposit found in decades."[13] With former President G.H.W. Bush on the board of Barrick, Sam thought it was sure to have the ear of the Indonesian dictator, and hence be a sure investment.

Unfortunately, another company sued, amid predictable allegations "of graft and market manipulation."[14] Barrick did not get its Indonesian gold rights, its market capitalization was slashed 50 percent, and of course the Bayou fund was in trouble, and Israel and his partners began to tell their partners that the fund "was thriving—even when it was losing."[15] While the details of how Israel and his partners originally decided to commit fraud and "cook the books" are fascinating,[16] they do not concern us here. Suffice it to say that they decided that in order to keep their losses hidden from investors until such time as they could regain the losses by further trades, the decision was taken to maintain two sets of books—the genuine ones, and the ones shown to investors—even to the point of obtaining a fake office for the company to present a "winning, profitable image," and creating a fake accounting company complete with faked corporate logo, to perform the "audits" on the fund to show potential investors, or investors who had already put money into the fund and who were asking questions.[17]

[16] See Lawson's explanation of the corporate structure of the Bayou fund on pp. 56-57, and how this structure was used to hide the losses from the investors on pp. 62-63.

This scheme continued, as the losses mounted, until Sept. 11, 2001. By this point, the fund had grown to $70,000,000 but losses were $12,000,000,[18] and in effect, one set of investors had to be found to pay off a previous set. The Friday before Sept. 11, Israel's "Forward Propagation" computer program "had lit up like a slot machine with a row of cherries. Normally, the computer offered contradictory data points some pointing to buy, others to sell. But that Friday, all tend lights on the computer had pointed in the same direction: Go long."[19] To Israel and his hard-pressed partners in fraud, it appeared the golden opportunity to recoup losses, clean up the books, and end the fraud.

Israel placed ninety-five percent of all of the fund's money into trading orders on the Friday before the Monday of Sept. 11, 2001.[20] All the indicators were that the trades would be successful, and that the Bayou fund would recoup its losses.

But then the airplanes hit the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center, and the market was closed, and remained closed for a week. As Sam Israel put it to Guy Lawson, whose book is the only study of the Bayou fund fraud case, "There was no trading. Nothing. I couldn't get out of any of my positions. It was obvious the market was going to tank. I couldn't do anything until trading started again."[21] When trading finally opened again, the extent of the damage became clear, and as 2001 trudged on, the fund only dug in deeper:

> At the end of 2001, according to the audit of Richmond-Fairfield, Bayou had $85,354,183 in net assets. This included $10.7 million in cash on deposit with Bayou's clearinghouse, as well as $10 million in securities—SPDR's Texas Instruments, national Semiconductor. The > sum "Due from Brokers" was $64,499,627—a measure of the meteoric rise of the fraud.[22]

Desperate men do desperate things, and as the fraud and losses only grew, Sam increasingly turned to unusual solutions… and this is where his story brushes up against the breakaway civilization, and the hidden system of finance that has been outlined in previous chapters.

This is where Sam walked straight into the tentacles of the Octopus.

B. Sam Israel and "the Secret Bond Market"

1. Israel Learns of the Inslaw Affair and the PROMIS Software Program

In his desperation to find some quick fix for the difficulties that compounded fraud had now put him in, Sam Israel cast about for all manner of solutions, and soon found them through a friend. The "solution" was a man named Robert Booth Nichols, a name well-known in the halls of "conspirology." Nichols by his own admission was a "covert operator," a "real-life Jason Bourne, a black ops national security asset who had worked on the dakr side of America's covert activities for decades."[23] Israel's friend told him that Nichols was "a stone-cold killer, an agent who functioned at the absolute highest levels of government."[24] But it was Nichol's connection to one particular scandal that caught Israel's attention when Israel began to read a website called The Last Circle, subsequently published as a book by its author, Cheri Seymour. The Last Circle will be consulted in this chapter in a moment, but first one must see how Lawson records Israel's story.

As Israel read about Nichols in The Last Circle, is quickly became apparent to him that:

> …Nicholas had been involved in virtually every nefarious covert plot carried out by the U.S. Government for the part three decades. Iran-Contra, the October Surprise, the CIA's mind-control experiment called MK Ultra—Nichols was the Zelig of the conspiracy theory world. When the CIA dealt heroin to fund the war against Hezbollah in Beirut in the 1980s, Nichols was there. When Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines smuggled billions of bullion into Swiss bank accounts, his "facilitator" was Nichols. When three people were murdered on the

> Cabazon Indian reservation outside Palm Springs in the summer of 1981, Nichols was there developing illegal biological weapons and machine guns to arm Nicaraguan rebels.[25]

It was this triple homicide that became part of the investigation of the theft of some high-level database management software called PROMIS, being developed by a Maryland company called Inslaw, for the use of the Department of Justice. PROMIS stood for Prosecutor's Management Information system.[26]

It was this software that captured Israel's attention, for as the lore surrounding the Inslaw scandal indicated, its capabilities were enormous, and held out the prospect of a solution to Israel's hedge fund difficulties. As Lawson summarizes its capabilities, Inslaw's PROMIS software > had been so successful that American intelligence agency apparatus had secretly stolen the software to put it to use covertly. The CIA had reconfigured the code and installed it in 32-bit Digital Equipment Corporation DAX minicomputers. The agency had used front companies to sell the new technology to banks and leading financial institutions like the Federal Reserve. Hidden inside the computer was a "trapdoor" that enabled intelligence agencies to covertly monitor financial transactions digitally for the first time. The highly classified initiative, known as "Follow the Money," had allowed the Reagan administration to trace the Libyan government's secret funding of a terrorist group that had bombed a disco in Berlin in 1986, killing an American soldier and wounding two hundred civilians. In Bob Woodward's book Veil, former CIA director William Casey said the secret money-tracking system had been one of his proudest achievements.[27]

Sam Israel realized that American intelligence had gained the capability to track any monetary transactions, including those of the secretive and private Federal Reserve Bank, in real time.[28] If he could acquire the program somehow, Sam realized that by integrating it with his own "Forward Propagation" trading program that he would—as Lawson puts it—be a "one-man National Security Agency"[29] because he would have access to up-to-the-minute financial signals intelligence.[30]

[25] Ibid., p. 143.

[26] Paradoxically, the claim by some researchers of the Inslaw affair that PROMIS was stolen by the U.S. Government and subsequently made its way throughout the federal bureaucracy appears to have some merit, for there is a "Patient Reported Outcomes Measurement Information System" which has been funded by the National Institutes of Health, and yet another PROMIS, a Public Records Online Management System, also apparently called a Pupil Records Online Management Information System, in use by the San Joaquin County Office of Education (https://www.mypromis.org/index.aspx).

[27] Guy Lawson, Octopus, p. 144, emphasis added.

This also means that American intelligence had also acquired a powerful weapon in the arsenal of any hidden system of finance, both for keeping such a system secret, and for tracking its activities, provided, of course, that such a system existed.

For Sam Israel, however, the clear implication was that such a secretive market did exist. As he put it to researcher Guy Lawson:

> "A lightbulb went off in my head," Sam recalled. "The PROMIS software was the answer to everything I'd suspected about the markets. I'd seen how the markets were manipulated after the crash of 1987. But I didn't know how they did it—how the money actually flowed into the market. If I had PROMIS I could track the movement of money. I could see how the Fed operated. If money was going into semiconductors, then I could get there ahead of the market… I would be at the flux point. I would be able to see the volume going up before the stock moved… It would be the ultimate inside trade."[31]

Note the implications of Israel's remarks, for in essence, what he is saying is that the securities market—once one factors in the implications of a program like PROMIS and the intelligence community's penetration of the central banks that it affords—is nothing but a bit of theater, manipulated for an audience's benefit, for the brokerage houses and even the central banks themselves are at the mercy of technocrats, computer programmers, social engineers, and, above all, intelligence oligarchs whose shadowy lives move between finance and intelligence like a bar of wet soap.

Nor is this assessment far removed from what researchers into the Inslaw affair have uncovered, for needless to say, the story was so real, and so huge, that the indefatigably lazy American lamestream media would barely touch it. Cheri Seymour, whose The Last Circle was eventually published as a book, delved deeply into the Danny Casolaro investigation of the Inslaw affair, and deeply into Casolaro's "murder by suicide" in a motel in West Virginia. Casolaro, who had been hired by Inslaw company founder Bill Hamilton to investigate the theft of his company's software, soon uncovered so many tendrils and threads of conspiracy leading so many places that he dubbed the entity "The Octopus," and was in the final stages of investigation and beginning to compile notes for a book on the subject. Summoned to Martinsburg, West Virginia by an unnamed source who indicated that he would reveal the final missing key to Casolaro, and that Casolaro should bring his important files and notes on the subject, Casolaro never returned from the meeting. He was found by a cleaning maid on August 10, 1991, in the bathtub of his room, with numerous deep cuts to both wrists.

Investigative Journalist Danny Casolaro

Retracing Casolaro's steps and contacts, Seymour quickly confirmed that Casolaro's sources did indeed maintain that the PROMIS software had been stolen, and that the program had subsequently been modified to include "backdoors". The program had then been sold under a variety of names to various banks, corporations, and most importantly, foreign intelligence services. The backdoor allowed the U.S. intelligence community to access the computer systems and databases of wherever the program went.[32] The software was so flexible in its management capabilities for different types of databases that it allowed the easy tracking of arms, of people, of drugs, to such an extent that it allowed the "enterprise" behind the Iran-Contra controversy to be essentially a self-supporting system,[33] or to put it differently, Iran-Contra was but one operation of a completely self-sustaining system that required, and had, no government oversight, from anywhere. It was, in short, a manifestation of the breakaway civilization. According to Seymour, Casolaro had even told close friends that he had been able to link the Inslaw scandal and similar episodes "back to a dirty CIA 'Old Boy' network' that had begun in the 1950s.[34] Some of the connections between the Inslaw affair and the rogue CIA group that Casolaro had uncovered were the now infamous banking scandals that began to rock the world beginning with the Reagan Administration and continuing for the rest of the century: The BCCI, or Bank of Credit and Commerce International, somewhat more accurately called by researchers the Bank of Crooks and Criminals, International. Casolaro had also uncovered connections to the Savings and Loan scandal, the Keating Five, and on and on it went.[35]

a. The Promise of PROMIS: The Gatekeeper between the Breakaway Civilization, its Hidden System of Finance, and the Overworld

Most importantly, Seymour stated—and one can only imagine the impression that such a statement would have had on Sam Israel—that Bill Hamilton, the founder of Inslaw, had told her that one version of PROMIS had been modified by the National Security Agency specifically in a "bank surveillance version" to monitor proceeds from drug sales.[36] In other words, the technology was intimately tied to the financial community, and to the vast underground economy of the international drug cartels and criminal syndicates. The software was, so to speak, the gatekeeper of the interface between the "overworld", the visible system of finance, and the hidden system, a system that used drugs as an international currency, and referred to them as gold.[37] The system, via its backdoor, could be used as a valuable tool to track money laundering.[38] Seymour even discovered the possibility that the PROMIS software may have been suspected by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as "being used in the international banking system for illegal activities."[39]

[34] Cheri Seymour, The Last Circle, p. 41.

[35] Ibid., pp. 51-52. Casolaro also revealed a connection to the Nugan Hand banking scandal, a fact which, according to Seymour, may have led to his "murder by suicide," for Casolaro wrote up his allegations in a memorandum and presented them to the U.S. Department of Justice just before he was murdered. (See pp. 207-208)

[36] Ibid., p. 65.

In short, Casolaro had uncovered a "rogue group," an international "breakaway group" operating entirely on its own, but that group was not at its core a cabal of international bankers, but rather, a core of intelligence operatives, rogue military men, technocrats, and, of course, corrupt, or compromised, bankers.

According to Seymour, Inslaw founder Bill Hamilton had come to his own similar conclusions. He believed "…after more than two decades of research, that the modified version of his PROMIS software had been used for money laundering of drug profits to fund unauthorized intelligence operations…."[40] Indeed, such a powerful program would not only allow the tracking of covert financial activities, and even for the existence of an entire covert financial system, but it would also allow something equally important for such a system to exist, namely, the ability to cover its tracks and obfuscate its activities by using the "backdoor" to modify the actual numbers of transactions….say, for example, the amounts of gold actually in existence. Such a tool would allow the same amount of gold to be used as the backing or collateral to float securities over and over in different issues.

b. The Promise of PROMIS:
The People-Tracking Capability

Seymour is not alone in her assessment of the capabilities—the promise—of PROMIS, for almost any serious researcher into the Inslaw affair will encounter them. For researcher Kenn Thomas and the late Jim Keith, the PROMIS saga was intimately connected to the 1980s decoupling of covert operations from the CIA and their "privatization" through private corporations like Wackenhut.[41] The software, originally designed by the Inslaw corporation to fulfill a contract for the U.S. Department of Justice, was engineered to track cases, and hence, people, through the federal court system, from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. It soon became apparent, however, that it had the capability to track other kinds of criminal people—terrorists[42]—and "potential" criminals, such as "dissidents."[43] And the easiest way to do so was, of course, through their financial footprints, their financial transactions. The long and short of this is, these capabilities give lie to the oft-heard assertion that no one really knows who placed or benefitted from the massive short orders against American and United Airlines on Sept. 11, 2001.[44]

[37] Ibid., pp. 8, 341.

2. Robert Booth Nichols and the "Secret Bond Market"

But what, once again, has all this to do with Sam Israel, and what does he, in turn, have to do with the "industrial scale counterfeiting" of the Nazis in Unternehmung Bernhard, or with that of the massive "Bearer Bonds Scandals" of the first decade of the third millennium? By the time of Israel's hedge fund fraud, the one was, so to speak, ancient history, and seemingly irrelevant, and the other had not even occurred yet.

Motivated by his desire to acquire PROMIS for his own purposes, Sam Israel managed to contact the mysterious Robert Booth Nichols, whose name does indeed seem to float in and out of almost every conspiracy of the late twentieth century. They met in London's fashionable Dorchester Hotel. Once Sam had Nichols alone, he quickly pressed the issue of obtaining a copy of PROMIS. As they spoke, Nichols received a call on his cellular phone, and as he spoke, he opened his briefcase just long enough for Israel to steal a glance at a document which Nichols appeared to consult, before putting it back in his briefcase and closing it. Sam saw columns of numbers, and demanded to see the document. Appearing reluctant, Nichols handed over the document.[45]

It contained columns of numbers, the left column showing amounts of money invested and on the right, a column of numbers showing astronomical rates of returns. Incredulous, Sam inquired what Nichols was trading. The answer opened the door into Sam Israel's own personal version of the Bearer Bonds scandals:

> "What are you trading?"
> "Bonds," Nichols said.
> "What kind of bonds?" Sam asked.
>
> "This is something that could benefit your greatly," Nichols replied. "But it is very difficult to get into this market. Nearly Impossible."
> "What market?"
> "High yield buy/sell trading programs," Nichols said. "The market is only open to the biggest players."[46]

Over time, Sam eventually was able to wrest an explanation from Nichols about this mysterious bond market "only open to the biggest players." Nichols' explanation, as recounted by Guy Lawson, is worth citing at some length, for now connections begin to be made:

> Nichols explained how the secret bond market functioned. The world Nichols described dwarfed the conspiracy theories evoked … by The Last Circle. According to Nichols the basic institutions of the modern world—the U.S. government, the Federal Reserve, the International Monetary Fund—were all a front. The reality—if Sam could handle the truth—was far darker and more dangerous than anything he could imagine.
> "There is a secret government operation within the world's government," Nichols said to Sam. "They run the secret trading program—the high-yield market. Only a few chosen people participate in the program. The returns are staggering. The proceeds are used to fund black operations, wars, to pay off foreign governments. The proceeds are also used for good works in the Third World—to build hospitals, construct water treatment plants, cure diseases. It is the way order is maintained in the world. The programs are top secret—highly, highly classified. Getting approved to trade in the market is extremely difficult…"[47]

[46]. Guy Lawson, Octopus, p. 153.

[47] Ibid., pp. 155-156. Lawson also notes something very important: "According to the FBI, Nichols claimed he'd been to Switzerland for three years to be taught the secrets of high finance for intelligence agencies—the intricacies of how the CIA and NSA secretly funded black ops using billions of off-the-books dollars hidden in numbered Swiss accounts." (p. 186)

Sam explained all this to Lawson, and again, a now familiar pattern re-emerges, a pattern, not of U.S. Treasury bonds, but of Federal Reserve bonds, bonds sold at a great discount by the Federal Reserve to a few select banks or "primary dealers," banks such as "Goldman Sachs, Deutsche Bank, Nomura, Union Bank of Switzerland, BNP Paribas"[48] and so on. These banks in turn placed the bonds on "the secret market". Sam then revealed an important clue:

> "When Nixon took America off the gold standard in 1972 the shit hit the fan. There wasn't enough gold in the Federal Reserve to pay for all the dollars that had been issued by the government."[49]

Israel, without realizing it, was very close to an important clue, one that, as we saw in the previous chapter, both Lord Blackheath, and much earlier, even Hjalmar Schacht, were close to: the amounts of gold in existence were grossly and deliberately obfuscated. And, as the Bearer Bonds Scandals suggest, securities in enormous denominations had been issued by the Federal Reserve against that obfuscated gold. But more on that in a moment.

Any rational person's initial reaction to all of this would simply be to dismiss it, for such a secret market would only benefit those at the very top, but that, precisely, was Nichols' point. It was being used as a hidden system of finance to fund black operations, covert wars, and one may aver, secret research. As we shall see later in this chapter and in the next chapter, the allegations have a basis in utter, and undeniable, fact, a fact which places all of the Bearer Bonds scandals, and all attempts to deny that they may be based on some real exemplar by officials of the government or academics, into a cocked hat.

In any case, Nichols touched upon yet another meme that, unbeknownst to either man, Lord Blackheath would utter in the House of Lords: according to Nichols, as he explained the "secret bond market" to Sam, one could only enter that market by agreeing to use much of the profits in some charitable work.[50] It was Lord Blackheath's "Foundation X" messianic meme all over again. There were other familiar patterns connecting Sam Israel's experience with Nichols to the Bearer Bonds Scandals. For one thing, the denominations of the alleged bonds "ran up to billions."[51]

3. Federal Reserve Bonds, or was that Federal Reserved Bonds?

More importantly, the meme of the "Asian connection" surfaced, this time once again in connection with another by-now-familiar meme, that of seven hundred billion dollars' worth of bearer bonds. Nichols informed Sam that he had once journeyed to Singapore to negotiate with a representative of former Chinese Nationalist generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's family, which possessed some of these bonds and "heritage documents" proving their genuine provenance. The bonds, Nichols told Sam, were always denied to be legitimate by the Federal Reserve, which maintains publicly that all such bonds are counterfeit, simply because it does not have the money to pay on the bonds, "so it pretends that the bonds were never issued."[52]

At this juncture, we are again chin-to-chin with the two interpretive possibilities: either such bonds were never issued, and all such examples of them are indeed counterfeit as the U.S. government, the Federal Reserve, and even academia maintains, counterfeits issued in the "good old secret bond market prime bank swindle," or one may reason that one never counterfeits something that does not genuinely exist, such that, even if the individual bonds in this or that instance are counterfeit, they are based upon something that really was secretly issued, as a bond, by the Federal Reserve.[53]

4. Odd, But Crucial, Miscellanies

Sam Israel, of course, bought the scam, and attempted to enter the "secret bond market," and in the process, gambled away the last liquid capital his company had, thus dooming him and his partners to the eventual exposure of their years of fraud, and to eventual trial and incarceration.

However, there are a number of other oddities about the whole Sam Israel-Inslaw-PROMIS-secret bond market affair that must be mentioned, for these oddities are very odd oddities indeed.

[52] Guy Lawson, Octopus, p. 221.

[53] It should be noted that Lawson makes it very clear that he does not think there is any real "fire" behind all the counterfeit "smoke," and that there is no real secret bond market. See Lawson, op. cit., p. 249.

One of the strangest of these are cryptic comments made by Danny Casolaro in the notes that managed to survive his murder-by-suicide.[54] In these notes, Casolaro, who had connected the Inslaw affair and the theft of PROMIS to industrial scale secret financial tracking, money laundering, and banking scandals, also wrote "MJ 12—extraterrestrial."[55] MJ-12 is, of course, the top secret UFO study group allegedly founded after the Roswell crash and in response to other UFO flaps in the late 1940s and early 1950s. The inclusion of such an odd note in an investigation into areas having otherwise to do with sophisticated computer programs, secret systems of finance, money laundering, and secret intelligence monitoring of all these activities, suggests that there is a relationship between all these things and the UFO phenomenon, at least, in Danny Casolaro's mind. As we noted in the Preface however, there is a powerful philosophical case to be made for holding precisely such a view. Indeed, there is some sort of connection between the Inslaw affair and Space, and therefore, between the Inslaw affair and the whole question of a secret system of finance, for as Cheri Seymour noted in The Last Circle, one of the major principals in the whole Inslaw affair, one responsible for administering "the Inslaw contract with the government," was one Peter Viedenieks, who spent much of his time during the 1970s as a "contract specialist" for NASA.[56]

In yet another "odd oddity," one of the names hovering persistently on the ever-expanding circles of principals surrounding the Inslaw Affair was Adnan Khashoggi, an arms dealer whom Casolaro had uncovered as being involved in the murky drugs-for-arms dealing that was Iran-Contra, and the equally murky world of the BCCI banking scandal.[57] Khashoggi's sister, Samira Khashoggi Fayed, was the mother to Dodi Fayed, the alleged lover of Diana, Princess of Wales.[58]

As Sam Israel was gripped ever more tightly by Casolaro's "Octopus," more and more ties and indicators to Asia, and to a mystery hidden deep in the post-World War Two and early Cold War era emerged. Nichols, for example, revealed that the "counterfeit Federal Reserve bonds were somehow tied to a vast treasure of bullion looted by the Japanese during World War Two, and buried on Mindanao Island of the Philippines by the Japanese occupation army commanding officer, General Tomoyuki Yamashita.[59]

[54] Casolaro kept his most important files and notes in a cardboard expanding accordion file, which he was requested to bring with him to the fateful meeting in Martinsburg, West Virginia. This file has never been seen again. The notes that do survive were found in his house and donated by his family to the University of Missouri in Jefferson City, where archivist and researcher Kenn Thomas has been studying the case since.

[55] Kenn Thomas and Jim Keith, The Octopus, p. 43.

[56] Cheri Seymour, The Last Circle, p. 61.

[58] Ibid., p. 53.

This is our final clue, and it will preoccupy us in chapter four, for Danny Casolaro had also suggested a connection to the Inslaw affair and bullion smuggling rings he had traced to Southeast Asia. Even more suggestive is the fact that Casolaro had apparently unearthed this connection shortly before his death.[60]

But perhaps the most intriguing of these "very odd oddities" is the fact that Sam Israel bought some of these "Federal Reserve bonds", which, like the Spanish, Italian, and Filipino Bearer Bonds scandals examined in chapters 2A and 2B, came in a rusty strong box stamped "Federal Reserve." Like the bonds of the various Bearer Bonds scandals to erupt a decade later, Israel's bonds were dated 1934,[61] and on paper whose quality seemed authentic and indeed, which contained "the same material" as the stationer Crane & Co. "had supplied the Federal Reserve for generations."[62] The signature of the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury on these 1934 bonds "was authentic."[63] Even Lawson, who disputes the whole idea of a "secret bond market" admits: "According to leading historians, it was entirely possible that the U.S. government had secretly funded the Chinese government of Chiang Kai-shek in ways that remained classified secrets."[64]

However, notes Lawson, "there were oddities. There were grammatical errors, as if the words had been written in pidgin English."[65] One wonders if these oddities included the title "Federal Reserved Bond" rather than "Federal Reserve Bond." As we shall discover in the next chapter, this one oddity alone—mistakes, bad English, grammatical errors—points not to a counterfeiting operation of industrial scale being perpetrated by international con men, grifters, and swindlers, but by the Federal Reserve and other rogue agencies themselves, exactly as Lord Blackheath suggested. The denominations of the bonds were in the amount of $100,000,000, and the case which Sam Israel had purchased contained an incredible $25 billion total.

For his part in the "swindle," during the various trials surrounding the downfall of Sam Israel and the Bayou hedge fund, Nichols' testimony was sealed "for reasons that weren't explained. Nichol's name wouldn't be released to the press, nor would any evidence of his long and mysterious association with the intelligence apparatus of the U.S. government."[66] When the Japanese Bearer Bond Scandal broke in 2009, Sam Israel, by then already in prison, told Guy Lawson that he believed the bonds were real.[67] From prison, Israel has initiated a lawsuit to recover the "fake" bonds that were used in evidence against him at his trial, stating that if they are worthless, then it won't matter to give them back, and if they are indeed worth even a fraction of their denominated value, then his former investors in the Bayou fund should be recompensed with that money. "I'm doing everything I can. I won't stop. The truth is going to come out,"[68] says Israel.

Indeed, perhaps the truth already did. And that truth can be summed up in four words: "gold," and General Tomoyuki Yamashita.

THE LILY, THE LOOTING, AND LANSDALE: THE MURKY HISTORY OF A COVERT SLUSH-FUND FOR COVERT ACTIVITIES

"Did Lansdale have these accounts moved to bring them under greater CIA control, or under greater control by The Enterprise and its powerful conservative backers, including the John Birch Society and the World Anti-Communist League? The answer is surely the latter."
Sterling and Peggy Seagrave[1]

The stern visage staring at the reader from the opposite page is that of Japanese Imperial Army Air Force General Tomoyuki Yamashita,[2] one of Japan's, and indeed World War Two's, most capable and brilliant field commanders. Indeed, Yamashita earned his nickname, the Tiger of Malaya, on account of his "blitzkrieg" through the country and into British Singapore in six months, even though the Allied forces outnumbered his own Japanese troops.

General Yamashita's military skills are not, however, what concern us here; it is his record as a war criminal for which he was eventually convicted by an Allied war crimes tribunal and hung in 1946, or rather, what that record and execution may have been designed to conceal, for General Yamashita was appointed in 1944 to be the Japanese military commander in the Philippines, and was responsible for secreting a vast amount of military plunder, loot gathered by Imperial Japanese forces throughout occupied Asia in a coordinated looting campaign code-named Operation Golden Lily. With this, we have at last reached the Asian heart of the story of what I believe to be the hidden system of finance of the breakaway civilization. This story often goes under the name of "Yamashita's Gold," and it has become the stuff of legends. As we shall now discover, there is more truth in this legend than falsehood. But the devil, as they say, is in the details, and here the details conceal quite a few devils, and quite a few connections.

[2] I am, of course, following the Western practice of giving the general's surname last, and not the Oriental one of his given name being last.

A. Operation Golden Lily: "Yamashita's Gold"

Operation Golden Lily, as noted above, was the codename of Imperial Japan's looting and plundering operation in occupied Asia. Named after one of Emperor Hirohito's poems,[3] the operation was directly entrusted to the Emperor's brother, prince Chichibu.[4] Other members of the imperial household oversaw various branches of the operation throughout occupied Asia.[5] The Philippines became the crucial trans-shipment point for this plunder before being shipped on to the Japanese home islands.

By 1944, the war had turned irrevocably against Japan, and the decision was made to hide this plunder in the Philippines for use by the imperial household after the war, and General Yamashita was chosen to command the Japanese forces there, to fight an intense delaying action. Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, whose superb research is reviewed closely here, summarize Golden Lily, and Yamashita's role, in words that give indication of the scope of the Japanese plunder operation:

> In the closing months of World War II in the Philippines, while General Yamashita Tomoyuki fought a delaying action in the rugged mountains of Luzon, several of Japan's highest-ranking imperial princes were preparing for the future. They were busy hiding tons of looted gold bullion and other stolen treasure in nearby caves and tunnels, to be recovered later. This was the property of twelve Asian countries, accumulated over thousands of years. Expert teams accompanying Japan's armed forces had systematically emptied treasuries, banks, factories, private homes, pawn shops, art galleries, and stripped ordinary people, while Japan's top gangsters looted Asia's underworld and black economy. In this, the Japanese were far more thorough than the Nazis. It was as if a giant vacuum cleaner passed across East and Southeast Asia.[6]

The organization and intelligence for this massive operation fell to units of Imperial Japan's notorious intelligence bureaucracy-cum-gendarmerie, the Kempeitai, and, as the Seagraves note, the Japanese criminal underworld—the Yakuza—was employed to utilize its connections in Asia to ensure that the looting activity was not limited to the legitimate open markets.

This circumstances highlights a pattern that, as our review of Golden Lily and its postwar consequences proceeds, will become more and more in evidence, and that pattern contains three elements:

1) At the top, coordinating the activity, is a powerful "managing elite," for whom the plunder is ultimately intended, in this case, the Japanese imperial family;
2) Carrying out the activity, is a network of military and intelligence officers, in this case, the Kempeitai;[7]
3) Assisting this activity is a criminal underground, using its sources of contacts and intelligence within the underground black markets, in this case, the Japanese Yakuza.

This nexus of an elite, intelligence, and criminal underground elements we have encountered before with the postwar Nazi International and its close alliance and association with American military, intelligence, and financial circles after the war. Here, on the other side of the world, we discover the same pattern during the war inside of the Japanese oligarchy, and this suggests that a similar pattern of "cooperation" will emerge between this structure and its American counterparts after the war.

1. Lansdale, MacArthur, and Truman

Indeed, by October 1945, a mere month after the formal Japanese surrender, American intelligence had learned of Operation Golden Lily and the various caches of treasure scattered around the Philippines.[8] Yamashita, who had surrendered to American officers on September 2 when he received notice of Japan's surrender, was immediately interred and charged with war crimes for crimes apparently committed by his predecessor.[9] But it was his staff that apparently provided American intelligence this information, even though there was no mention during the general's trial of any of the Golden Lily plunder. There was, however, a "hidden agenda" taking place behind Yamashita's trial and execution, and again, it is worth citing the Seagraves to see what that agenda may have been:

---

[7] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 38. The Seagraves observe that the real impetus for Golden Lily came as a consequence of the Rape of Nanking, and it is at this juncture that the Kempeitai became even more heavily involved. As the Seagraves also point out, however, the pattern for Golden Lily was first perfected in the wake of the Russo-Japanese War of 1905 and the Japanese occupation of Korea.

[8] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 2.

> Because it was not possible to torture General Yamashita physically without this becoming evident to his defense attorneys, members of his staff were tortured instead. His driver, Major Kojima Kashii, was given special attention. Since Yamashita had arrived from Manchuria in October 1944 to take over the defense of the Philippines, Kojima had driven him everywhere. In charge of Kojima's torture was a Filipino-American intelligence officer names Severino Garcia Diaz Santa Romana, a man of many names and personalities, whose friends called him 'Santy'. He wanted Major Kojima to reveal each place to which he had taken Yamashita, where bullion and treasure were hidden.
> Supervising Santy, we learned, was Captain Edward G. Lansdale.[10]

In other words, Yamashita, who knew of the locations of the treasure burial sites, had to be eliminated to keep his silence.

It is the occurrence of the name Edward G. Lansdale that sets off alarm bells, for this is the Edward G. Lansdale that will subsequently become a general, and a major advocate of covert operations and psychological warfare, being a "CIA" general, a close associate of Office of Policy Coordination dirty trickster Frank Wisner, and, for those paying close attention, it is General Edward Lansdale whom Col. Fletcher Prouty, in his books on the Kennedy Assassination, maintains was involved as a possible planner of the event.[11] With Lansdale, in other words, we encounter a key figure with connections to covert operations and the postwar network of rogue American agents, left-over Fascists and Nazis and criminal syndicates. This network will concern us more completely in part two, but it is important to note the connection here, for at the beginning of his career in covert operations, we discover him intimately involved in the recovery of Japanese imperial plunder.

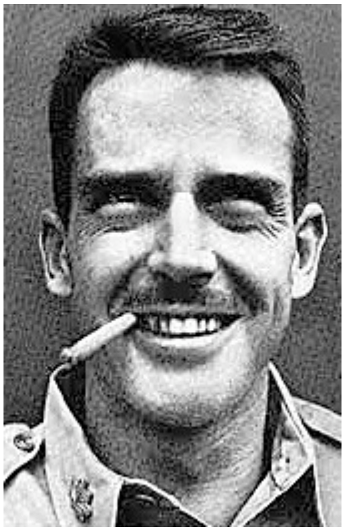
[9] There have been persisting questions since the end of the war on whether Yamashita was justly charged for atrocities committed, apparently, without his knowledge or orders.

[10] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 3. "Santy" is, of course, a name that also pops up over and over again in conjunction with the various bearer bonds scandals, however, his story does not concern us here.

[11] See my LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy: A Coalescence of Interests (Adventures Unlimited Press, 2011), pp. 90-92, 211-217, and especially p. 135. Many JFK assassination researchers believe that in the famous photograph of the "three tramps" in Dallas being escorted by police officers, while a man passes by them in the opposite direction with his back to the camera, that this man is in fact General Lansdale. See http: //www.prouty.org/photos.html.



Ed Lansdale Shortly After World War Two, here wearing insignia of the rank of major or lieutenant colonel

By early October, 1945, Yamashita's driver had broken under "Santy's" and Lansdale's torture, and led them to over a dozen Golden Lily treasure sites north of Manila.[12] With the information concerning the scale of Golden Lily—and the actual treasure—thus confirmed, Lansdale immediately flew to Tokyo where he briefed General Douglas MacArthur, and from there, flew to Washington D.C. to brief none other than President Harry S. Truman himself. Truman, after discussing this vast plunder with his cabinet, "decided to proceed with the recovery, but to keep it a state secret."[13]

[13] Ibid. The Seagraves note that on Santa Romana's death in 1974, his personal "black gold" accounts were transferred to the control of Lansdale, who had by that time been retired from the CIA for more than a decade. As the

> The treasure—gold, platinum, and barrels of loose gems—was combined with Axis loot recovered in Europe to create a worldwide covert political action fund to fight communism. This 'black gold' gave the Truman Administration access to virtually limitless unvouchered funds for covert operations. It also provided an asset base that was used by Washington to reinforce the treasuries of its allies, to bribe political leaders, and to manipulate elections in foreign countries. In the late 1940s, this agenda was seen as entirely justified, because the Soviet Union was aggressively supporting communist and socialist movements all over the world, putting the survival of the capitalist world in peril.[14]

In other words, the decision had been taken at the highest level to keep the vast amount of treasure as hidden system of finance to fund covert operations. The Cold War had become a hot war, but it was a hot war fought in secret, via false fronts and proxies.

An inevitable and highly problematical set of questions occurs at this juncture, and we must pause to consider them. Firstly, what if American efforts to recover Nazi and Japanese plunder were simply not entirely successful? What if, in other words, some of this loot remained known only to postwar Japanese insiders—members of the imperial family, the Japanese nobility, high ranking industrialists and politicians, and, last but not least, members of its criminal underground? What if some of this loot remained known only to their Nazi counterparts? Secondly, do covert operations seem to account for all of the vast amount of loot implied? Or does the amount implied also suggest that this hidden system of finance was used to fund other sorts of activities of a covert nature, including secret research?

These questions imply their own set of signatures of what one would look for if any of them were true. In the case of the first set of questions, one would look for signs of postwar collusion between members of this American covert-ops, intelligence, and financial network, and that of the survivors of the Axis elites, both Nazi, and Japanese.[15] This collusion

Seagraves observe, Lansdale was most likely involved in a private intelligence and covert operations group.(see Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, op. cit., p. 8)

[14] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 3, emphasis added.

[15] I have, of course, outlined this collusion between the postwar Anglo-American financial and intelligence elites and the "Nazi International" in my books The Nazi International: The Nazis' Postwar Plan to Control Finance, Conflict, Physics, and Space (Adventures Unlimited Press, 2008), Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops: A History of a Breakaway Civilization: Hidden also implies that one may look for signs of "creeping fascism" in western culture, but as this is a phenomenon widely commented upon, it will not concern us in this book. We shall, however, have occasion to observe the signs of collusion and covert activity in part two, and indeed, have already indicated some of the extent of that activity in previous chapters by pointing out the odd role of the Vatican in connection with the various counterfeit securities schemes surveyed in those chapters.

In the case of the second set of questions, it implies that one look for signs of unusual financial or political activity surrounding the use or display of advanced technologies, and indeed, this will concern us in parts two and three.

An entry into the Japanese aspect of this postwar collusion between American military, intelligence, and financial interests and those of the Empire of Japan is afforded by a closer look at the role of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur in its creation.

General of the Army Douglas MacArthur

Aerospace Technologies and Psychological Operations (Adventures Unlimited Press, 2011), LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy(Adventures Unlimited Press, 2011), especially pp. 48-53, 55-58, 151-172, 180-187, and my Babylon's Banksters: The Alchemy of Deep Physics, High Finance, and Ancient Religion (Feral House 2012), pp. 64-73, where I suggest a hidden motivation behind the early Bilderberger meetings was to coordinate the laundering and use of Nazi loot in western financial institutions.

In order to understand this postwar collusion, it is worth noting what the Seagraves state concerning the general pattern of this secret bullion reserve, and how this fits the overall scheme that we have seen implied by the Bearer Bonds Scandals surveyed in previous chapters. This vast bullion reserve would constitute "black gold," a secret reserve for a hidden system of finance. Thus, it would function

> …as a reserve asset, bolstering the prime banks of Allied countries, strengthening the governments of those nations. As a safeguard, the bullion placed in those banks was carefully controlled; since limits were placed on the use that could be made of the gold (a process called earmarking). This enabled Washington to bring pressure, from time to time, on those governments, central banks and prime banks. Put simply, so long as a country and its leaders cooperated, and remained allied to the United Sates in the Cold War, derivatives of the sleeping bullion could be used for patronage through political slush funds.[16]

How was this bullion certified? "Gold bearer certificates were given as inducments."[17] Perhaps sensing a connection to the Bearer Bonds Scandals, the Seagraves immediately add: "In the hands of clever men, the possibilities were endless."[18] This secret bullion-backed fund was called the Black Eagle Trust.[19]

The possibility of using recovered Axis war booty as the basis for a postwar "global political action fund"[20] began during the Roosevelt Administration during the war and was the brainchild of Secretary of War Henry Stimson. Stimson established a think tank to deal with precisely this question, and one of the men involved was John J. McCloy.[21] With McCloy's name, we are once again chin to chin with connections, running from his pre-war involvement with Nazis, as he was the American attorney for the notorious German chemicals cartel I.G. Farben. McCloy was also the postwar American High Commissioner for occupied Germany, and as such had personally intervened to facilitate the transfer of Nazis to the USA as part of Operation Paperclip. As the Seagraves also note, McCloy was also a postwar president of the World Bank.[22] And, of course, he was also connected to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, being one of the seven commissioners appointed to the Warren Commission by President Lyndon B. Johnson. McCloy was instrumental in the establishment of the plan to "re-plunder" Axis plunder and turn it into a secret financial system to fund covert operations. As a consequence of this, the condition is created for the possibility of collusion with the elites of the former Axis enemies.

This pattern of a secret reserve asset, against which the possessing banks could vastly expand their ledger credit entry-making ability, is exactly that which I have hypothesized lay behind the postwar Anglo-American and Nazi financial nexus. Now, however, we shall discover the same pattern operative in the postwar nexus between the occupying American military and intelligence forces, and the Japanese elite, a connection leading eventually to the pinnacle of Japanese political power, the premiership of the imperial Diet and the imperial house itself. Indeed, as the Seagraves note, this fund gave birth to several secret funds, just one of which, the so-called "M fund", worth a "mere" $35 billion in the early 1960s, was given to the leaders of Japan's Liberal Democrat Party by President Richard M. Nixon, in return for promises of kickbacks to his election campaign.[23] The Liberal Democrat Party leaders of Japan in turn used this fund as a secret slush fund to maintain their one-party control in Japan for decades.

2. The "MacArthur" Document

In this, General MacArthur played the key historical role, and to see how, we must look at a document that the Seagraves refer to. This is a special report, prepared by his own staff, shortly after the end of the war, called "Reports of General MacArthur: MacArthur in Japan: the Occupation: Military Phase."[24] One gains a measure of the significance of General MacArthur's role in helping to establish this secret system of finance by considering the following statement:

---

[24] This strange document, of which the author possesses a copy, has next to no bibliographical citation information, other than a very peculiar Library of Congress Catalog Card number, 66-60006, and a statement on the inside title page, stating "Facsimile Reprint, 1994, CMH Pub 13-4." For purposes here, I shall cite simple "General Staff of Douglas MacArthur," and the name and page number of the document.

> As a still further potential stimulus to foreign trade, SCAP[25] projected a plan to use Japanese-owned gold and silver as a base for acquiring foreign credits. This was achieved by creating the "Occupied Japan Export-Import Revolving Fund" which was to be used as a credit base for financing importation of raw materials for processing and exporting. This credit base was first utilized on 13 May 1948 when one government and three private banks pledged to finance a 60,000,000 dollar credit. The Economic and Scientific Section was responsible for advising the Supreme Commander on policies and programs relating to the custody, operation, management, and control of this fund.[26]

Note that explicit mention is made of using Japanese bullion as a means of "obtaining foreign credits," that there is a connection to scientific activities, and that these activities are unspecified.

The document becomes even more peculiar, for toward the end of the nearly three-hundred page report, a strange statement occurs indicating that there is indeed some measure of cooperation between General MacArthur, his staff, and the Japanese elite itself, when investigating claims being made against the Japanese by those nations, corporations, and individuals who had suffered the loss of their property during the Japanese occupation of their countries:

> Investigations were made when required by higher headquarters or upon receipt of information from other sources. Japanese police, procurators, and agencies were utilized. The police were encouraged and supported in their efforts to control large scale blackmarketing.[27]

This is a tell-tale, perhaps even an inadvertent, admission, for the exact names of the "agencies" utilized by SPAC were not specified, but given the nature of the claims against Golden Lily, these "agencies" must, by the nature of the case, involve at some point the Kempeitai. Additionally, the statement is curious in the fact that it does not mention that the Japanese police were encouraged to eliminate blackmarketing, but only to control it.

That this whole activity concerned largely the Operation Golden Lily loot is confirmed later in the document by the mention of special dealings between SPAC and the Bank of Tokyo, the bank which handled—along with other Japanese corporations—the loot from the operation. Consider these bombshells:

[27] Ibid., p. 222, emphasis added.

> From these strictly fiscal activities, the Division's field of responsibility was broadened to include the custody and control of Axis property, precious metals and stones belonging to the Japanese Government, and valuables belonging to designated individuals, institutions, and organizations scheduled by SCAP for restriction or dissolution.
> The Bank of Tokyo was designated as the liquidating agency for certain banks. The Division maintained close supervision of the personnel engaged in this work to prevent removal, defacement, or destruction of books, records, or other property. It submitted weekly reports on the progress of liquidation and matters of special financial interest. One of the spectacular tasks of the Occupation dealt with collecting and putting under guard the great hordes of gold, silver, precious stones, foreign postage stamps, engraving plates, and all currency not legal in Japan. Even though the bulk of this wealth was collected and placed under United States military custody by Japanese officials, undeclared caches of these treasures were known to exist. Consequently, the task of investigating, uncovering, inventorying, and safeguarding all property in this category was a continuing and increasing responsibility. The precious metals were stored in the United States vaults of the Bank of Japan at Tokyo and in the Imperial Mint at Osaka.[28]

Note the reference to engraving plates of currency "not legal in Japan," meaning, of course, that there were engraving plates of other nations' currencies, indicating either a Japanese version of Operation Bernhard, or that the Germans had transferred some of their own Operation Bernhard plates to Japan, or both. However, what really concerns us is the statement that "undeclared caches of these treasures was known to exist," and that "the task of investigating, uncovering, inventorying, and safeguarding all property in this category was a continuing and increasing responsibility," meaning that the collusion implied by our first set of questions outlined previously is in existence, a collusion implied by the first quotation we made from "the MacArthur document," for learning of these hidden caches would require the cooperation of the Japanese who hid it and knew the locations. In this respect, it is perhaps significant that MacArthur himself insisted that the imperial family be left in place, for the imperial family, as has been seen, exercised the actual control over Operation Golden Lily. In this respect, while discussing attempts to ensure that looted property was returned, one encounters this curiously ambiguous statement:

[28] General Staff of General Douglas MacArthur, "Reports of General MacArthur: MacArthur in Japan: the Occupation: Military Phase," p..223, emphasis added.

> All property suspected of having been seized in area occupied by the Japanese armed forces was classified as looted property unless definite legal ownership could be established. In general, it was handled directly by SPAC through the Japanese Government.[29]

Here a significant question arises, and indeed, answers itself: how would one establish original ownership of gold, silver, and other kinds of bullion? Answer: one would not be able to.[30] All that would exist would be claims against that bullion, claims which, in view of the Japanese thoroughness in eradicating records of original ownership, would be dubious. Thus, by stating that this was all handled "directly by SPAC", that is, by General MacArthur "through the Japanese Government," that is, through the Imperial family and its political surrogates and agencies, the possibility of deliberate collusion begins to grow.[31]

B. Golden Lily, Gold Bugs, Bearer Bonds, and the Nature of the Fraud at the Basis of the Hidden System of Finance

While the numerous details of their investigation into the ramifications of the Golden Lily operation and the postwar collaboration between the American financial, political, and intelligence elite and that of postwar Japan are endlessly fascinating,[32] our attention must remain focused on the structure of this hidden system of finance, i.e., upon the nexus between intelligence, financial, and military elites between former victorious Allied and former defeated Axis enemies, and upon how this structure was able, via calculated "official fraud," to maintain itself, and to what purpose these funds were allocated.

[29] General Staff of General Douglas MacArthur, "Reports of General MacArthur: MacArthur in Japan: the Occupation: Military Phase," p.227.

[30] For those following the story of the banksters of the Middle Ages that I outline in my sequel to Babylon's Banksters, the forthcoming The Financial Vipers of Venice, the Seagraves make a very intriguing statement: "We do not know how much was looted by Spain from the New World, because once it reached Europe most of it was passed on to the great European banking families, the Fuggers and Welsers, who had financed the conquest of Mexico and Peru. Whatever the Fuggers and the Welsers did with that gold they kept very secret." (Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 9).

[31] This collusion, as the Seagraves point out, remains a classified secret to this day. See Gold Warriors, p. 45. In this, it is the Pacific "mirror" of the similar arrangement that I maintain was the hidden purpose behind the early Bilderberger meetings on the European side of this story.

1. Obfuscated Amounts of Gold and Silver Bullion

At the head of this structure of hidden finance, mention must be made of a significant fact that the Japanese themselves encountered once the operation was fully under way, for the thorough officers of the Kempeitai and the imperial family princes entrusted with the task of inventorying the plunder soon noticed that "there was more gold and platinum in private hands across Southeast Asia than anyone knew existed."[33] Indeed, when long after the war Philippine dictator Ferdinand Marcos became involved in his own attempts to recover some of General Yamashita's buried treasure, he mentioned to his American partners amounts of gold "many times of the amount of refined gold commonly thought to be in existence."[34]

With this, we have perhaps resolved two significant features of the mystery we have been investigating thus far, for on the one hand, it will be recalled that President Truman decided to make this matter of a hidden slush fund based upon a vast and secret gold reserve a state secret. One reason for this secrecy is implied by the alleged amounts of bullion involved, for should such amounts suddenly become public knowledge, then the value of gold would plummet, and with it, the amount of money in the secret covert operations and political action

[32] One need only consider the allegation that "Long-time Citibank CEO John Reed" was mentioned as potentially "a key figure in the movement of Santa Romana black gold," (Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 8), or the allegation that one former U.S. Deputy Attorney General was financially and professionally ruined for an inquiry into secret M-fund securities, while one former Secretary of State and General, Alexander Haig, allegedly went to Japan for the successful negotiation of one of these notes with a personal letter from President G.H.W. Bush (in itself yet another intelligence connection). (Ibid., p. 9). Additionally, the Seagraves note that there is a Golden Lily connection to the Nazi and Japanese atom bomb projects, for Imperial Japan made gold bullion payments to Nazi Germany in return for enriched uranium. (Ibid., p. 79.)

[33] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 50.

[34] Ibid., p. 172.

slush fund, and any monies in that fund designated for secret research projects. On the other hand, we have the indicator for why the figures of existing gold seem to be so widely at variance from each other (consider again in this regard the figure quoted to Lord Blackheath by his friend, Lord Sassoon, and then the figure that the German government believes its own reserves to be—a figure twice the amount of all gold in existence according to the figure of Lord Blackheath!).

The scale may be gleaned by the fact that, by war's end, Japanese Emperor Hirohito had, through his Golden Lily operation, amassed a personal fortune of $100,000,000, or, in contemporary terms, one billion dollars, and this would not include the personal financial gain to other members of the imperial family. These holdings, moreover, were in accounts in Switzerland, South America (especially Argentina), "Portugal, Spain, and the Vatican."[35]

The Seagraves' trenchant observations on the point of obfuscated amounts of existing gold is worth citing at length:

> The invisible Black Eagle Trust set up by Stimson's team, beefed up by bullion from the Santa Romana recoveries, created a separate pool of black gold that put an extra floor under the postwar economy, and gave Washington and its allies covert financial leverage. There are certain similarities between this trust and the Diamond Cartel identified with DeBeers, or the Gold Cartel identified with the Oppenheimer family of South Africa. According to informed sources, these similarities exist for good reason and on many different planes. The Diamond Cartel was able to amass huge quantities of stones, and yet keep prices artificially high by limiting to a trickle the number of diamonds reaching the market, maintaining the impression of extraordinary rarity. In a similar way the black gold cartel could hold many thousands of metric tons of gold bullion—far more than the official gold supply—keeping gold prices artificially high while discreetly using derivatives of this gold as a clandestine slush fund.
> If the recovery of this huge mass of gold was known only to a trusted few, those countries and individuals that had been robbed by the Nazis, the Fascists, or the Japanese, would not sue to recover it.[36]

---

[35] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 51.

[36] Ibid., pp. 99-100. The Seagraves also point out that there is obfuscation with respect to the amount of Nazi gold plunder: "Washington's 'official' (public) figure for recovered Nazi gold still is only 550 metric tons. But Anderson knew better. One of his business associates saw photos in Anderson's office of an American soldier 'sitting on top of stacks of bullion that Hitler had stolen from Poland, Austria, Belgium and France. It ended up with the Allied

Before continuing, let us pause to note one thing: if any of those Fascist, Nazi, or Japanese elites survived the war, and they clearly did, then this knowledge of the amount of gold actually in existence made them erstwhile partners with their postwar Anglo-American counterparts, for these groups would possess—if they preserved adequate records—tremendous "blackmail" power against their Western oligarchical counterparts. In other words, everyone—postwar Fascists, Japanese yakuza, zaitbatsu, imperial household members, Nazis, Wall Street lawyers and financiers—stood to gain by the policy of secret detente and coexistence. But to continue with the Segraves' summary of the matter:

> Also, the argument was made that the existence of so much black gold, if it became public knowledge, would cause the fixed price of $35 an ounce to collapse. As so many countries now linked their currencies to the U.S. dollar, and the dollar was linked to gold, currency values throughout the world might then plummet, causing financial disaster. But so long as it was kept secret, hold prices could be kept at $35 an ounce, and currencies pegged to gold would be stable. Meanwhile, the black gold would serve as a reserve asset, bolstering the prime banks in each country, and strengthening the governments of those nations.[37]

In short, wildly obfuscated figures may function for two purposes: (1) to keep the actual amount of existing gold a secret, and (2) by means of such obfuscated figures, it becomes easier for a hidden reserve to be re-hypothecated several times over in a huge scheme of financial fraud, thus to leverage even more credit and, for the breakaway civilization, the ability to fund gigantic projects of covert operations nature, of secret research, and even the "purchase" or "collateralization of planets." Thus, with obfuscated bullion amounts, we have the first component of the actual system of hidden finance.

2. Gold Certificates, Earmarking, and the Secret System of Finance: One Does Not Counterfeit What Does Not Exist

But once one entertains the idea that existing bullion figures are a wildly inaccurate representation of the underlying reality, how would one high command and no one was allowed to talk about it.' the same source said he was taken to the courtyard of a convent in Europe where 11,200 metric tons of Nazi looted bullion had been collected."(p. 96) actually use this in the construction of a hidden system of finance? Here again, the Segraves provide the clues, and with them, we are beginning to come full circle back to the Bearer Bonds Scandals:

> As a safeguard, the black gold placed in … banks was 'earmarked' or strictly limited in the uses that could be made of it. This enabled Washington to bring pressure, from time to time, on those governments, central banks and prime banks. So long as a country and its leaders cooperated with Washington, and remained allied to it in the Cold War, the sleeping bullion would provide the asset base for patronage. Gold bearer certificates and other derivatives could be given as gifts or bribes, without actually giving away the bullion itself. Beneficial trusts could be set up in behalf of certain statesmen, military leaders, or political figures, or their families. In the hands of clever men like… McCloy, the possibilities were endless. From time to time, as more bullion was recovered from Golden Lily vaults in the Philippines, quantities of the bullion would be offered in strictest secrecy to central banks, or to consortiums of private buyers.
> …Some internationally famous banks appear to have become addicted to having billions of dollars of black gold in their vaults. So addicted that they refuse to surrender the bullion, and in some cases have stooped to swindling the original owners or their heirs, by denouncing their documents as counterfeit. Indeed, some owners claimed that not only were they told their documents were fake, but were given veiled threats of murder if they pressed their claims. In some cases banks may have made such heavy use of these black gold reserves that they no longer are in a position to relinquish the bullion without going under.[38]

Note carefully the implications of these statements:

1) Gold certificates were issued against the black gold, and, since this bullion reserve was a secret reserve, then the most reasonable form of such certificates would be in the form of bearer bonds, to protect the anonymity of its holders and hence the secrecy of the hidden system of finance itself;
2) These certificates, however, had to have been issued by the bank or banks involved in the scheme in such a form as to enable them later to claim they were fake, or counterfeit.

[38] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 100, emphasis added.

The second point returns us to the Bearer Bonds Scandals, for it will be recalled that virtually all the Bearer Bonds Scandals possess a few peculiar features in common:

1) The bonds were in denominations that the U.S. government Treasury department never officially issued;
2) The bonds were dated 1934 (long before the Golden Lily or Nazi bullion was available), implying that the bonds were post-dated;
3) The bonds were not issued by the U.S. Treasury at all, but allegedly directly by the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank, which supposedly does not sell bonds of any sort at all, and, in some cases, these bonds contained spelling or grammatical errors, such as being called "Federal Reserved Bonds; and finally,
4) The bonds were all design knock-offs of actually circulating U.S. paper money currency, and did not resemble "real" U.S. Treasury note designs at all, yet, it will be recalled, the paper and design was in some cases said to be so authentic that the "counterfeit" was undetectable!

These three features strongly suggest that, indeed, the Federal Reserve system did issue such bonds—remembering that one does not counterfeit what does not exist—but that it did so by deliberately issuing "bonds" whose designs were deliberately unusual, containing deliberate spelling and grammatical errors so that, if the holder of the "bond" proved "uncooperative," his paper could then be claimed to be "counterfeit" and the holder would simply be out his money.

In short, the counterfeiting occurred at the very pinnacle of the central banking system, and with its collusion, to establish the hidden financial system.

But is there any evidence that such a scheme was ever actually perpetrated?

Indeed there is:

3. A Significant Clue and Connection to the Bearer Bonds Scandals: The Scheme of Prime Minister Tanaka

Here, as in so many other instances, the research of Sterling and Peggy Seagrave into the whole matter is impeccable, and their conclusions all but irresistible. We noted earlier that one spin-off of the Golden Lily loot was the "M fund," a fund whose control was returned by President Richard M. Nixon to the political elite of Japan's ruling Liberal Democrat Party (LDP).

This M-fund was coordinated and supervised by a close-knit American group in the postwar period, a group based in Tokyo and definitely in the MacArthur political structure in occupied Japan.[39] When the Korean War broke out, circumstances required that the American occupying army had to be rushed to the Korean peninsula, and in the security vacuum that resulted, the M-fund was used to create the Japanese "self-defense force," with the fund itself passing into joint American-Japanese administration until President Nixon turned it completely over to the Japanese.[40]

> Nixon's M-fund giveaway was not the end of the story—far from it. Under (Liberal Democrat Party) control, the M-Fund spawned a number of exotic financial instruments that propagated through global financial markets like Ebola virus. Investors or their attorneys have been snared in amazing international sting operations, charged with negotiating fraudulent instruments, ending in wrongful convictions and prison sentences. It is now painfully obvious that some of these victims were holding authentic paper, and only were stung to shield Japan's government from its own folly—although more crafty political and financial motives may also be discerned.[41]

But what exactly was the political folly of the Japanese government here?

As the Seagraves point out, the role of the M-Fund in Japanese politics is crucial, for up until very recently in Japanese postwar political history, "Virtually every prime minister of Japan" has been chosen "by the clique controlling the M-Fund,"[42] one of whom was a prime minister himself: Tanaka.

As finance minister, Tanaka contrived a variety of schemes to loot the country and increase the M-Fund itself.[43] But his biggest role was in the creation of so-called "57" bonds, which were "specially contrived government bonds,"[44] and one can imagine that Tanaka merely took a page from the playbook of the hidden system of finance and its participating banks and oligarchs. After all, he was such an oligarch in with his own personal connection to that system as an administrator of the M-Fund. These bonds, however, were, like those associated with their American counterparts in the Bearer Bonds scandals, peculiar, and peculiar in the now familiar pattern:

> Because he had them issued by the Ministry of Finance, they were technically legitimate with or without Diet approval. Each had a very big face amount, ranging from ¥ 10-billion to ¥50-billion ($50-million to $250-mllion at the time, but now worth almost double).[45]

The scheme soon ran into trouble however, because by issuing these bonds, the Japanese national treasury's sinking fund for their redemption could only be replenished by "selling the government's share of NTT(Nippon Telephone and Telegraph)."[46] But such measures were only a temporary stop-gap, for if several of these bond holders attempted to redeem their bonds more or less simultaneously, then Tanaka's Ministry of Finance "would have no choice but to default, which could cause the whole (Liberal Democrat Party) house of cards to collapse."[47]

At this juncture, Tanaka and his M-Fund colleagues hit upon the idea of the "57" bonds, which were a new kind of security, a kind of "Certificate of Redemption" issued by the Ministry of Finance in Hirohito's fifty-seventh year as the Japanese Emperor, hence the name "57 bond."[48] These bonds were "specially designed, printed, and issued by the Ministry of Finance,"[49] but like the American bonds implicated in the various Bearer Bonds Scandals, there were "peculiarities." Not only were these IOU's for astronomical sums of money, as noted above, but,

> Physically, the "57s" were unlike anything previously issued by the government of Japan. They were not offered to the public at large, nor were they to be traded on the international bond-market like normal government bonds, so only the holders actually saw them. The magic of this scheme is that by their very difference, it was possible for the Ministry of Finance later to declare all "57s" to be forgeries. Only certain ones were selectively and very secretly renegotiated at a > discount. Those who paid for their original government bonds, and then were forced to exchange them for "57s", were thus swindled twice.[50]

In any case, it is worth noting that the "57 bonds" were "deliberately printed to look unusual, which would allow them to be denounced as fraudulent."[51]

Prime Minister Tanaka, however, was not the only one with "official counterfeiting schemes" in mind as a funding mechanism. Ferdinand Marcos, shortly after becoming president of the Philippines in 1965, managed to persuade the Johnson administration that he could "sell" the Vietnamese war to Southeast Asian leaders by bribing them with Golden Lily "gold certificates" that, if the leader did not behave properly, could be declared counterfeit.[52]

With this pattern now evident, a pattern inclusive of special designs of certificates, of deliberate grammatical errors, of large and indeed incomprehensible denominations—all for the purpose of being able if circumstances required to denounce them as counterfeit—it now seems clear that the Bearer Bonds Scandals are simply another manifestation of a really existent, secret bond market, one that functions as a hidden financial system.

This hidden financial system branched out, beginning with Santos Romana, torturer of Yamashita's driver, Major Kojima, into connections that boggle the mind, to the famous Wall Street legal firm of Sullivan and Cromwell[53]—home of the Dulles brothers—to the Mafia and Vatican bank's involvement in "fixing" the 1948 Italian elections[54] (a fact that would have been well-known to Eugene Cardinal Tisserant, and hence, would explain his confidence that the American government would not complain about the Vatican's involvement in counterfeit securities!). It even reaches into the Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) and Nugan Hand Bank scandals.[55]

[50] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors., pp. 127-128. On page 129 the Seagraves point out an interesting financial possibility, namely, that by 1982, Japanese government debt had grown so large that it was impossible to pay outstanding bonds presented for redemption, and thus, a new form of paper was presented to the bond-holder which, given their unusual nature, could later be claimed to be completely fake, or, if the certificate holder were more "reliable", could be redeemed at a discount.

4. Odds and Ends:
a. The Technology Connection

Thus far, we have noted the connection of the hidden system of finance put into place with Nazi and Japanese loot, to the military-intelligence communities, and to suggestions of postwar covert operations. As noted previously, however, the sums of money involved in this hidden system of finance are so staggering that even the vast amount of covert operations undertaken—that we know of—during the Cold War would not seem to account for all of this money. There had to have been other purposes to which it was put, and we have suggested that at least one of these purposes was for secret research, for the development of very sophisticated, advanced, and exotic technology.

There are two connections to exotic technologies—and even to outer space and extraterrestrials—in the whole Golden Lily saga. One is rather obscure, and has to be "unpacked," and the second one is so obvious, that we have already encountered him. But more of him later.

First, let us deal with the "obscure" connection.

In detailing the torture of General Yamashita's driver, Major Kojima, the Segraves recount a number of details, one of which is quite significant. Here is the context of that significant detail:

> Early in October (1945), after many days of torture, Kojima broke and revealed everything he knew. Lansdale organized a convoy of cars and set out with Santy and Major Kojima to retrace the trips made by General Yamashita to 'more than a dozen' Golden Lily treasure vaults. These were all in the high valleys north of Manila, in a triangle from Baguio in the west to Bambang in the center, and Aparri at the northern tip of Luzon.
> When they returned to Manila in mid-October, Lansdale reported to Colonel McMicking, then flew to Tokyo where he briefed Willoughby, Whitney, and MacArthur. At their instruction, he then flew to Washington to brief General Magruder, who still headed the Strategic Services Unit, a last vestige of the OSS just before the new Central Intelligence Group (CIG) was created under General Hoyt Vandenberg.[56]

---

[55] Ibid.

[56] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, pp. 95-96.

One may reasonably entertain the idea that what General Magruder knew about the Golden Lily plunder, and the decision to use it as a covert system of finance, that his successor, General Hoyt Vandenberg also knew.

Why is this so significant?

Because Vandenberg served twice as the U.S. Air Force Chief of Staff, as CIA director, and, for our purposes, was the immediate superior officer to U.S. Air Force General Nathan Twining, head of the Air Force Air Material Command at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Dayton, Ohio. It was Vandenberg who ordered Twining to New Mexico in the wake of the Roswell incident, and it was to General Vandenberg that General Ramey reported on the Roswell incident. And of course, General Vandenberg was allegedly a member of the secret UFO study group, Majestic-12, or Majic-12.

The other more obvious connection to such matters we will deal with at the conclusion of this chapter. But there is another odd connection with Golden Lily, and this time it is to the Nazi's counterfeiting scheme, Operation Bernhard.

b. The Golden Lily Connection to Operation Bernhard

In the worldwide network that Friedrich Schwend established to circulate Operation Bernhard banknotes in return for hard goods and currencies, one of his agents, codenamed "Laval," was recruited for his extraordinary Asian connections. "Laval" had been a friend and advisor to Japanese General Terauchi.[57] Terauchi was the grandson of the Japanese general who had established the pattern later utilized in Operation Golden Lily in the plunder of Korea, and Terauchi himself was later the promoted to Field Marshal and given control of all Japanese forces in Southeast Asia, and thus, he was intimately involved in the Golden Lily plunder.

Why might this detail be significant?

Because by the time of Schwend's heavy involvement with Operation Bernhard, the war had already begun to turn against the Axis, and thus what had started out as Heydrich's industrial scale counterfeiting operation became part of the strategic evacuation plans of the Nazis for their postwar extra-territorial "state," an enterprise that included the possibilities of collusion with their American counterparts.

[57] Anthony Pirie*,* Operation Bernhard, p. 55.

It is perhaps here that the possibility of such collusion—as actually did emerge after the war in both cases—was planted in the minds of the Japanese military and intelligence elite.

c. Hidden Finance, Breakaway Civilizations, and ET

There is a final connection between the hidden financial system of the breakaway civilization, to the fraud that props it up, and to the wider implication that we shall explore in the remaining two parts of this book: outer space, and the problem of extra-terrestrials.

This connection is General Douglas MacArthur himself.

In October 1955, after his famous firing by President Truman during the Korean War, MacArthur, according to a number of UFO researchers, allegedly made the following statement in a speech to cadets at West Point: "The next war will be an interplanetary war. The nations of the earth must someday make a common front against attack by people from other planets."[58] But according to an internet article,[59] the reality may be slightly different, for MacArthur did not apparently make any speech at West Point. MacArthur apparently made similar remarks, however, to the visiting Italian mayor of Naples, Achille Lauro, who visited MacArthur at his private residence in October 1955 in the Waldorff-Astoria in New York City. At a press conference the following day, Mayor Lauro briefed the press on what their conversation had been about. MacArthur "believes that because of the developments of science all the countries on earth will have to unite to survive and make a common front against attack by people from other planets," the Mayor allegedly stated.[60] The Chicago Tribune picked up Mayor Lauro's remarks to the press and reported on them under the headline "MacArthur Fears Space War."[61]

But in his farewell speech to West Point in May 1962, General MacArthur did speak of planetary war, and even of a kind of technological, transhumanist future, outlining technologies that had, indeed, already begun to be investigated by terrestrial humans in their black projects:

> We deal now, not with things of this world alone, but with the illimitable distances and as yet unfathomed mysteries of the universe. We are reaching out for a new and boundless frontier. We speak in > strange terms of harnessing the cosmic energy, of making winds and tides work for us, of creating unheard of synthetic materials to supplement or even replace our old standard basics; to purify sea water for our drink; of mining ocean floors for new fields of wealth and food; of disease preventatives to expand life into the hundreds of years; of controlling the weather for a more equitable distribution of heat and cold, of rain and shine; of spaceships to the moon; of the primary target in war, no longer limited to the armed forces of an enemy, but instead to include his civil populations; of ultimate conflict between a united human race and the sinister forces of some other planetary galaxy; of such dreams and fantasies as to make life the most exciting of all times.[62]

MacArthur, who helped oversee the creation of a hidden system of finance and its use for covert operations, would have also been in a position to know of its other uses, and as Allied and Axis warplanes increasingly encountered the strange and inexplicable over their skies, and as the American military in particular increasingly encountered similar strange and inexplicable things over its sensitive military installations, inevitably, in military thinking, a worst case scenario would have been conjured, a scenario of reconnoitering, advanced technology, and other intelligent beings. This would have been perceived as being as great a threat, if not greater, than the Soviet Union, and every effort would have been bent to find a source for the vast funding required to understand—and if possible, recreate—the phenomenon being witnessed, and—again, if possible—to engage it in covert operations.

But before we can consider all that, we must briefly pause to summarize where we have been.

COUNTERFEITING FOR FUN, PROFIT AND WORLD DOMINATION:

CONCLUSIONS TO PART ONE

"I have always believed, and argued, that a true understanding of the Kennedy assassination will lead, not to 'a few bad people,' but to the institutional and parapolitical arrangements which constitute the way we are systematically governed. The conspiracies I see as operative, in other words, are part of our political structure."
Peter Dale Scott[1]

"If we also consider the possibility of covert breakthroughs in propulsion technology, and the 'off the grid' nature of the deep-black world itself, we come to the possibility that we are dealing with, in effect, a 'breakaway civilization,' One with loose connections at various points to the open civilization of humanity, but with great independence, secrecy, and a monopoly of certain key scientific secrets."
Richard M. Dolan[2]

If researcher Peter Levenda, when reviewing the "breakaway civilization" implications of the Nazi SS Ahnenerbedienst, the "ancestral research bureau" and "occult studies" department of the SS, could quip and call it a "humanities program. With guns,"[3] then the implications of all that we have uncovered in the previous chapters is that the breakaway civilization is in part "a banking fraud and counterfeiting scheme, with particle beams, lasers, grazers, anti-gravity, and covert operations."

Indeed, the previous chapters have exposed a vast system of industrial scale counterfeiting, a huge system of hidden finance, and accompanying financial fraud, based upon the "official" central bank counterfeiting of "peculiar" securities. These securities in turn followed a standard pattern of being issued (1) in large denominations, and (2) in such a way that the design of the security itself was unusual enough that its issuing agency could subsequently deny its authenticity and proclaim it to be counterfeit if its holder was no longer deemed acceptable, or it could redeem the security at a tremendous discount. These securities in many cases claimed to be gold-backed, and the indications, as we have seen, is that the amount of gold in existence is probably much greater than official figures reflect. This gold, as the Bearer Bonds scandals strongly suggest, has been re-hypothecated over and over as a secret reserve to leverage vast funding for the hidden system of finance, a fact that, if it ever were to become popularly accepted or more rigorously and publicly demonstrated, would severely cripple the western system of finance. In short, when one considers that this vast and hidden system is connected both to a fraudulent and hidden system of bonds, to a vast amount of bullion possibly in excess of official figures, and to an international drug trade, then it becomes apparent that this system comprises a large segment of the world economy, and cannot easily be dispensed with without causing massive economic dislocation.

A. The Matrix[4] of Factions and Sectors

The pattern outlined in previous chapters also suggests a coordinated network of inter-relationships between various sectors and factions of the postwar elites. We note in this respect that on the "European" side of this network, a series of relationships developed during the war which were maintained after the war, between the American intelligence and military-industrial complex, and the financial sector, and the surviving corporate and Nazi elites, relationships we have detailed elsewhere.[5] On the Asian side of the equation, this nexus—as indicated by the previous chapters with the role of General MacArthur in establishing the connections to the Japanese elite, and the maintenance of ties between that elite and the American side as revealed by the Nixon handling of the M-Fund—began almost immediately after the war.

Thus, the overall factional structure of this breakaway civilization, as indicated by its financial component, comprises three general groups:

[4] In calling this a matrix, I do deliberately have in mind Carroll Quigley's matrix analogy, and as well, the mathematical one.

[5] See my SS Brotherhood of the Bell (Adventures Unlimited Press, 2006), pp. 75-79, The Nazi International (Adventures Unlimited Press, 20009), pp., 377-390, Babylon's Banksters (Feral House, 2010), pp., 45-75; LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy(Adventures Unlimited Press, 2011), pp. 55-58,151-187;, and Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops (Adventures Unlimited Press, 2011), pp. 141-175.

1) An American component, represented by the interface between the corporate, financial, military, and intelligence-covert operations national security structure that we have seen in play, and particularly in chapter 4;
2) A postwar European-international Fascist or Nazi component, deeply interlocked with corporate and financial Europe, and as I have indicated elsewhere, with the criminal underground or Mafia drug trade;
3) A postwar Asian elite, comprised largely of the same nexus of relationships between the Japanese imperial family, the political and corporate elites of Japan, and a criminal underground.[6]

What is represented here is the post-war development of a tri-lateral structure in two ways: (1) it is tri-lateral in the horizontal sense of its utilization and involvement of Japanese, American, and Euro-fascist elements, which represent the continuity of ongoing geopolitical interests within the structure, and (2) it is tri-lateral in the vertical sense of (a) being at the pinnacle of power, and hence, its activities are beyond the scrutiny of the "public" world, but (b) each of its three main factions maintain and must maintain a connection to that world precisely because the parasitic system of finance outlined in previous chapters requires a connection to it through major central and prime banks; and (c) each of its three factions maintains their own individual connection to the underworld of international organized crime and drug trafficking. The international character of this structure—with its Euro-Fascist, American, and Japanese components—will be formally acknowledged decades later by the establishment of the Trilateral Commission by David Rockefeller and national security advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Additionally, we must recall that one of the crucial points of contact between this structure and the public world of finance was via the Vatican bank, and while we have not been able to explore the long history of relationships between that bank and the criminal underworld—and secret societies—this is an aspect of the structure that should be recalled. The Vatican Bank, briefly put, was connected to the Fascist Masonic lodge of Licio Gelli, Loge Propaganda Due, to the banking

[6] We have not delved into the relationship of Operation Golden Lily and the Japanese imperial, corporate, and political elites to the Yakuza and its conduct of the drug trade during the war. For this matter see Sterling and Peggy Seagraves, Gold Warriors.

"career" of Mafia banker Michele Sindona, to the ratline operations smuggling Nazis and other European Fascists out of Europe, and, as we saw, was itself involved in industrial-scale securities fraud. Additionally, as the remarks of Eugene Cardinal Tisserant to Dr. Ledl suggested, the Vatican knew that the U.S.A. would hardly accuse the Vatican of counterfeiting, since the Vatican likely knew of the "breakaway civilization's" own industrial scale counterfeiting. Additionally, the Vatican was in a position to know the scope of Operation Golden Lily, since there were direct connections between Emperor Hirohito's personal accounts and the Vatican bank.

It is important, nay, crucial, to understand—particularly in coming chapters—that while the American component is obviously the dominating component in this structure, that each faction can and will pursue its own objectives and agendas independently. We are in short dealing with a kind of international Mafia—with satellites and nukes—with each faction represented "at the table," which factions can and do, when they feel their interests threatened, make war on the others.

When we turn to look at the sectors implied by the financial arrangements outlined in the previous chapters, the outlines suggested represent a kind of "American national-security apparatus" gone international, and comprising the following sectors:

1) The financial component (i.e. the central and prime banks);
2) The corporate component (i.e., the corporations conducting the research to be outlined in future chapters);
3) the intelligence and covert operations component, represented by the heavy presence of figures like Ed Lansdale in the financial activities outlined in previous chapters; and,
4) the military component.[7]

B. The Implications of the Bearer Bonds Scandals and the Axis Counterfeiting and Looting Operations

As is now apparent, the vast implications of the Bearer Bonds Scandals and the industrial scale counterfeiting of Operation Bernhard became "officially" institutionalized after the war by the issuance of fraudulent securities by the organs of governments and central banks themselves[8] as a component of covert operations. This suggests the following implications are possible, and thus, these implications themselves become signatures of the activity of the breakaway civilization, and hence, they will inform our investigations in the coming chapters:

[7] In respect to these points, see also my Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops, pp. 142-143.

1) the obfuscation of the amount of existing gold bullion allows the use of this gold as a secret reserve against which to issue securities of such a peculiar design that, on one level, they can be sold to large banks, and very wealthy individuals who will be convinced of their authenticity and redeemability, and on another level, the peculiarity of the design allows the issuing bank or agency to claim that they are counterfeit because of those peculiarities, should the bearer attempting to redeem them not be acting according to the dictates of the breakaway civilization; additionally, the "security" can be redeemed at a discount, or, as we shall discover in Part Two, secretly called in and destroyed, and a legitimate security substituted to disguise the fraud that has occurred;
2) this secret reserve can be used as a basis for issuing several different series of these peculiar securities, in other words, this secret reserve can be, and I believe has been, re-hypothecated several times over, such that, in reality, there exist several different claims or liens against it. Thus, the secret reserve has itself been used fraudulently to leverage a vast money supply for the breakaway civilization.[9] This implies, as noted above, that this black system of finance has become an independent entity, enabling the breakaway civilization much greater independence,

[8] We have noted, in this respect, the implications of the Bearer Bonds scandals for American securities by noting repeatedly the principle that one does not counterfeit was does not really exist, nor does one counterfeit something that cannot be redeemed, even if only at a great discount. We have noted the specific example of Prime Minister Tanaka's "57s notes" in Japan, and in part two of this book, we will present further evidence of this principle being followed on a massive scale with respect to American securities in conjunction with an exploration of the breakaway civilization aspects of 9/11.

[9] In an interview with me on her internet radio show, Catherine Austin Fitts made the comment that this was a kind of "leveraged buyout of the world" and functioned as the hidden financial basis for an already established, but still hidden, world government. (Solari Report, Sept 6, 2012. It should be noted that this interview is available to subscribers of her website).

yet, paradoxically, it is now such a large portion of the world economy, that this ties the structure of the breakaway civilization more tightly than ever to that of the "overworld";

3) The ability to leverage this vast hidden system was dramatically increased with the advent of computer-algorithmic high frequency-high volume securities and commodities trading, and, with software such as PROMIS and its derivatives, the secret system of finance and the trades supporting it can be monitored in real time;
4) Additionally, the capabilities alleged for PROMIS (and therefore for its derivatives and upgrades) would conceivably allow legitimate trading to be delayed for a few seconds or minutes while surreptitious use is made of someone else's money to execute other trades, whose profits go into the ever-expanding war chest of the breakaway civilization. These capabilities naturally extend to the possibilities for "counterfeiting" that virtual securities offer, such virtual securities could be sold, discounted, or—like their real paper counterparts—be declared counterfeit and deleted at will;
5) Such capabilities also give lie to the story heard initially after the tragic events of 9/11 that a large number of puts were placed on the market for the airlines involved, and that no one knew exactly who had placed these trades. Again, the penetration of the financial sector by such software means that trades can be tracked. As we shall see in part two, when such trades surrounding 9/11 are tracked, they lead inexorably once again back to institutions repeatedly identified as being connected to the various known factions of the structure of the breakaway civilization;
6) Yet another implication of what has been examined in previous chapter is that anomalous trades, or political statements, or both in advance of a major event of any nature indicates a signature of the breakaway civilization. This is particularly true if such trades or political statements precede a "natural" event that directly affects the institutions or nations indicates by the trading or political statement. If for example, a politician representing one faction within this structure, makes threatening statements to another faction within this structure, and a few days later, that other faction is hit with earthquakes, tsunamis, hurricanes, tornados, or so on, it is a clear signature of a possible technology in play. If these types of events are preceded by anomalous trading activity affecting the faction in question, it is even more plausible that a hidden technology is in play. This formula—(1) message and/or trading activity, followed by (2) a "natural event" of catastrophic proportions—is, as we shall see in parts two and three, a signature of the breakaway civilization's activities and covert wars. And it is quite the crucial point to note that this formula or signature of a psychological warfare and covert war is a component or standard methodology regardless of the target in question, whether the intended target is on this planet or not.

7) A final and crucial implication of the Bearer Bonds Scandals is the implications of the postwar collusion between the American and the former Axis components of this structure. It is evident that, given this structure, all three factions will be privy to the knowledge of the hidden system of finance, and to the scale of the fraud involved, even though it is principally the American component committing it. As suggested in the previous chapters, not all the Nazi or Japanese loot was independently recovered by American intelligence efforts, and thus, for the American component to make use of that unrecovered plunder would have required the collusion and partnership of the former Axis enemies. This cooperation would have come with what the bankers call "conditionalities," or as we saw in the previous chapters, their plunder would have been made available only on the basis of earmarking it for specific purposes. Violation of those purposes would—as in the Mafia—called for responses by the factions involved. The implication of all this is that the Bearer Bonds Scandals, which seem to have occurred with a regularity and frequency within a year of the massive bailouts passed by the U.S. Congress that is peculiar, suggest that one or more factions privy to the fraudulent and hidden system of finance were threatening to expose the whole structure.

In short, this hidden system of finance that we have outlined is that of the breakaway civilization. It is in my opinion the secret source of black budget funding for all the black projects and research and weapons, and fundamentally, for the technologies that may already have taken some small segment of humanity into interplanetary space. It is a source of funding of sufficient scale that one would expect for such a vast imperial enterprise, for it is utterly free of any constraints of governmental or "overworld" oversight.

If the reader is having difficulty wrapping his or her mind around such a notion, then perhaps the question may be rather differently stated:

Do you really believe the Pentagon pays for all those black budget projects with nothing but simple accounting tricks like $25,000 toilet seats and $8,000 wrenches? …

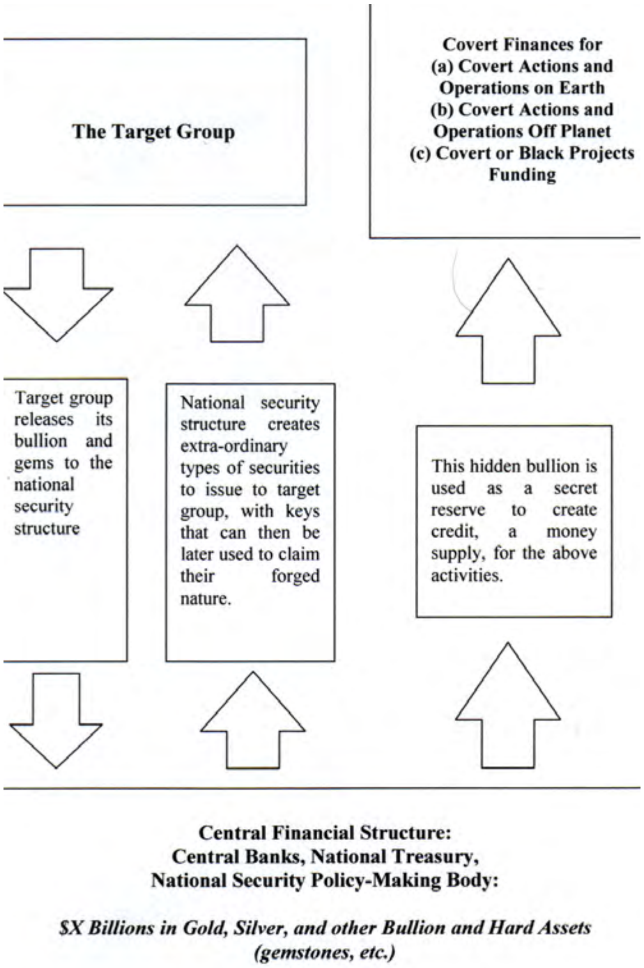
But let us return for a moment to another implication:

Lord Blackheath's comment on £1,000,000,000 of IRA money implies that the finance of terrorism is (1) synthetic and (2) so large that terrorist "finance" is inextricably woven into the world financial structure to the extent that an end to the war on terror could only come about with an end to the current global financial system.

A hidden system of finance for a breakaway civilization implies something else: so long as the need for secret research continues, then so long will the need to maintain a fraudulent system of finance to support it, by force of arms if necessary. This implies, bluntly, that a move to a "full or free" market or open system of money—whether it be the fiat system of debt free money, or a bullion standard—is an impossibility, since such a system would compromise the integrity of the secrecy of the technologies being developed; to put it succinctly: secret technologies cannot be financed by non-secret and open sources of funding. To put it even more succinctly: the technologies of "science fiction" require a system of "fictitious" or fraudulent, financing, at least in so far as the breakaway civilization has any need or necessity to maintain its connections and interface with the "overworld" society.

This insight suggests a consequence to the structure of the breakaway civilization, namely, that the financial oligarchy, while necessary to the interface of the breakaway civilization, is not necessary to its inner core, and, as the facts outlined in this part of the book—and particularly in chapter 4 suggest—the private international bankers are probably at the whim of the technocrats they have surrounded themselves with, for these, in turn, command the technologies that monitor their legitimate, and illegitimate, financial activities. They are influential, but no longer primus inter pares of the factional structures composing the lattice network of the breakaway civilization. To place this point somewhat differently, and more directly in the context of what are the deep implications of the Bearer Bonds Scandals, the very act of defrauding the corporate or individual super-rich, and obtaining legitimate letters of credit from their banks, by means of scams such as the Bearer Bonds Scandals, means that they are no longer in total or complete control. Factional infighting, in other words, can break out not only among the European, American, and Japanese factions of this structure, but also between its financial and technocratic components as well. Such influence as the old financial oligarchs are able to retain, they are able to do only by dint of the fact that the implicit blackmail and pressure that knowledgeable technocrats posses and hold over them, will not be used; it is, in short, a structure resembling the Mafia, writ large: every "family" or faction "has something" on every other faction; it is the detente or truce of the sword, and thus, a self-perpetuating system in its corruption, and a system of perpetual conflict.

How does all this work? Consider the following diagram of the structure implied by the Bearer Bonds scandals as a kind of summary of the structure we have been surveying:



The Target Group
Covert Finances for
(a) Covert Actions and Operations on Earth
(b) Covert Actions and Operations Off Planet
(c) Covert or Black Projects Funding
Target group releases its bullion and gems to the national security structure
National security structure creates extra-ordinary types of securities to issue to target group, with keys that can then be later used to claim their forged nature.
This hidden bullion is used as a secret reserve to create credit, a money supply, for the above activities.
Central Financial Structure:
Central Banks, National Treasury,
National Security Policy-Making Body:
$X Billions in Gold, Silver, and other Bullion and Hard Assets (gemstones, etc.)

What this diagram suggests is that, with the direct military and intelligence recovery of Axis loot, and with the direct contact that these sectors had with their corresponding Axis counterparts at the end of World War Two, that the old monopoly of the central banks was broken. A new player had emerged on the financial stage, and this new player was the "national security apparatus" which, with its access to hidden reserves of plunder, and with corresponding access to the engraving plates of the currencies and securities and to the corporations designing such securities, was able to penetrate its own central and prime banks and issue such securities either with or without their knowledge and cooperation, though as we have seen, the involvement of high power Wall Street lawyers like John J. McCloy and Allen Dulles strongly indicates that this was done with the knowledge and consent of the high financial power.

As we turn now to consider the covert operations of this breakaway civilization, and the technologies at its disposal, it will become even clearer that we are, indeed, not dealing with just a cabal or a conspiracy, but precisely with a breakaway civilization in Mr. Richard Dolan's sense, and that implies, as we shall discover in Part Three, that while the scale of its terrestrial covert and psychological operations and wars are immense, their major concerns may not lie on this planet at all…

PART TWO:
TECHNIQUES AND TECHNOLOGIES:
WAGING, AND CONCEALING, COVERT WAR, OR:
HOW TO WAGE TOTAL WAR WITH TOTAL PLAUSIBLE DENIABILITY

"The covert securities used to accomplish the original national security objective of ending the Cold War ended up in the vaults of the brokers of the World Trade Center, and were destroyed on September 11, 2001. They came due for settlement and clearing on September 12. The federal Agency investigating these bonds—The Office of Naval Intelligence—was in the section of the Pentagon that was destroyed on September 11. To a key group of senior National Security officials who had participated in the victory of the economic cold war in 1991, the WTC, the Pentagon, the four airliners and their occupants would (become) 'collateral' damage in the ending of the Cold War. Their deaths were required to hide the existence of the Black eagle Trust, and the covert activities it had funded for over 50 years. The alternative view of these events suggests that the destruction of these lives and buildings constituted a cover-up of continued lawlessness by a fraternity or brotherhood of businessmen and criminals often referred to as 'the Enterprise' in the 1980s, but has remained in the shadows since."

THE MATRIX OF MAYHEM AND MURDER:
COVERT OPERATIONS, COVERT FINANCE, HIDDEN WARS AND 9/11

"Khrushchev was furious, yet he tried to give Eisenhower latitude in disclaiming any knowledge of the incident. He stated that (Francis Gary Powers') U-2 flight may have been the work of 'American aggressive circles' trying to 'torpedo the Paris summit, or, at any rate, prevent an agreement for which the world is waiting.'"
Jim Marrs[1]

Every now and then, Hollywood releases movies that allow people to see portions of "the inside story," albeit in fictionalized form. I have pointed out elsewhere, for example, the uncanny Hollywood depiction of the two space programs hypothesis in films such as the James Bond Diamonds are Forever, or Capricorn One,[2] or George Lucas' epic Star Wars series with its depiction of ancient Cosmic Wars and exploded planets, metaphors of things recounted in ancient texts and of astronomical events in our own celestial neighborhood.[3]

The same could be said for the well-known Die Hard movies, starring Bruce Willis, and in particular, the movies Die Hard and Die Hard with a Vengeance. In the first movie, Willis, who plays New York police detective John McClain, encounters an international group composed largely of Germans (with an American, and even what appears to be an Asian or Latin American) laying siege to a high rise office complex owned by a Japanese corporation, all for the purpose of robbing its high security vault which is full of hundreds of millions of dollars in U.S. bearer bonds. This international group's leader, Hans, portrayed in suave, sophisticated ruthlessness by British actor Alan Rickman, has planned things so well that the FBI's own counter-terrorism playbook—which apparently he has access to—is used against the besieging law enforcement officers and agents in order to effect the robbery.

Additionally, the movie makes it clear that Hans is the leader of an international terror cell… of Germans. McClain of course beats the wily Hans, who plunges to his death from the high-rise office building as the bearer bonds he was attempting to steal flutter down around him.

After an interlude in the second movie where a corrupt Latin American general and dictator employs American special forces to free himself from impending drug running charges(which has its own odd relevance to the story of the breakaway civilization as we have noted), McClain is confronted in the third movie once again by a well-armed, well-trained group of Germans(veterans apparently of the German military) and other "Central Europeans," who are led by the deceased Hans' brother, who leads McClain on a wild-goose chase chasing bombs planted around New York City, while he and his band of Central Europeans literally rob the New York Federal Reserve Bank of all of its gold bullion. Die Hard with a Vengeance had to be delayed in its release because the attacks of 9/11 had just occurred. Here, again, we shall see how the movie has odd resonances to an underlying and little known financial aspect to the attacks on the World Trade Center.

Germans, and German-led international terrorist networks and special forces turned robbers. The New York Federal Reserve Bank. Gold bullion. Bearer bonds. Japanese.

The pattern is, by now, familiar and rather obvious.

The roots of it, however, are not so well-known and obvious, and while we have in the previous section of this book, outlined how the hidden system of finance originated, and in the preface surveyed the Cold War geopolitical matrix in which covert operations emerged, it is essential to understand in a more detailed fashion the purposes for which this system was deployed, for in that historical review, undertaken here, the connections between covert operations on the one hand, and advanced technologies, space, and UFOs on the other, slowly emerge. The interface is, once again, finance, and the players who moved in and out of the worlds of covert operations, banks, and black projects.

A. The Three Phases of the Institution of the Hidden System of Finance for Covert Operations

1. General Ed Lansdale and Frank Wisner

In part one we reviewed the landmark research of Sterling and Peggy Seagrave into the use of the Japanese Golden Lily booty to establish a secret hidden system of finance for covert operations with President Truman's full knowledge and authorization, making covert operations a semi-permanent feature of postwar American statecraft, and making the structure itself a vital component of the military-industrial complex. But there is more to the story, and that "more" consists of the interface between this structure and the postwar "Fascist" or "Nazi" International. In part one we noted, for example, the crucial role of Captain (later General) Ed Lansdale.

As we saw in the Preface, the National Security Council in 1948 established on its own authority the Office of Policy Coordination, whose job it was to plan and carry out covert operations under the direction of its chief, Frank Wisner.

Frank G. Wisner (1909-1965),
Head of the Office of Policy Coordination

As we shall discover momentarily, it was Wisner's idea not only to employ this vast supply of Nazi and Japanese plunder to retain and supply postwar Nazi and Fascist terrorist cells in Europe, but to siphon funds directly from the Marshall Plan to do so.[4] This point cannot be lingered over too long, for it tends to corroborate my suggestion made elsewhere that one of the purposes for the meetings of the early Bilderberg group was to coordinate this financial activity between the Anglo-American bankers and corporate and intelligence oligarchs, and their European Fascist counterparts.[5]

[4] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave, Gold Warriors, p. 106.

Significantly, after having discovered the Yamashita Gold and briefed General MacArthur and later President Truman on its existence, Lansdale was transferred to the U.S. Air Force by none other than General Hoyt Vandenberg, the U.S. Air Force Chief of Staff,[6] a name with its own deep connections to the UFO phenomenon as we have already seen. Lansdale attended the Strategic Intelligence School of the U.S. Air Force in Colorado for a few months,[7] before being transferred to Wisner's Office of Policy Coordination at the CIA, which reassigned him back to the Philippines,[8] where he doubtless continued to oversee recovery of the Golden Lily loot.

These are important points to pause and ponder, for they indicate that, in this one man, General Lansdale, all the significant areas of the breakaway civilization structure converge upon a common intersection, for Lansdale was involved in

(1) the establishment of the secret system of finance;
(2) he was directly involved in Wisner's covert operations group;
(3) Additionally, via his connection to the U.S. Air Force, via his training in strategic intelligence, and via his association with General Vandenberg, he has a connection with those echelons of the military command structure most directly involved in the confrontation of the UFO phenomenon and therefore dealing ultimately with technological projects designed to understand and emulate it; and finally,
(4) Lansdale soon came to the attention of Eisenhower's Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, and his CIA-Wall Street lawyer brother, Allen Dulles, and with this, Lansdale is directly interfaced with the very top echelon of intelligence and Wall Street connections.[9]

Put differently, Lansdale embodies that "coalescence of interests" that combined in the assassination of President Kennedy.

2. The First Phase: The 1934 "Morgenthaus" and the Deal with Chiang Kai-Shek

Additionally, the Seagraves suggest something else of crucial importance, namely, that this hidden financial-covert warfare structure went through at least three distinct phases of evolution. The first phase appears to be prior to any involvement of the future Axis Powers and their plunder from Europe and Asia, when American officials apparently struck a deal with Nationalist Chinese Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek, to physically store China's gold, in return for the issuance to Chiang and his cronies a number of dubious "securities", which bear the now familiar pattern of having been deliberately issued in such a way as they could be subsequently denied as authentic.

This gold, apparently some 1,665 metric tons, was loaned to the Federal Reserve "in exchange for Federal Reserve bonds."[10] Again, the implications are enormous, for under the conditions of normal operations, the Federal Reserve does not issue bonds, the U.S. Treasury does, and thus, the issuance of such bonds indicates that the private central bank is entering directly into the process not only of creating a hidden system of securities, but doing so as a matter of "foreign" policy of its own. These were, apparently, the now infamous 1934 Gold-backed Bearer Bonds, with the signature of then U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau, issued, according to some, without his knowledge.[11]

However, there is another side to the story that suggests that this was a part of a long-term financial strategy undertaken in anticipation of the coming World War, and its aftermath, an aftermath that would leave the USA as the dominant global power:

> Not everyone was convinced that the United States was the safest place for their gold, least of all Asians who had an ancient distrust of governments and banks. (Franklin D. Roosevelt) and his advisors understood that in South Asia, East Asia and the Pacific, a lot of gold was held by Overseas Chinese individuals, family associations, and > trading networks; by local warlords and criminal syndicates; by wealthy Indians; by Buddhist sects; by Dutch, French, Portuguese and Spanish colonial families, and by the Catholic Church, which had dominated the Philippines for four centuries. Large quantities of gold had been moved out of Europe for safekeeping during World War I, and during the Spanish Civil War, and were sleeping in vaults in the Philippines.

> Wealthy Chinese families, victimized by dynasties and warlords for thousands of years, held their precious metal in secret places, or in banks they owned or controlled in Manila, Hanoi, Bangkok, or Singapore. They expected Japan's conquest to spread south to the islands.[12]

Through various intermediaries in the Philippines, these then combined their resources, and approached Morgenthau offering to sell him "1,665 metric tons of gold."[13] Here we at last arrive at the heart of the Bearer Bonds Scandals, and of the involvement in the Spanish Bearer Bond case, of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, for having sold this gold to the Federal Reserve,

> …they would be given 250 separate Federal Reserve bearer bonds, each in a $100-million denomination. So at the time of issue in 1934 this transaction had a total face value of $25-billion. But, on maturity after thirty-two years—i.e. after 1966—the 250 bonds could be redeemed for a total of $100-billion. Instead of an outright purchase, the gold was being acquired by the Federal Reserve Bank in Chicago, as a loan, paying slightly over $10 an ounce (half of the existing private gold price) in return for interest over thirty-two years that would result in a total of $100-billion at maturity.[14]

[14] Ibid. The Seagraves continue to note that "This is supported by documents that accompanied the original transaction, reproduced on our CDs. One document, a Federal Reserve Bond Global Immunity, signed by Morgenthau, said the purchase was arranged this way 'to enable the government of the United States of America to determine the contract in a manner appearing as a loan, which shall be known as Federal Reserve Bon issue by the Bank of Chicago series of 1934.'"(Ibid., p. 251.) This author, having purchased the voluminous research of the Seagraves represented on their CDs, can attest that the amount of documentation is more than extensive, it is determinative. See their website to purchase the CDs: http://www.bowstring.net

In other words, it was simply state-sponsored and private central banking grand larceny, for "Because the (Federal Reserve) is a private banking cartel, whose books are not open to the public, it is impossible to know precisely how much gold was acquired in the 1930s."[15] The situation is so bad that, as the Seagraves point out, that

> A journalist at the Financial Times told us: "It has now reached a point where you can go into one of the big banks in New York, London or Zurich, give them half a metric ton of gold in return for a certificate of ownership, walk around the block for ten minutes, re-enter the same bank and they'll deny ever seeing you before, and have you arrested for presenting them with a counterfeit certificate." He was not joking.[16]

In any case, the bearer bonds received by the intermediaries were parceled out into banks in Switzerland, Chile, and Argentina.[17] The significance of this connection does not, of course, have to be emphasized, for it is precisely these countries which also played the key role in the interface between the Nazi elite and its Anglo-American counterpart both before, during, and after World War Two. The secrecy surrounding these gold transfers and the Federal Reserve's own secret books makes it entirely possible that this secret gold reserve was re-hypothecated several times over, creating an enormous hidden system of finance, and making it possible to launder these activities behind a variety of government backed securities of a more legitimate nature.

3. The Postwar Phase: The Transitional Mingling of Bankers and Covert Operations Offices

It is in the next phase that we detect a crucial development beginning to occur: the more direct mingling of the covert operations aspect of intelligence, and the financial area. This phase began after the ouster of Philippine dictator Ferdinand Marcos by the Reagan Administration for his part in attempting to access this hidden tier of finance directly and for his own purposes.[18] Marcos' ouster permitted the original Philippine participants and intermediaries to begin to attempt to recover the Federal Reserve Bonds.[19] It was at this juncture, the Seagraves observe, that some of the Bearer Bonds Scandals broke, with people claiming to have recovered some large denomination Federal Reserve Bonds and several Federal Reserve notes of large denominations from American plane crashes in the Philippines that occurred in 1948, a story, of course, denied by the U.S. Government and the Federal Reserve. Not so, say the Seagraves:

[18] Unfortunately, this aspect of the story is itself too long and convoluted to recount here, but it consumes a great deal of the Seagrave's book. Additionally, one should consult Charles C. McDougald, Asian Loot: Unearthing the Secrets

> According to reliable sources who visited the wrecked aircraft and recovered the dog-tags of the crew, the truth is as follows: In May 1948, four U.S. Air Force planes on their way from California to Malaysian Borneo, refueled at Clark (Air Force Base) just north of Manila, then continued on their way toward Borneo. A typhoon that had been brewing in the western Pacific moved directly into their flight path, and all four planes crashed into the mountains of Mindanao. In the doomed flight were B-29 Superfortresses of the type that had dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, plus a new modified version of the same plane called a B-50, and a much smaller twin-engined B-26. The lead B-29 had the serial number 7695132. Among the dead on board were General Frank Reagan, Colonel John Reagan, and crewmen named Colling, Dalton, Johnrey and Withor. The two B-29s were carrying thousands of (Federal Reserve notes) and (Federal Reserve bonds), in boxes from the Chase Manhattan and Wells Fargo Banks.[20]

What were these planes doing carrying chests full of so much money and securities?

> Professor Richard Aldrich of Nottingham University, co-editor of the journal Intelligence and National Security, described the strategic situation in 1948 in testimony before a British court in 2003: As Chairman Mao's forces advanced through China in 1948, Dr. Aldrich said, Britain and the U.S. dreaded the prospect that one of the world's largest stocks of gold—worth $83-billion at current prices—would fall into communist hands. So it was decided to extract the gold reserves from China before the communists could seize them. The CIA provided the means for this bullion rescue mission, flying in B-29 bombers disguised in the livery of (General Clair Chennault's Civil Air > Transport [CAT]), later renamed Air America. CAT flew numerous missions to bring huge shipments of gold out of Mainland China.

> Where did the (Federal Reserve notes) and (Federal Reserve bonds) fit in? Professor Aldrich said they may have been used "for persuading managers of major banks in the interior of China to part with their vast stocks of gold." Printing (Federal Reserve notes) and (Federal Reserve bonds) with a face value much greater than that of the gold they were to replace, he said, served to encourage the banks or wealthy individuals to swap their gold for the bonds and notes, which would be easier to hide and later smuggle out of China to be cashed in the West. As Aldrich said, the U.S. almost certainly had no intention of honouring them anyway.[21]

So why print bonds in such enormous denominations and quantities, and Federal Reserve notes in such large quantities? Aldrich speculated that one reason was to avoid the possibility of operational loss—such as airplane crashes—and that another reason was that the Chinese banks receiving these notes and "securities" would have been aware they "were likely to be redeemable for only a proportion of their face value. Therefore a much larger value in (Federal Reserve Notes) would have been required than the total value of the gold that the Americans and Chinese Nationalists were trying to extract from China."[22] The problem for the official American government and Federal Reserve story that all these bonds and notes are fake, is that Professor Aldrich is insistent that the bonds and notes being flown to China were entirely legitimate.[23]

The problem, however, is not only that one is dealing with legitimate securities issued with no intention of ever redeeming them—which constitutes state-and-central bank-sanctioned fraud—but that these securities and notes were all printed by the U.S. Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where, at that time, the CIA maintained an office "occupied fulltime in such activities, according to a CIA source we interviewed who worked there for years."[24]

In other words, the ultimate "movers and shakers" in establishing this hidden system were not the bankers of the Federal Reserve, but rather, the Cold Warriors in the intelligence establishment. In fact, during the Reagan Administration, the method we saw first being used in Operation Bernhard, and which we discovered in our review of the Bearer Bonds Scandals, was being repeated as part of a vast covert operation, part of which was being done in an effort to de-legitimize all such issues of bonds, and to re-hypothecate the Federal Reserve's gold bullion reserves yet again:

> Curiously, it was also in 1986 that the Federal Reserve decided to recast all the gold bars in its vaults, changing "good delivery" bars from traditional rectangular ingots into trapezoidal shape. Why this was done was never satisfactorily explained, but it allowed the Fed to change the hallmarks, serial numbers, and all other identification, which included re-papering and earmarking, effectively erasing all record of ownership of many thousands of tons of gold in its different vaults.[25]

Needless to say, such a procedure would be the perfect means to create several issues of such "fake" gold backed bearer bonds, and in my opinion, this is the likely explanation for why there are such enormous sums of them in existence; all it would take is numerous re-meltings, re-castings, new documentations, for each such issue of faked securities. Again, one does not counterfeit what does not exist.

But what of all those extant Federal Reserve Bearer bonds and notes? Simple: according to the Seagraves, the CIA was engaged in massive counterfeiting:

> A large number of Fed bonds and gold certificates were printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, on the wrong type of paper, with a comic variety of deliberate errors.

(Remember Prime Minister Tanaka, and his "57" bonds?)

> Many were engraved with the wrong faces, the wrong mottos, the wrong designs, the wrong signatures. Some were even engraved and printed in traditional Chinese characters. This would be a hilarious disinformation campaign, flooding Asia with blatant forgeries, to make the whole idea ridiculous. It would cut the legal legs off anyone trying to redeem legitimate gold certificates or legitimate Fed bonds. They could be laughed out of court.
> Special engraving plates were sent to Manila where the CIA already had presses to run them off. To confuse the issue in Mindanao, where the planes had crashed, two "missionaries" set themselves up with high-tech presses saying they were going to print Bibles, but instead > ran off conspicuously bogus Fed notes and bonds, which added to the impression that they were all false.[26]

In other words, one has the original 1934 operation, in which securities and notes were issued with no intention of redemption (fraud), and a second operation, ca 1948, with direct CIA involvement in issuing "securities" with errors (counterfeiting and fraud), and a third operation of industrial scale counterfeiting as a disinformation campaign during the mid-1980s under the Reagan Administration to deflect attention away from the first two fraud and counterfeiting operations by creating an enormous counterfeiting operation!

No wonder Eugene Cardinal Tisserant could glibly dismiss concerns that the Vatican would be implicated in securities fraud for employing Mafia counterfeiters by the U.S. Government! Indeed, the Vatican already knew of the theft of gold and the use of hidden funding that it enabled, since its bank had helped funnel such funds:

> In postwar Italy, CIA agent James Jesus Angleton recovered Ethiopian treasure plundered by Mussolini's forces. Instead of returning this loot to the desperately impoverished Ethiopian people, it was appropriated by the CIA and used to finance pro-American and anti-communist candidates in Italy's 1948 elections. In addition, the Agency raised a great deal of money in Europe from the sale of surplus U.S. war materiel, and gave this money to the Vatican, earmarked explicitly for the war on communism in Italy. The Agency then arranged for the Pope to provide 100-million lira from this personal account to back the anti-communist ticket during the elections. This comes as no surprise because it is now known that the Vatican bank sheltered Hirohito's assets and Nazi assets during the war. It is also one of the 42 countries to which… the recovered Golden Lily bullion was shipped during 1945-1947.[27]

Putting all this together, one may reasonably conclude that the driving force in the establishment of a global system of hidden finance, and of the fraud needed to sustain it, are the postwar intelligence interfaces of the West, and at its core, the intelligence complex of America. It is only a small step from the detente and co-existence and coalescence of this banking-intelligence nexus, to the possibility that the intelligence component can break completely from its financial overlords, and begin to draw financial matters into its own, and very independent, hands. This possibility becomes a frightening reality in the next phase, as we shall now see, and with it, another peculiar synchronicity with the UFO side of the breakaway civilization emerges.

4. The Independent, or Rogue Phase: Indications of the Break of the Breakaway Civilization

In the wake of President Nixon's resignation in 1973 after the Watergate affair, many of the covert operations Old Guard in the CIA—General Lansdale among them—were pressured into resigning. But gone is not forgotten, nor, inactive. These men, including Lansdale, then sought to gain direct control over the accounts that had been set up on the basis of the Axis loot, in order to establish their own private covert operations, intelligence systems, and mercenary armies.[28] What had begun as a rogue operation now had yet another rogue element within it. This was the era -from Nixon's fall to the years of the first and second Reagan Administrations—that saw precisely the vast expansion of private corporate intelligence and securities firms, often working in direct para-political fashion in conjunction with the U.S. Government and its various defense contractors.

But there is something else to be noted about this time period as well, and these two things, I believe, are significant and hardly coincidental: it was in this same approximate time period that, according to some of the Cooper-Cantwheel Majestic-12 UFO documents, the secretive UFO study group known as MAJIC-12 or Majestic-12 was privatized by President Nixon, and turned over to the corporate world with its own system of big money behind it, in the year 1969.[29] These documents state that Nixon was actually blackmailed into his eventual resignation by this group.[30] Given the nexus that we have thus far uncovered between the covert operations wing of U.S. intelligence, the hidden system of finance, and ultimately via Lansdale and his Air Force connections to the UFO issue, the possibility emerges that we are looking at the beginning of the real "break" of the breakaway civilization with its overworld interface ca. 1969. By the time of the emergence of the privatized covert operations nexus under the Reagan Administration, as represented by the entire Iran-Contra affair, the covert operations arm is acting more or less independently.[31] Put differently, it surely is not, in my opinion, coincidental that the UFO arm "breaks" from the direct connection to the government circa the same period as the covert operations arm breaks with it, and this is suggestive evidence that these two components were indeed part of the same occulted structure from the outset of the postwar period. This occulted and emerging breakaway covert warfare component called itself "The Enterprise."[32]

[28] Sterling and Peggy Seagrave*, Gold Warriors*, p. 152.

[29] See my SS Brotherhood of the Bell: The Nazis' Incredible Secret Technology, pp. 335-336.

[30] Ibid., p. 336.

In this respect, the Seagraves—without realizing the connection to the entire world of secret technological research, black projects, and UFO study groups—make a significant statement: "We reproduce letters from members of The Enterprise network, describing how they intend to use recovered Japanese war loot to set up a private FBI-style security force to police the American public, "and a separate military-industrial complex controlled by us."[33]

But again, we are dealing with vast sums of money over a prolonged period of time, and we have argued that this hidden system of finance and fraud was to fund two basic activities: covert operations and warfare, and black projects research. So before turning to the latter, we must first examine the covert warfare operations themselves, from the point of view of ascertaining an answer to this question: Can all of the known covert operations of the West, taken together, account for all the vast sums of money—in the trillions of dollars[34]—or is some other activity needed to explain such a vast system of industrial scale counterfeiting and fraud?

[31] Note then that in terms of the overall pattern of history, one would have this group instigating a coup d'etat with the JFK assassination, beginning to break away under Nixon, and completing the covert operations process of breakaway under Reagan. It is significant that the Majic-12 documents couple the covert operation against Nixon with the simultaneous break of the UFO study group, implying that the technological emulations projects may have broken at precisely the same time. Again, this would make sense only if the structure that we outlined in the preface, and that we are examining in detail in the main text, would directly connect covert operations, technological black projects, and hidden finance.

[32] The connection, of course, between intelligence and the corporate and financial worlds has been noted throughout this work, and is perhaps nowhere better attested than the fact that the CIA is known as "the Company," while the emergent breakaway covert warfare group preserves the corporate metaphor, being known as "the Enterprise."

B. A Brief Review of Western Covert Operations: NATO, Nazis, Fascists and "Terrorism"

1. A Catalogue of Created Crises

A brief glance at the extent of the covert operations during the postwar period, in just Europe alone, will give the reader some idea of how truly vast the extent of this activity really is, and by implication,[35] how truly large the required funding for it would of necessity have to be. It is now known that in one way or another, covert operatives of the West were behind the following postwar "terrorist" events:

1) The numerous attempts in the late 1950s and early 1960s to assassinate French President Charles DeGaulle by officers of the Organization Arme Secret or OAS, which had ties to this covert operations structure through the Gehlen Organization, the American CIA, and NATO headquarters (then located in France) via the various front companies associated with Centro Mondiale Commercial and the Permindex Corporation;[36]

[35] A good review of the structure and operations of this cabal during this period may be found in Richard Cottrell's Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: The Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis (Palm Desert, CA.: Progressive Press, 2012), pp. 5-31. In this section we will reference this and other major sources for this story, though space does not, obviously, permit us to go into any detail concerning each of these events, nor into the case that can be made tying each of them to this structure.

It is worth noting that Ganser divides his book into chapters, each of which is entitled "The Secret War in…" and then listing a particular European country, or, in one case, the United States itself. In other words, Ganser views this structure, as I do, as waging an unrelenting and covert warfare against the citizens of the countries represented in the structure. The countries listed in Ganser's book as having been the scene of these secret NATO-sponsored covert operations and wars are: Great Britain, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, Luxemburg, Denmark, Norway, Germany, Greece, and Turkey. See also Henrik Krüger, The Great Heroin Coup: Drugs, Intelligence, and International Fascism (Boston: South End Press, 1980), pp. 56-57, 200; and Richard Cotrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: The Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis, pp. 11, 118-120. Cottrell notes that it was General DeGaulle's decision to pull out of NATO and to develop an independent French nuclear and thermonuclear deterrent that in some respects contributed to the motivations behind the attempts. One could go on and on, and to this list, one could also credibly add the Norwegian shootings and Oslo bombing, the strange connections of Anders Breivik to this structure;[47] and one would have to add: Iran-Contra, and probably Waco and the Oklahoma City Bombing, and finally, the events that for most Americans define the connection to this underground breakaway civilization structure: the assassination of President John F. Kennedy,[48] and as we shall discover later in this chapter, 9/11 itself.

2. International Covert Operations as the "Military Arm" of the Breakaway Civilization: The Fascist Culture, and the Nazi and American Cores

This postwar covert operations structure is composed of two levels: the national covert operations "Gladio" cells themselves, maintained by each member nation of NATO, and the international supervisory superstructure of NATO itself, along with the national intelligence agencies which, by dint of their close interface with each other, give rise to the potential for an international intelligence network existing inside of—and to a degree independently of—each of the national intelligence structures of the member nations. Daniele Ganser observes that in the immediate postwar period the core of these covert operations units were comprised of the stay-behind guerilla warfare units organized by the collapsing Nazi and Fascist regimes:

[45] Q.v. Henrik Krüger, The Great Heroin Coup, pp. 146, 151n, , 210- 212. Notably, the heavy presence of international Fascists and Nazis in the Allende overthrow is a common feature to most of these covert operations.

> "The setting up of Stay-Behind organisations of the NATO countries started already shortly after the end of the Second World War," the official German government report on the stay-behind confirmed in 1990. After the defeat of Germany in 1945 the chaotic post-war conditions were ideal for the United States to set up a stay-behind. As occupying power the US armies controlled the territory together with the French, British and the Soviet forces in their respective zones. Above all the supply of thoroughly anti-Communist men trained in guerilla warfare and experienced with arms and explosives was abundant. And thus the United States secretly recruited former Nazis for the German stay-behind network. In the midst of the Gladio revelations in 1990 the private TV channel RTL shocked the German public by revealing in a special Gladio report that former members of Hitler's dreaded SS, who under Hitler had hunted the communists, had been part of Germany's Gladio network.
> The US army General Staff Top Secret March 28, 1949 Overall Strategic Concepts highlighted that Germany "has an excellent potential of trained men for both underground and Secret Army Reserve (stay behind units). Effective resistance can and should be organized." On the orders of the Pentagon in Washington the newly created US Counter Intelligence Corps (CIC) tracked down German Nazis and brought them to the Nurnberg trials, while the CIC also secretly recruited selected right-wing extremists for the anti-Communist army.[49]

[49] Ganser, NATO's Secret Armies, p. 190. With respect to the vast extent of the stay-behind networks in Eastern Europe and their "exilee" and "emigré" captive nation societies in the USA, and their relationship to Republican party politics and its National Heritage Council, the following remarks of Russ Bellant:

> "The Republican Heritage Groups Council has a special type of outreach. It appears to have consciously recruited some of its members—and some of its leaders—from an Eastern European emigré network which includes anti-Semites, racists, authoritarians, and fascists, including sympathizers and collaborators of Hitler's Third Reich, former Nazis, and even possible war criminals." (Russ Bellant, Old Nazis, the New Right, and the Republican Party: Domestic Fascist Networks and Their Effect on U.S. Cold War Politics [South End Press, 1991], pp. xvii-xvii)

This open association was begun, as noted, under Reagan, and many of the leaders of these groups become formal advisors to the presidential campaign of G.H.W. Bush in 1988. The man responsible for chairing the Republican Heritage Groups Council was one Laszlo Pasztor, "an activist in various

An additional force compelling toward the creation—or rather, continuation and utilization—of these stay behind units by the American military and intelligence complex was General Gehlen's organization itself, for by consistently over-estimating Soviet military capabilities, and giving intelligence estimates that consistently emphasized the imminent danger of full scale Soviet invasion in the immediate years after World War Two, the Gehlenorg in effect played to internal fears within the American command structure, and created the very conditions necessary to maintain these Nazi and Fascist units.[50]

In effect, the covert operations arm of NATO became a trans-national, or internationally organized Fascist army, even to the point that these units were the subject of secret protocols in the treaties by which countries—and one very important country in particular—entered the alliance, for according to Daniele Ganser once again,

Hungarian rightist and Nazi-linked groups. In World War II Pasztor was a leader of the youth group of the Arrow Cross, the Hungarian equivalent of the German Nazi Party." (Bellant, op. cit., p. 5) Others included Bulgarian Radi Slavoff, under investigation for concealing war crimes, and a member of "other emigré fascist groups' (Bellant, op. cit., p. 2), Nicolas Nazarenko, an SS officer in the Nazi Cossack division; Florian Galdau, a defender of Romanian archbishop Valerian Trifa, involved in the Romanian Fascist organization Iron Guards, and accused of being a recruiter for that organization; Method Balco, associated with the Slovak emigré groups, groups heavily infiltrated by former members of the Nazi puppet regime of Slovakia after the German annexation of Bohemia-Moravia in March 1939; and Walter Melianovich, head of the Republican party's White Russian or Byelo-Russian unit, also heavily associated with Nazi sympathizers and recruits. (See Bellant, op. cit., pp. 2-3). In short, one is dealing with General Reinhard Gehlen's "stay-behind units" which he subsequently proposed to the Americans be left in place and used in an eventual "rollback" strategy of the Soviet bloc. (See also Bellant, op. cit., p. 4.)

[50] For these points, see Christopher Simpson, Blowback: The First Full Account of America's Recruitment of Nazis, and its Disastrous Effect on Our Domestic and Foreign Policy (Collier Books, 1988), pp. 52-56; 59-65. Simpson even notes that so trusted, or influential, was the Gehlenorg within the corridors of American intelligence (or to put the same point differently, so in agreement were the American and German cores of this network), that in some instances, the Gehlenorg's intelligence estimate and analysis was simply retyped verbatim on the appropriate stationary, and handed to President Truman as the CIA's official estimate of the situation! (Simpson, op. cit., p. 53)

> When the Gladio scandal erupted in 1990 an unnamed former NATO intelligence official explained that the covert action branch of the CIA under Frank Wisner in order to set up the German secret army had "incorporated lock, stock and barrel the espionage outfit run by Hitler's spy chief Reinhard Gehlen. This is well known, because Gehlen was the spiritual father of Stay Behind in Germany and his role was known to the West German leader, Konrad Adenauer, from the outset." According to the unnamed NATO officer, US President Truman and German Chancellor Adenauer had "signed a secret protocol with the US on West Germany's entry into NATO in May 1955 in which it was agreed that the West German authorities would refrain from active legal pursuit of known right-wing extremists." [51]

It takes little imagination to see that this international military organizational structure, with a secret protocol in Germany's case, would most likely have been a secret protocol component of arrangements between the USA and its other NATO allies as well, and thus, one may conclude that lurking beneath the overt posture of NATO as a defensive alliance in the service of "freedom and democracy" there lies a much deeper and much more sinister Fascist operational culture.[52]

The mention of the name Frank Wisner in conjunction with these covert units brings us to the American core of this international structure, and to the relationships and networking that its original core leaders represented. Ganser surveys these core leaders and their relationships in the following remarks:

> General Gehlen was right in assuming that the data which he had collected during his torture operations on the Soviet Union and its Communists was of great interest to the United States. Together with a small group of senior Nazi officers he had therefore at the end of the war carefully microfilmed the extensive (Fremde Heere Ost) data on the USSR, had packed the films in watertight steel drums and had secretly buried these in meadows in the Austrian Alps. After several weeks of (Counter Intelligence Corps) internment Gehlen got into contact with US General Edwin Luther Siber to whom he revealed his secret. The US General was so impressed that he promoted Gehlen's career in the years to come. He introduced Gehlen to senior US

[51] Daniele Ganser, NATO's Secret Armies, p. 193, emphasis added.

[52] Richard Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe, pp. 9, 47-47, suggests in very stark terms that NATO was meant to be a permanent structure and aspires to be the organizational military and covert operations matrix of a global superstate, with a kind of permanent "war socialism"(p. 19), or mercantile-militarism(p. 10).

> intelligence officials, including General Walter Bedell Smith, then the highest US Army intelligence officer in Europe, and later Director of the CIA from 1950 to 1953. Siber also introduced Gehlen to General William Donovan, chief of the US wartime secret service Office of Strategic Services(OSS), and Allen Dulles of the OSS, later chief of the CIA, as well as Frank Wisner of the OSS, later chief of CIA's (Office of Policy Coordination) which set up the European stay-behind network.[53]

This Dulles-Donovan-Wisner-Gehlen covert operations and intelligence "axis" is very revealing, for with Dulles and Donovan in particular, one has men whose connections lead directly to Wall Street, and to the American financial oligarchy.

3. Frank Wisner, The Office of Policy Coordination, and the "Deep State"

Almost from its inception, Wisner's Office of Policy Coordination was deeply involved in the drug trafficking of Nationalist China's Khoumintang government, to such an extent, that CIA director Walter Bedell Smith abolished it "altogether and merged its personnel with the CIA's own covert operations staff in a new Department of Plans (later Department of Operations)."[54] Smith's intention was to bring covert operations "under more responsible oversight" but unfortunately the merger had exactly the opposite effect, since the OPC "especially under Allen Dulles, effectively took over the CIA,"[55] transforming the agency into as much a covert warfare bureau as an intelligence gathering and analysis agency. This transformed the 1948 National Security Council memorandum 10/2 from a small affair to a very large one, effectively giving the CIA authorization to engage in criminal activity.[56] Thus, with the nexus of Wisner, Dulles, covert operations, international post-war Fascist "stay behind" units, one observes an essentially international

[56] The careful reader will have observed that in some respects the OPC/CIA covert operations culture resembles the oligarchical structure and criminal agencies of the Republic of Venice, and its notorious Council of Ten. Professor Scott himself notes the resemblance of this structure to those of the northern Italian city-states of the High Middle Ages and Renaissance on p. 180 of his book. See also p. 2 of Scott's American War Machine for a brief survey of the types of "deep state violence" conducted by this covert operations nexus.

Fascist structure beginning to emerge, one bridging and bringing together both American and European elements, one that, moreover, could serve "the interests of private international wealth,"[57] and like the territorial Mafia and international criminal drug trafficking syndicates, the "bosses" of the various national components of the stay-behind units would meet regularly to coordinate plans and activities.[58]

This nexus implies the potential for a permanent privatization or corporatization of intelligence and covert operations. Indeed, as noted previously, Allen Dulles, prior to the creation of the CIA, had acted to create just such a private intelligence agency called the World Commerce Corporation, involving William Stephenson from British intelligence, and Nelson Rockefeller,[59] a fact suggesting to many that the agencies established by the National Security Act of 1947—the CIA and NSA—are less agencies of the US government than they are of Wall Street and the high financial oligarchy of the USA.

In spite of Bedell Smith's merger of the Office of Policy Coordination and the CIA, Wisner[60] stayed on until 1958, when he was replaced by Richard Bissel, who ran covert operations until 1962[61] when he was fired by President John F. Kennedy in the wake of the Bay of Pigs fiasco. This is quite the crucial point, for Bissel also had direct influence over the CIA's top secret U-2 spy plane flights over the Soviet Union and Communist China, and thus, it is with Bissel and the CIA's

Ganser also comments on another important, and incipiently Fascist, feature of this structure, namely that the American officers of the Office of Policy coordination "tended to be white (male) Anglo-Saxon patricians from old families with old money… and they somewhat inherited traditional British attitudes toward the coloured races of the world." (Ganser, op. cit., p. 55, citing Thomas Powers, The Man Who Kept the Secrets: Richard Helms and the CIA [London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1980], p. 37.)

[59] Peter Dale Scott, American War Machine, p. 27. The expression of this private intelligence agency—The World Commerce Corporation—was absorbed as a methodology by the CIA in its establishment of the World Trade Centers throughout the world, the most notorious examples of which were the Centro Mondial Commercial in Italy, associated with Permindex (see my LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy, pp. 160-172), and the World Trade Mart in New Orleans, associated with CIA agent Clay Shaw, the subject of New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison's investigation of the Kennedy Assassination.

[60] Daniele Ganser also observes that Wisner was Richard Helms' mentor in covert operations and intelligence at the CIA (op. cit., p. 268 n. 19).

Department of Plans that we also see the common surface with the world of black projects and the secret technologies being developed for reconnaissance of the Soviet Union. Succinctly put: Bissel's presence and role at this time is the surest indicator that one simply cannot separate the covert operations culture from that of the black projects world and its secret technological research and development.

4. The Methodology of the Culture:
a. Plausible Deniability, False Flag Operations and Drills, or, Ops within Ops

The underlying methodology of all these covert operations was not only that of "plausible deniability", but to a certain extent, that of the false flag operation, and oftentimes both simultaneously. This simultaneity itself is an important operational principle arising from the culture of the breakaway civilization, for it means that within any given operation, particularly those designed to effect the "deep events" in Peter Dale Scott's sense of the term, an operation is designed to optimize the achievement of several discrete objectives all at once. We have encountered already in the preface an example of this mentality in the development of technologies designed to fulfill two functions: the covert monitoring of the Soviet Union, and the more difficult covert monitoring and reconnaissance of UFO activity and suspected bases. We will deal again with this subject in part three.

But there are two more earthly examples of this covert operations mentality. Throughout the terrorism operations conducted by the NATO Gladio units in Europe, and to a lesser extent their corollary operations in Latin America and Africa, the terrorism perpetrated by these extreme right Fascist networks has consistently attempted to disguise itself as that of the radical Communist left, in classical false flag operations. False flag operations thus evidence the method, for initial blame can be assigned to an enemy, and in this plausible deniability of the involvement of one's own forces is given another mantle of deception cloaking its activities. Classical examples of this tactic are the Operation Condor murders in Latin America, blamed on the Left, but actually perpetrated by covert elements of the extreme Right, and the terrorist actions surrounding the 1990s recognition of an independent Croatia, where again, the perpetrators on the Right conducted operations blamed on the Left.[62]

[62] Q.v. Henrik Krüger, The Great Heroin Coup, pp. 210-212. 217.

Another example is the "operation within an operation", where one party's operation is penetrated by another, which uses the one to accomplish its own aims. Consider for example the bombing, and subsequent murders, in Norway in 2011, a classic example of an operation of this sort:

> The carnage in Norway struck on 22nd July 2011, first in the central district of Oslo, the capital city, then on a sleepy little island camping retreat not far away. It marked a significant use of synthetic terror as a means of social control, while advancing the agenda of global world power. First, to cut an awkwardly independent but immensely wealthy country down to size; second, to usher on stage the next phase of indefinite war waged on ordinary citizens, the familiar story of Gladio… Within hours of the attacks, the (European Union's) policing offshoot Europol announced a new multi-national task force, charged with investigating and infiltrating potentially hostile political movements deemed as potentially dangerous. In other words, exactly those groups which supposedly inspired the 33-year-old market gardener Anders Behring Breivik to kill 77 people, 55 of them teenagers. Another 62 suffered bullet wounds. The massacre commanded world headlines and news channels. But when the news leaked out six weeks later that Norway's crack anti-terrorist squad had just finished a "training exercise" on the day, which exactly mirrored the bombing in downtown Oslo and the following shooting frenzy on Utøya Island, the only official response was silence. The bomb that practically wrecked a large area of the downtown business and government district exploded less than half an hour after the so-called drill ended. A senior police spokesman brushed it off as a mere 'coincidence.'
> The chances against such a random co-incidence are multiples of millions to one. The odds rose even farther when it emerged that the first police officer who stepped ashore amid the bloodshed on Utøya Island not only recognized Breivik immediately, but addressed him directly by name… We are in the same territory as the NORAD drill involving the use of jets as weapons on 9/11, and the simulated terrorist attack on the London underground system, which 'just happened' to overlap with the real-time deadly bombings.[63]

[63] Richard Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: the Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis, p. 424. Cottrell notes that Norway had a strong and critical anti-Israel stance, as well as a strong anti-US/anti-NATO lobby. (p. 426.)

In other words, "All the tell-tale signs of a stage-managed Gladio event were apparent from the outset."[64]

b. The Lone Nut Assassin Technique: Norway, JFK and John-Paul II

While not directly germane to the topic of the breakaway civilization per se, it is worth mentioning that one standard technique is another methodological idée fixe for the breakaway civilization mandarins of covert operations; this is the "Lone Nut Assassin" technique.

Richard Cottrell observes that Anders Breivik's Facebook profile continued to be adjusted after the attacks, a fact that suggests "that even at this late stage… the personality moulding (sic) was still continuing, as though his credentials as a lone crazed terrorist still invited refinement and adjustment."[65] Moreover, Breivik's behavior suggested something else, something that suggested yet another connection to the deep covert operations state, and to its alleged mind control and manipulation techniques and technologies. "The world," observes Richard Cottrell, > was soon looking at the calmly composed and classically Nordic features of a blue-eyed, blonde-mopped figure in his early thirties, not altogether without a certain wholesome appearance. He seemed the image of serenity, like the state of composure he maintained after his arrest and according to survivors, his glacial demeanor amid the bloodbath on the camping island. Indeed his brief public appearances in court conveyed the impression of an individual transfixed in some entrancing dream. One of his closest friends wondered if he was drugged or brainwashed, finding his appearance eerie and quite untypical.[66]

Similar allegations have been made about Robert F. Kennedy's alleged assassin, Sirhan Sirhan, about Lee Harvey Oswald's murderer Jack Ruby, and most recently, about the alleged "Batman movie" murderer, James E. Holmes.

The methodological connections spin out from there. For example, most people are unaware of the very close general similarity of the assassination attempt on Pope John-Paul II and President John Kennedy, for witnesses present during the attempt heard more than the official number of shots. Thus,

> …(The) mystery of exactly how many shots and more precisely who fired them, with what type of weapon, and from what angle, now began to colour the many differing versions of events that day. There seemed to be a striking overlap with the confusion at Dallas almost thirty years earlier. There was confusion over the number of shots, whether fired by a single gunman or a task force. The chief suspicion fell on (Mehmet Ali) Agca, a brainwashed patsy in the mould of Lee Harvey Oswald. And not least a mysterious grainy image, captured by a bystander, showing an unidentified figure hurrying from the piazza moments after the gunshots. According to his trial testimony, Agca insisted he fired 'two or three shots in rapid succession.' Three struck John Paul. One slapped into his lower intestine, the others struck his left hand, passing through his abdomen, and his right arm. Two people in the dense crowd were injured, either collaterally by the same bullets, or by others aimed from a different direction.[67]

The resemblance does not stop there, for researchers soon discovered, behind the attempts to place blame on the assassination to Bulgaria and the Soviet Union, lay much murkier connections of Agca to Turkish neo-Nazi and Fascist groups, that in turn had connections to the West German Bundesnachrichtendienst and the CIA.[68]

[67] Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe, p. 265. This author strongly disagrees with the characterization of Oswald as a brainwashed patsy. Oswald showed no signs of having undergone such techniques.

[68] Ibid., p. 276. Cottrell notes that the Gladio operations and organizations received a huge boost from General Lyman Lemnitzer, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff whom Kennedy "exiled" to the supreme command of NATO. Lemnitzer of course had ties to General Ed Lansdale, and Cottrell points out that "Dealey Plaze bore the template of a ready-made Gladio-style assassination prohect."(p. 102). Cottrell goes on to observe what many JFK assassination researchers have maintained, namely, that the photographs of the so-called "three tramps" appear to show Charles Harrelson, and Chauncy Holt, the latter of whom, let it be noted, was "a brilliant counterfeiter," and both of whom have been alleged by various JFK assassination researchers, to have worked "for the CIA and organised crime at the same time."(p. 102) In one photo or the three tramps, as pointed out by Fletcher Prouty, a man passing in the other direction appears to be none other than General Ed Lansdale. (q.v. Cottrell, op. cit., p. 103). Cottrell notes that "Lemnitzer was among the chief architects of the Strategy of Tension, and brought with him a wealth of experience gained from earlier commands in Southeast Asia. There and later in

c. The World Anti-Communist League as a Technique of Factional Management

Given the highly internationalized structure of the covert operations and financial arms of the breakaway civilization, not to mention the hidden competing factional components of American East Coast old money, Texas and West Coast "cowboys," postwar Fascists, Nazis, and Japanese, how would it be managed and coordinated? One mechanism has already been mentioned: regular coordinating meetings between various managerial levels of the structure, including the top echelon in meetings such as the Bilderberger Group.[69]

In addition to this however, there are permanent agencies of coordination, and a glance at one of the most notorious of these, the World Anti-Communist League, based in Nationalist Chinese Taiwan, is in order. If there is any one public "agency" that could be identified as the Nazi, or Fascist, International, this is it,[70] for it is backed by powerful right wing financial elements in Nationalist China and South Korea, such as the "reverend" Sun Myung Moon, but also brings together CIA covert operatives, Chinese, Korean, Japanese, American, and most notably, postwar German, Italian, and other European Fascist elements. Additionally, it was tightly networked to General Gehlen's German Bundesnachrichtendienst.[71]

> The tentacles of this sprawling octopus eventually extended to all corners of the planet. This was visibly the Fascist International, the huge global Gladio… It was charged with the… brief to 'overcome and eliminate' any governments or forces considered sympathetic to communism. The means were not precisely specified, save for talking about warfare in psychologically political terms. Yet (the World Anti-Communist League) was tracked to Operation Condor, death squads in the Pentagon he was under the spell of the immensely unorthodox air force (sic) colonel (later general) Edward Lansdale."(p. 18). Thus is a significant point, for it provides yet another thread of connection between the covert operations world, the Golden Lily treasure and the hidden financial system resulting therefrom, and the assassination of JFK, for Kennedy's move toward a direct debt-free money in June of 1963 took direct aim at this hidden structure, and it is quite conceivable that Kennedy may not known the full of extent of it.

> Latin America and the Iberian Peninsula, the twin Kennedy assassinations and general oiling of Iran-Contra in life-after-death mode. So, it would not be surprising to discover (the World Anti-Communist League's) fingerprints thickly plastered all over The Enterprise of drug and arms dealing in its latter-day formation. In Europe, (the World Anti-Communist League) was tied up with various neo-fascist fronts, particularly Licio Gelli's P2/Gladio activities, in Italy as well as South America. The 'liquidations' of both Aldo Moro (communist fraterniser) and Olof Palme (Iran-Iraq meddler, irritating Palestine interloper) have been cited as promoted in some degree by (the World Anti-Communist League).[72]

Viewed another way, the entire alliance of American, Japanese, Korean, Nationalist Chinese, and European Fascists that the World Anti-Communist League symbolized and effected, was but another consequence of the alliances between the USA and the postwar Nazis forged even before World War Two was over; it represents, as it were, a kind of unapostolic succession of the Nazi and Fascist parties and ideologies.[73]

[72] Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: the Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis, pp. 123-124.

[73] The connections again to the JFK assassination are deep and clear. Cottrell makes these observations about the consequences of the postwar deal with the Nazi oligarchy:

> To (Henrik) Krüger, the Miami-Lisbon-Madrid-Rome axis was the logical continuation of the CIA's record in forging alliances with high Nazi officials, notably General Reinhard Gehlen, Hitler's spy chief on the Russian Front, who became West Germany's first intelligence chief in 1947. American historian Carl Oglesby wrote: 'Everything after this (Gehlen) was just a consequence of this merger.' He could have said exactly the same of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, which by now had been led by the nose into the same network of black alliances. (p. 125)

Cottrell also notes that the Madrid "branch office" of this franchise was connected to none other than SS Lt. Col. Otto Skorzeny (p. 125), which had an office in Zurich which was "the contact point for undercover deals with Swiss arms firms. Conveniently, there was office space for the CIA-sponsored corporate twins, Permindex and the World Trading Centre (aka Centro Mondiale Commerciale)" which were both, notes Cottrell, connected to assassination attempts on President DeGaulle. (p. 125)

When Soviet Communism fell, the name of the World Anti-Communist League was merely changed to the World League for Freedom and Democracy.[74] This is a point of signal importance, for it means that whatever this organization chooses to call itself, it performs a vital and permanent function to the breakaway civilization, and it is rather easy to see what that function is. Such agencies or bureaucracies function as the common surface between various factions within the structure, not only to coordinate activities, channel funds, manage personnel, but also to allow the factions to express their competing interests and agendas, and quite literally, to spy on each other, and, through regular operational contact, to estimate each other's agendas, intentions, and capabilities.

But there is another such agency, with deep ties to the covert operations and financial arms components of this structure; it is, so to speak:

5. The Holy Ghost in the Machine, or, The Vatican Bank.

While the Vatican's connection to the deep industrial scale financial fraud was surveyed briefly in part one, it is necessary to see why it functioned within this structure as "the Holy Ghost in the Machine," as a kind of spiritualized "World Anti-Communist League." Obviously, its religious traditions and history would have made it implacably opposed with official Soviet Communist atheism at the deepest and most philosophical level.

However, there is another reason. When I was a college professor, I used to tell my Mediaeval and Modern European history students that the oldest political chancery in continuous operation in the world, the one with the most experience in all manner of statecraft, including the use of applied terror as a system of social engineering, was the Vatican. Cottrell puts this points with some force:

> After the Second World War, the Vatican clamped itself to the massive global alliance composed of the United States, NATO and Western intelligence. The common interest clearly lay in a great bulwark against the spread of communism, yet this is to understate the sheer scale of the power the Roman church invested in the great game. The Pope's battalions around the globe include (or so it is claimed) more than a > billion committed worshippers, 400,000 clergy, an impressive global diplomatic service, highly-sophisticated espionage skills and cradle-to-the-grave mind conditioning systems aided by schools, universities and the media. Taken together they enable the Holy See to perform as a world power.[75]

The nexus of Vatican intelligence and finance with that of the West and NATO was, of course, the Vatican Bank, for it was this bank that was used in the economic warfare against the Soviet Union unleashed by use of the hidden system of finance enabled by the Nazi and Golden Lily loot, and it was this bank that played such a large role in the transference of funds from the West to Russia that enabled the establishment of the huge post-Soviet corporations such as the Russian energy giant Gazprom.[76]

But this bank also functioned as a key nexus for the laundering of money from the Mafia—witness its ties to Michele Sindona, Roberto Calvi, and Licio Gelli—to the extent that it can be safely maintained that this bank "had been effectively hi-jacked by criminal interests holding strong affinities with the Italian and American Mafia, the Italian secret state and the Gladio sleeping soldiers."[77] It would perhaps not be an exaggeration to say that the Vatican bank was the financial legs to the worldwide Fascist International represented by the World Anti-Communist League.[78]

6. A Key Cultural Indicator that It Really Is a Breakaway Civilization: Operation Northwoods

Our attention has been concentrated throughout this book largely on the American components of this international structure, and on its largely Fascist outlook and culture. But can it be truly said that it constitutes a genuinely breakaway civilization, one at odds with the overworld with which it is entangled?

---

[75] Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: the Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis, p. 281, all emphases added. The title of this section of this chapter, "the Holy Ghost in the Machine," was inspired by Cottrell's phrase, that the Vatican was "a holy ghost within the structure of NATO, even to the extent of hosting its own Gladio unit, drawn from the Swiss Guard, the Pontiff's personal protection squad, and the private Vatican police."(p. 16)

[78] It is worth noting that, according to Cottrell, Permindex, the notorious CIA-sponsored Murder Incorporated in Zurich, was tied to Centro Mondiale Commerciale (the Italian franchise of the World Trade Centers), and that it had an Italian "offshoot" of its own, on whose board sat the Vatican-connected, and notorious Fascist founder of the P2 lodge, Licio Gelli.(Cottrell, op. cit., p. 141)

There are two key indicators here, and both lie, once again, with General Lyman Lemnizter and his close relationship to covert operations guru and hidden financial system mandarin, General Ed Lansdale. The first of these indicators is the now well-known, and infamous, Operation Northwoods from March 1962, a Lansdale brainchild of a covert operation, with all the Gladio hallmarks of a false flag enterprise. For the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the time, the problem was "How do we get rid of Communist Cuba?" The answer

> …was perfectly simple. Pentagonia planned to attack the United States.
> It is an axiom of American life that all actions of men and women in military uniform are virtually beyond reproach. Hate the war, love the warrior. Yet here, in cold print, were detailed plans for acts of terror to be performed under the American flag on the orders of the highest military commanders in the land. This deadly project… was aimed at garnering international support to justify a full-scale US invasion of Cuba, fostering the illusion the regime in Havana had descended into diabolical lunacy. One proposal—blowing up an American vessel in the Guantanamo Bay and then blaming it on Cuba—slipped straight from the Maine playbook.[79]

Yet another plan, in "an eerie premonition" of 9/11,[80] "called for the hijacking of a US passenger jet by special forces disguised as Cuban agents."[81] This aircraft would then drop below radar, being replaced at that instant in the same area by a pilotless airplane which "would crash, purportedly killing all the passengers and crew."[82]

Cottrell rightly observes that "There was not a single item in the Northwoods manual that did not amount to a blatant act of treason,"[83] in other words, the upper echelons of the Pentagon, as a structural component of this international structure, was broken away from its host society, and had become "a full-blown state within a state."[84]

[79] Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: The Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis, p. 84.

[82] Ibid. Cottrell goes on to answer the obvious question: "The decoy plane would then land safely somewhere in the US, leaving the question open as to how all those on board could be relied upon to keep silent about their adventure."(p. 85)

[83] Cottrell, Gladio: NATO's Dagger at the Heart of Europe: the Pentagon-Nazi-Mafia Terror Axis, p. 85.

But in the wake of the Bay of Pigs fiasco and the Cuban Missile Crisis, the Pentagon abandoned the false flag strategy in order to issue what was clearly an ultimatum to President Kennedy, delivered to him via his Secretary of Defense, Robert McNamara:

> The Joint Chiefs of Staff believe that the Cuban problem must be solved in the near future. Further, they see no prospect of early success in overthrowing the present communist regime either as a result of internal uprising or external political, economic or psychological pressures. Accordingly they believe that military intervention by the United States will be required to overthrow the present communist regime.[85]

Cottrell minces no words concerning the breakaway mentality in evidence:

> Unprecedented in the history of relations between the US military and the White House, the memorandum was couched in uncompromising language that implied a meltdown in relations between the Pentagon and the Commander in Chief. "The Joint Chiefs of Staff believe that the United States can undertake military action in Cuba without risk of general war." Lemnitzer continued. "They also believe that the intervention can be accomplished rapidly enough to minimise communist opportunities, for solicitation of UN action." The tightened leverage was extraordinary in the sense that the chiefs made no attempt to hide the impression they considered their political nuance and judgement overrode the elected president. Lemnizter did not intend to free the Cuban people, who were largely in support of Castro, but shut them up in a US prison colony. "Forces would assure rapid essential military control of Cuba," the president was told. However, "continued police action would be required."[86]

Kennedy of course responded by exiling Lemnitzer to Europe's NATO command.

The breakaway civilization struck back in Dallas.

C. The Bearer Bonds Scandals and 9/11 Targets

We arrive at the heart of the covert operation which evidences all these methodologies and structures, and moreover that indicates that there serious fault lines between the factions composing this structure are beginning to emerge: 9/11.

E.P. Heidner, in an important online paper, “Collateral Damage: U.S. Covert Operations and the Terrorist Attacks on September 11, 2001,” outlines the deep historical roots of the attacks on the Pentagon and World Trade Center, and their links to the international structure with which we have been contending. The “op within an op” structure of 9/11 is now taken for granted by many people who question the official explanations of 9/11, and this feature alone ties it to the covert operations methodology of the breakaway civilization.

1. 9/11 and the Hidden System of Finance

There is, however, another possible tie as well, and it is this possible tie with which Heidner’s paper is concerned, for he “contends that not only were the buildings targets, but that specific officers within each building were the designated targets. These offices unknowingly held information which if exposed, subsequently would expose a national security secret of unimaginable magnitude.”[87] This, contends Heidner, was the ultimate motivation for the 9/11 attacks.[88]

What was the secret that was the motivation? Financial crimes were being investigated by the Office of Naval Investigation (ONI), “whose offices in the Pentagon were destroyed on September 11.”[89] Specifically, > the attacks of September 11th were intended to cover-up the clearing of $240 billion dollars in securities covertly created in September 1991 to fund a covert economic war against the Soviet Union, during which “unknown” western investors bought up much of the Soviet industry, with a focus on oil and gas. The attacks of September 11th also served to derail multiple Federal investigations away from crimes associated with the 1991 covert operation. In doing so, the attacks were justified

> under the cardinal rule of intelligence: "protect your resources" and consistent with a modus operandi of sacrificing lives for a greater cause.[90]

With this background, Heidner observes that the Office of Naval Investigation in the Pentagon was located precisely in the wing of the building where American Airlines flight 77 is stated in the official story to have struck the giant office structure.[91] Additionally, other major American brokerage houses appeared to have been the targets of the World Trade Center attacks, and here one begins to note the official story beginning to crumble:

> There were three major securities brokers in the World Trade Center: Cantor Fitzgerald, Eurobrokers and Garbon Inter Capital. On the morning of September 11, Flight 11 hit the North Tower at 8:46 right below the floors on which Cantor Fitzgerald was situated. Cantor Fitzgerald was the US largest securities dealer in the US [sic] and arguably the primary target. Shortly after that, a massive explosion went off just under the FBI offices in the North Tower on the 23rd floor, and Garbon Inter Capital on the 25th floor, and in the basement of Tower 1 as well. The explosion caused the 22nd through 25th floors above to collapse into an inferno. Fires were reported on the 22nd floor at 8:47. Shortly, thereafter, at 9:03, Flight 175 hit the South Tower right below the floors on which Euro Brokers was situated.[92]

It is worth noting that Heidner has also tied the FBI to the investigations of financial malfeasance being researched by the Office of Naval Intelligence.

So why the attacks? What financial malfeasance was so large that it would require such an operation to short circuit investigation and cover-up whatever was being covered-up? Heidner makes the following observations and statements:

> A critical mass of brokers from the major government security brokerages in the Twin Towers had to be eliminated to create chaos in the government securities market. A situation needed to be created wherein $240 billion dollars of covert securities could be electronically "cleared" without anyone asking questions—which happened when the

> Federal Reserve declared an emergency and invoked its "emergency powers," that very afternoon.[93]

Additionally, while there was less than a billion dollars of gold bullion in the vaults of the World Trade Center, there were "hundreds of billions of dollars of government securities" which "had to be destroyed."[94] There really are only a few options by which to interpret this remark. One is that the securities constituted legitimate securities that needed to be destroyed because the government had no intention of redeeming or clearing them. This would implicate the U.S. government directly in the planning of the attacks.

But the other interpretation, the one that makes more sense when considered against the backdrop of the Bearer Bonds Scandals, is that the securities represented a direct connection to the covert system of finance that was being used to fund black projects and covert operations, and that they needed to be destroyed lest that system—and the vast system of fraud propping it up—be exposed and destroyed. In this instance, the 9/11 operation becomes an operation of the that deep international extra-territorial "state" that we have detected thus far, and the possibility exists that it is an operation of many levels, with one faction penetrating the operation of another.

2. The Relationship to the Golden Lily Gold and Bearer Bonds Scandals

Why this is so is revealed by a closer look at the 9/11 operation itself. Heidner observes that this hidden system of finance was reliant not only upon the complicity of certain national central banks—or at the minimum, of certain people within those banks—but also upon certain very large commercial and international banks, each of which is involved in this international structure of covert finance, industrial scale fraud, and covert operations:

> By the end of the 1980s, the banks that had their agents in the (Office of Strategic Services) intelligence operations at the end of World War II were the banks that would be the dominant global players by 2001:
> - Morgan Guaranty Trust
> - Chase Manhattan
> - Citibank

- Deutschebank
- HSBC[96]

In other words, it is no longer even the central or prime banks that are the major financial powers, but rather, the intelligence network—the postwar nexus of the American, Euro-Fascist, and Japanese-Asian elites—that has penetrated these institutions to the extent of manipulating them for the purpose of this hidden system of finance. The consequence is almost too horrible to consider, but consider it we must, for the scale of financing evident thus far means that the fraudulent system of the breakaway civilization and the overworld civilization have now become hopelessly entangled, such that to end the one would be to imperil the other.

It is thus not surprising to discover that one of these prime banks, with a deep connection to the postwar Euro-Fascist component of the structure, Deutschebank, is one of the major sources "of the illegal stock options", the put options, "that indicated there was insider trading taking advantage of the September 11 tragedy."[97] Equally suspicious is the fact that its American CEO, Mayo Shattuck, was not only not at his office on the day of the attacks, but suddenly resigned without any explanations on the day after the tragedy.[98]

So what happened? Why were the attacks made? What do they have to do with the hidden system of finance and the breakaway civilization? Heidner's answer here is not only breathtaking, but heart-stopping, and hence, it is necessary to cite his remarks in toto:

> On the first day of the crisis, the (Securities and Exchange Commission) lifted "rule 15c3-3—Customer Protection—Reserves and Custody of Securities," which set trading rules for the following processes:

> The (seller) is not permitted to substitute other securities for those subject to this agreement and therefore must keep the (buyer's) securities segregated at all times, unless in this agreement the (buyer) grants the (seller) the right to substitute other securities....[99]

In other words, and simply put, the Government Securities Clearing Corporation "was allowed to substitute securities for the physical securities destroyed during the attack."[100]

However, there was more. The Government Securities Clearing Corporation issued an memorandum in the wake of the attacks that "…collateral substitutes can and should be made with regard to immediately maturing collateral."[101] In other words, the covert bonds were destroyed, and their holders were issued new paper once again. In effect, the whole fraudulent system was partially reset, and re-financed.

But it gets worse.

After this memorandum, the Government Securities Clearing Corporation issued yet another memo, this time authorizing and expanding what are called blind broker settlements.

> A "blind broker" is a mechanism for inter-dealer transactions that maintains the anonymity of both parties to the trade. The broker serves as the agent to the principals' transactions.
> > "The only repo transactions entered into by blind brokers should be those done in direct furtherance of clean-up and reconciliation efforts. Now new blind brokered business should be executed."
> At this point in time, the Federal Reserve and its (Government Securities Clearing Corporation) had created a settlement environment totally void of controls and reporting—where it could substitute valid, new government securities for the mature, illegal securities, and not have to record where the bad securities came from, or where the new securities went—all because the paper for the primary brokers for US securities had been eliminated.[102]

Ponder the implications of this conclusion, for not even Heidner, for all his careful research, appears to understand the wider implications of his remarks for the structure of the breakaway civilization, and what the 9/11 attacks indicate may be happening within it, even though he is acutely aware of the deep relationship of the attacks to the hidden covert financial structure enabled by the postwar detente with the Nazi International and the utilization of the Golden Lily loot. The implications are none other than that if the American component of this structure is having to substitute legitimate U.S. securities for the fraudulent ones, then it is under external factional pressure to do so.

Why would it be under such pressure?

One answer might lie in the fact that the American government agencies investigating the financial fraud that was by then too large to keep easily hidden were beginning to discover another aspect of the hidden system, namely, the outright theft of gold bullion. Heidner puts the point this way:

> …President George H.W. Bush had initiated a number of related covert operations to takeover certain sectors of the Soviet economy, and ten years later in 2001, these programs had finally come back to haunt the U.S. policy makers. Most, if not all of these programs appear to have stepped outside the boundaries of the law. As a result, investigative agencies from Britain, Switzerland, Russia, Kazakhstan and the Philippines were putting pressure on congress and the U.S. Department of Justice to open up the accounts in the banks used to finance these covert activities, which were being viewed as criminal activities in foreign courts. Alan Greenspan, the Treasury Department and key banks in the U.S. and Europe were being sued for gold-price fixing or illegal gold sales which appears to have (its) origins in the covert war chest used to wage this war. At the same time, the suits brought by the Holocaust survivors, victims of the Marcos regime, and the US Congress under influence of pro-Israeli lobbyists were putting pressure on the Swiss banking cartel to open (its) bullion records to public scrutiny. Full disclosure by these banks during an investigation would have resulted in a major exposure of U.S. Government complicity in some of the greatest financial fraud of the 1980s and early 1990s as well as 50 years of gold bullion theft by numerous U.S. and British government agencies.[103]

In reality, however, what would have been revealed by such exposure would not have been U.S. Government complicity, but something far most extensive, and much deeper, namely, the breakaway civilization itself, its network, resources, and methods. From the point of view of the breakaway civilization, it is not gold-price fixing or even stealing bullion, it is waging war, and its loyalties lie to itself, and not to the host nations—be they the U.K. or U.S.A.—at all.[104]

But what, precisely, was the real "crime" that had to be covered-up, in addition to "bullion theft" and "gold price fixing"?

Answer: the biggest covert operation of all time: the engineered economic collapse of a world superpower: the Soviet Union.

3. Covert War Against the Soviet Union

Heidner and others have documented a covert operation called Project Hammer, a plan many believe was formulated by Ronald Reagan's Director of the CIA, William Casey.[105] This project was nothing less than a "multi-billion dollar covert operation" involving shielded third world investments, and included four components:

1) the theft of all of the Soviet Union's gold bullion(!);
2) the destabilization of the ruble;
3) the funding of the August 1991 KGB Generals' coup against Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev; and last, but not least,
4) the corporatization, and subsequent take-over by agents of the western financial oligarchy, of key Russian energy and defense industries.[106]

The group within the administration of G.H.W. Bush executing this four-tiered covert operation called themselves the Vulcan Group, after the Roman god of war, utilizing the by-now familiar war chest made possible by all the re-hypothecated gold represented by the deal with Chiang Kai-Shek, the Golden Lily loot, and, of course, those monies from the Nazis laundered after the war through western banks, a "war chest invisible to congressional oversight."[107]

[104] Heidner notes that when government securities trading opened again in the wake of the attacks that at the first auction "the Federal Reserve did not have enough 'takers' of the new 10 year notes." (E. P. Heidner, "Collateral Damage: U.S. Covert Operations and the Terrorist Attacks on September 11, 2001," p. 30.) In other words, even the high players were no longer trusting the Federal Reserve. In this context, it is worth pondering the implications of the fact that the Bearer Bonds Scandals occur after 9/11. In any case, the financial aspects of 9/11 can be viewed as a partial re-set and reboot of the hidden system of finance and its spillover implications to the overworld. (Q.v. Heidner, p. 32.)

Key to the operation was a consultancy group based in Switzerland called the Riggs-Valmet group, established by President G.H.W. Bush.[108] Key to this operation were four Russian oligarchs: Mikhail Khordokovsky, who was of course one of the principal Russian oligarchs subsequently arrested and imprisoned by President Vladimir Putin, Alexander Konanykhine, Boris Beresovsky, and Roman Abramovich.[109] It was Khordokovsky who was "responsible for setting up the primary financial organization for taking over Russian oil and gas industries, as well as moving money out of the country: Bank Menatep."[110] To enable this vast covert war, President Bush was apparently behind the issuance of $240 billion dollars worth of secret bonds for the operation.[111]

As the first phase of this operation, Bush "authorized Leo Wanta and others to destabilize the ruble and facilitate the theft of the Soviet/Russian treasury. This would result in draining the Russian treasury of between 2,000 to 3,000 tonnes [sic] of gold bullion."[112] The bullion had to be stolen for the plan to destabilize the ruble depended upon the Soviets' inability to re-stabilize it via use of the bullion.

Once the bullion was literally stolen from the Soviet treasury, the assault on the ruble began, and the West began to push money back into Russia in a massive buy-out of Russian energy industries, while the fake coup was mounted against Gorbachev that brought Boris Yeltsin into power, who, like President Nursultan Nazarbayev of Kazakhstan were both in the pocket of Bush's Vulcan group. Since two out of three votes were required under the Soviet constitution to dissolve it, and since both men were complete puppets of the west and its oligarchs of the hidden finance, the outcome was predictable.[113]

> The coup actually seems to have been a long time in the making, with Yeltsin having discussed the coup with Bush during his visit to the > United States in June of 1991. That same summer, Yeltsin dined "discretely" with the Chairman of the New York Federal Reserve, Gerald Corrigan, while the rest of the Moscow mission dined with Gorbachev.[114]

Corrigan in turn was involved in the planned destabilization of the ruble, along with notorious currency speculator George Soros, and Ronald Lauder, an heir of the Este Lauder estate, and the N.M. Rothschild Continuation Trust, and the Bank of New York.[115]

It is the Bank of New York that is the connection that most readily identifies the 9/11 World Trade Center attacks as a covert war operation against the overworld financial center, an operation designed to cloak the hidden system of finance and its activities, and to maintain its integrity against growing pressures to expose it, for the Bank of New York, even though it had no physical facilities in the World Trade Center and was one of the major New York banks not directly involved in the attacks, was nevertheless the only major New York bank whose operations were severely disrupted on September 11, 2001. Indeed, during the week after 9/11, the Wall Street Journal reported that the Bank of New York was reported to be overdue "on $100 billion in payments."[116] But that is not all:

> The Deutschebank, which sat inside the World Trade Center and was totally decimated, reported no such account balance increase, and JP Morgan, the other of only two clearing banks which uses the same traders and communications hub, reported no such increase in its account balance. No one has publicly asked: why is it that these other two banks were not seriously disrupted, while the Bank of New York—which had no structural damage, seemed unable to operate?[117]

The problem was that the Bank of New York's communications facilities were located in Utica, N.Y.,[118] and were thus not anywhere near lower Manhattan at all. Why then was it alone of all the major New York banks having such difficulties in clearing?

Heidner's answer is chilling:

> In a reported setting of half truths and speculations by Federal Reserve analysts made to appear as facts, review of the reports of the financial aftermath of September 11th suggest:
> - The disruptions to the U.S. financial system were not as widespread as the reports from the Federal reserve would have the public believe, but that the public had to be made to perceive a widespread need for declaring a national financial emergency, suspending key provisions of the Federal Reserve Act and driving the "ten-year special rate" to almost zero.
> - Certain key unknown figures in the Federal Reserve may have "conspired" with key unknown figures at the Bank of New York to create a situation where $240 billion in off balance sheet securities created in 1991 as part of an official covert operation to overthrow the Soviet Union, could be cleared without publicly acknowledging their existence.
> - These securities, originally managed by Cantor Fitzgerald, were clear and settled in the aftermath of September 11th through the (Bank of New York). The $100 billion account balance bubble reported by the Wall Street Journal as being experienced in the (Bank of New York) was the tip of a three day operation, when these securities were moved from off-balance-sheet to the balance sheet…
> - By reducing the "ten-year special rate" to almost zero, the Fed structurally increased the number of refinancing (Repo) settlement fails. Under the umbrella of this artificially created statistical bump of fails, the high level of fails due to the laundering of the $240 billion was able to be processed unnoticed.
> - The cover for this bubble is found in the footnotes to the (Bank of New York) annual and quarterly reports, which report that the (Bank of New York) took over $330 billion of commercial securities business from U.S. Trust between June and October 0f 2001, although the assets under control of U.S. Trust in 2000 were reported by two sources as $80 or $86 billion.[119]

Succinctly put, there was no real financial emergency other than the need to create a large enough emergency of a different sort, in order to clear the false securities completely from the books, and replace them with new paper. It was a grizzly example of misdirection and sleight of hand.

At the deepest level, 9/11 was a work of the breakaway civilization, and of its major structural components. And as for the prelude operation to 9/11—the collapse of the Soviet Union—Claire Sterling put it best:

[119] E. P. Heidner, "Collateral Damage: U.S. Covert Operations and the Terrorist Attacks on September 11, 2001," p. 32.

"The ability of three or four characters to mount such a planet wide operation, their extraordinary impact on what was still a world superpower, and their singular immunity from beginning to end suggest the guiding hand of not just one, but several intelligence agencies."[120] Put differently, it was the act of an international extra-territorial state against one of its host countries.

D. Conclusions and The Technological Transition

What we have now discovered is a vast covert operations slush fund, a hidden fund, involving billions of dollars in securities and stolen and re-hypothecated bullion, one based upon the permanence or semi-permanence of financial fraud and terrorism as its operative principles, in keeping with the total culture of total power. But there is hovering in the background an unresolved question, namely, that the scale of financial fraud implicated in the Bearer Bonds Scandals is in the trillions, not billions of dollars. In other words, something else lurks in the portfolio, something not yet accounted for.

In the 9/11 scenario thus far portrayed, we have not yet dealt with the technologies implied by some aspects of the operation. In doing so, as we will discover, there may be yet other hidden players revealed. But some aspects of this technological side of the financial equation, and its connection to covert operations, may be gleaned by a look back, once again, at Operation Northwoods, the 1960s Pentagon plan to commit false flag terrorist attacks on Americans to justify an invasion of Cuba. Once again, Richard Cottrell pries open the door:

> Northwoods included the archly cynical operation Dirty trick, a plot to blame Castro if the 1962 Mercury space shot carrying John Glenn crashed: "The objective is to provide irrevocable proof that, should the Mercury manned orbit flight fail, the fault lies with the Communists et al Cuba. This to be accomplished by manufacturing various pieces of evidence which would prove electronic interference on the part of the Cubans." Composed by Brigadier General Bill Craig and sent on 2nd February 1962 to his boss General Edward Lansdale, who oversaw the > long (and completely fruitless) Cuban destabilisation programme called Operation Mongoose.[121]

With the mention of space-based or space-connected covert operations, we are now entering the technological aspect of the breakaway civilization and culture, to the invention and operational use of the technologies of plausible deniability. For these sorts of operations and technologies, one would indeed need trillions of dollars in totally untraceable funding. Indeed, in the early years of the Cold War, and even until today, there are indicators that sabotage of Soviet space efforts may have been undertaken by the West…

…and by "someone else" against both the Soviet bloc and the West.

But first before we venture into outer space, we must first get a grip on the earth, as Nikola Tesla said.[122]

KARDASHEV'S CLASSES AND COVERT CONFLICT, PART ONE:

ENGINEERING THE TECHNOLOGIES OF PLAUSIBLY DENIABLE MASS DESTRUCTION

"Others are engaging even in an eco-type of terrorism whereby they can alter the climate, set off earthquakes, volcanoes remotely through the use of electromagnetic waves.
"So there are plenty of ingenious minds out there that are at work finding ways in which they can wreak terror upon other nations. It's real, and that's the reason why we have to intensify our efforts."
William S. Cohen, U.S. Secretary of Defense, 1997[1]

"Mother Nature gives great plausible deniability."
Jerry Smith[2]

Imagine, if you will, a conjunction of technologies and agendas: suppose there was a secret technology to manipulate the weather, to create earthquakes, even perhaps to manipulate or influence mass coronal ejecta from the Sun. Such, in effect, is what former U.S. Secretary of Defense William S. Cohen, cited in the first epigraph above, would not only have us imagine, but he would also have us imagine something else, something subtly implied by his unusually revealing choice of words. "There are," he says, "plenty of ingenious minds out there that are at work finding ways in which they can wreak terror upon other nations." They are, to use the Secretary's own choice of words, simply, "others." Not other nations, just others. The words are oddly ambiguous, and moreover, if taken at face value, Cohen is implying that a whole host of technologies to control the planet's weather systems, to set off earthquakes or fire up volcanoes, are in the hands of these "others" and that, accordingly "that's the reason why we have to intensify our efforts," presumably to acquire the same technology as the "others." As we shall discover in this chapter, there is a case that indeed there were "others", at least in the Soviet Union, working on such things, but we shall also discover an odd Soviet-American cooperation in precisely this technology, implying not only that the two superpowers may have been waging a covert warfare against each other under the cover of mother nature, but that they may both have been more concerned about "others."

---

[1] Jerry Smith, Weather Warfare: The Military's Plan to Draft Mother Nature(Adventures Unlimited Press, 2006), p. i. Q.v. http://www.defense.gov/transcripts/transcript.aspx?transcriptid=674.

[2] Ibid., p. vi.

Suppose for a moment, that the "others" are the same international groups that we have found connected to the hidden system of finance: intelligence agencies and agents, NATO covert operations cells, interfaces with International Fascism and drug syndicates, and the Anglo-American financial-military-industrial-intelligence complex. Imagine this technology is then in the hands of the same factions that know about the hidden system of finance, factions with connections to the financial oligarchy. How would one confirm the existence of this strange nexus?

One method to search for such linkages would be to look for massive and strange anomalous securities or currency activities preceding or shortly succeeding "natural" disasters. One would have to determine, firstly, if such technologies existed, and by implication, how far back in history they could be traced; secondly, how these technologies are thought to work and therefore what sorts of signatures they might show; and thirdly, if any peculiar financial activity preceded such events, indicating foreknowledge on the part of those behind such activities, implicating them in the knowledge and control of such technologies, or alternatively, if there are any documentable connections between these factions and the technologies themselves. In the remainder of this book we will discuss three events from this methodological point of view: the Indonesian tsunami, the Fukushima "earthquake" and "tsunami", and the destruction of the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center on 9/11.

But first we must have a working grasp of the technologies themselves and the military and geopolitical doctrines they compel.

A. The Total Culture of Total Power and Control, and the Doctrine of Full Spectrum Dominance

In the preface I noted that the Kardashev system of civilization classification according to energy requirements also implied the technological corollary of being able to manipulate the very systems its required for energy. Thus, a class one civilization implied the technology to manipulate a planet, or at least, systems on a planetary scale; a class two civilization implied the ability to manipulate a star and its systems, while, finally, a class three civilization implied the ability to manipulate a galaxy and its systems. As noted in the preface, the UFO phenomenon implies at least class one capabilities.

The theoretical achievement of such technological capabilities, even at a class one level, would result in a new military doctrine, that of "Full Spectrum Dominance," and in turn, both doctrine and technologies would engender a new geopolitical imperative.

With the collapse of the Soviet Union, a collapse aided and abetted, if not engineered, by the covert system of finance and the factions that controlled it, the Anglo-American core of this breakaway civilization moved quickly to a posture of attempting to dominate the entire planet. This attempt was manifest in the U.S. Pentagon's doctrine of Full Spectrum Dominance, "and as its name implied, its agenda was to control everything everywhere including the high seas, land, air, space and even outer space and cyber space."[3] It is important to note that the implied basis of the sought-after domination was technological: "The strategists of Full Spectrum Dominance envisioned control of pretty much the entire universe, including outer and inner-space, from the galaxy to the mind."[4] Full Spectrum Dominance, in other words, means nothing less than the domination of every potential theater of war via the achievement and maintenance of technological superiority in those theaters, whether that theater is the human mind, planet Earth, nearby local terrestrial space, or, outer space. The corollary of this doctrine is the doctrine so-called Escalation Dominance, the "ability to win a war at any level of violence, including nuclear war."[5]

While this certainly follows from the idea that one can only dominate any potential theater of operations via technological means, it also means that technological end-runs around nuclear weapons—strategic weapons of much more destructive potential with much less blowback cost to their user—would be sought as the ultimate means of "Escalation Dominance," weapons moreover that could be deployed with plausible deniability, masking themselves as acts of God or nature. By the nature of the case, these would be weapons capable of manipulating systems on the planetary scale, of weaponizing planet Earth herself, her weather and geodetic features. When allied with the covert operations and hidden system of finance, the doctrine is a recipe for perpetual warfare.[6]

[3] F. William Engdahl, Full Spectrum Dominance: Totalitarian Democracy in the New World Order (Progressive Press, 2011), p. vii.

[4] Ibid., p. 55. Engdahl also observed that the cornerstone of this strategy was the control of energy via the "big Four Anglo-American private oil giants = ChevronTexaco(sic), ExxonMobil, BP and Royal Dutch Shell…". The question is, how would control of the Earth's petroleum lead necessarily to the idea of controlling everything from the mind to the galactic reaches of outer space, which no conventional petroleum-based technology is even remotely capable of reaching? The answer to this question lies, as we shall see later in this chapter, in the geopolitical imperatives implies by the new technology.

[5] Ibid., p. 142.

Indeed, covert operations forms one of the foundations for this perpetual warfare doctrine, for with hidden systems of finance to support it, one's own, or one's purported enemies, now assumed a "non-local" characteristic, for an enemy could be "everywhere and nowhere"[7] permitting a great latitude for the breakaway civilization to conduct operations free of the normal constraints of the overworld's civilizations and laws with which it is connected.[8]

As already noted, the "total culture of total power" spawned a doctrine of full spectrum dominance, i.e., the idea that Pentagonia would have to seek and develop the technologies and techniques of dominance of every operational field of potential conflict, including not only planetary systems, but the decision-making and interpretive processes of the mind itself. This began in a fashion that once again highlights the deep parapolitical structure and interface between high finance, intelligence, and the scientific world, for "Beginning in the 1950s, for example, with covert funding from Nelson Rockefeller's Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the CIA engaged in a program given the code name 'MK-ULTRA.'"[9] Rockefeller not only channeled government funds from his department to the secret CIA program, but MK-Ultra was "secretly co-funded by the Rockefeller Foundation" as well as by "funds specifically earmarked for MK-ULTRA from projects by Nelson Rockefeller—then President Eisenhower's Under Secretary for Health, Education and Welfare and later his Special Assistant Cold War Strategy and Psychological Warfare."[10] In other words, by funding such projects privately, the financial faction was also buying an interest in whatever technologies and techniques as could be gained from the project.[11]

[6] See Engdahl, Full Spectrum Dominance: Totalitarian Democracy in the New World Order, pp. 77-78, for a review of the Pentagon's preparations for "perpetual resource warfare." It is worth noting that during an interview I had with Mr. Whitley Strieber in the summer of 2012, that Mr. Strieber related a story told to him by one of his contacts within the American military-industrial complex, namely, that if one ever initiated a hostile action against the so-called grays—i.e., started a war with them—they would never let one win, nor lose; it would simply mean perpetual war. If true, this strongly suggests a spiritual component to the phenomenon which would in turn suggest that the breakaway civilization has some sort of experience in this regard, and that the perpetual resource warfare may be a disguise for something else. While this may appear totally implausible at first reading, given the technological capabilities that we will explore in the rest of this book and the geopolitical imperatives created by the capabilities to weaponize planet Earth and its systems themselves, these technologies by the nature of the case imply tremendous new energy sources, rendering the long term need to dominate resources moot, and therefore presenting the possibility that this is a deep layer of disinformation of its own.

[7] Ibid., p. vi. Engdahl makes this observation specifically in reference to the events of 9/11.

[8] An example of this would be the formation of the American Security Council (ASC) whose members, Engdahl notes, included Walt Disney, Averell Harriman, Senator Henry "Scoop" Jackson, General Douglas MacArthur, US House Speaker Sam Rayburn, Eisenhower's National security Advisor and Latin America CIA director Nelson Reckefeller, and so on.(Engdalh, op. cit., p. 182.) As Engdalh observes, the ASC spun off other decidedly pro-axis groups, such as the America First committee, headed by General Robert E. Wood, Chairman of Sear, Roebuck, and Co.(Engdalh, op. cit., p. 183.) and the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, which "sponsored various racist and eugenics causes"(Ibid.).

As similar pattern was in evidence in space affairs.

Dr Richard C. Cook was a NASA analyst at the time of the space shuttle Challenger disaster of 1986, and had testified to Congress concerning the faulty O-rings that were ultimately sited in the official reports as the cause of the disaster. For Cook, the chief cause lay in something much deeper than engineering deficiencies in the O-ring; it lay in the mingling of civilian and military objectives within NASA.[12] Cook lay the ultimate cause at the feet of President Reagan's "Star Wars" nuclear missile defense system:

[9] Engdahl, Full Spectrum Dominance, p. 38.

[10] Ibid.

[11] Rosalie Bertell, in her Planet Earth: the Latest Weapon of War (The Women's Press, 2000), p. 103 notes that during a press release given on 30 May 2000, US Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman General Henry H. Shelton stated that one crucial component of the doctrine of full spectrum dominance includes the use of "deception to 'defend decision-making processes by neutralizing an adversary's perception management and intelligence collection efforts.' Faced with such obscure language, the lay reader can only speculate as to what this might entail. The press release concluded that information warfare will become as important as 'that conducted in the domains of land, air and space.' China's military also has stated that it intends to make information warfare a capability equal in stature to its army, navy and air forces."

[12] Engdahl, op. cit.., p. 146.

> …(It) was not until after the presidential commission which investigated the disaster completed its work that I learned why NASA kept flying shuttle missions after the worst damage to date had occurred on the seals during a January 1985 cold-weather flight, a full year before Challenger blew up. It was because a launch commit criterion for joint temperature could interfere with the military flights NASA planned to launch for the Air Force out of Vandenberg Air force base in California, where the weather tended to be cooler than in Florida. Many of these flights were to carry 'Star Wars experiments in preparation for possible future deployment of 'third-generation' nuclear weapons, such as the x-ray laser.[13]

At the time, an x-ray laser consisted of a bundle of special rods designed to produce a cohered beam of high frequency x-rays, like a laser beam, which would be set off by an atom bomb, thus consuming the weapon in a "one use" scenario. Ostensibly, the x-ray laser was for the purpose of shooting down Soviet missiles at distance through the atmosphere, since they would generate the enormous amounts of energy needed to vaporize the targets. But consider: such a weapon, really, is more offensive than defensive in nature, for with sufficient size and phase conjugation, it could be used offensively against strategic ground targets. In effect, such third generation nuclear weapons made the ICBM obsolescent, and gave its possessors a technological capability that did an end-run around the strategic thermonuclear arsenals of the two super-powers and the other nuclear powers.[14]

But, there was more, for in the wake of the G.W. Bush Administration decision in 2006 to allow the weaponization of space and its unilateral withdrawal from the American-Soviet treaties pledging not to do so, and its decision to press ahead with new Moon and Mars programs, the game, according to Cook, changed:

> To date, the principal beneficiary of the moon-Mars [sic] program is Lockheed Martin, to which NASA awarded a prime contract with a potential value stated at $8.15 billion. Already the world's largest defense contractor, Lockheed Martin's stock yielded an instant bonanza, rising more than seven percent in the five weeks following NASA's August 2996 announcement.

[13] Engdahl, Full Spectrum Dominance, p. 147, emphasis added.

[14] These technological advances may also explain why the two super-powers so drastically curtailed their strategic missile systems in the aftermath of the Soviet collapse; in short, their impending obsolescence made them inefficient weapons systems to maintain.

> NASA is not paying the giant of the military-industrial complex $8.15 billion to have people hop around and hit golf balls on the moon. The aim of the moon-Mars program is US dominance, as suggested by NASA Administrator Michael Griffin's statements that 'my language'—i.e., English—and not those of 'another, bolder or more persistent culture will be passed down over the generations to future lunar colonies.'[15]

In other words, again, the pattern of high finance and corporate dominance of a technological capability, independent of its "overseeing" government, looms large.

But Cook went on to detail in a private communication with researcher F. William Engdahl yet another concern:

> I believe that the US Establishment is in fact planning a nuclear first strike on Russia. There is a profound split within the US military, however, in that the Army and Navy and elements of the Air Force still view their job as a defensive force to secure the safety of the United States. The element of the military which aims for world conquest, even through a (nuclear) first strike, includes higher echelons of the Air Force, the Missile Defense Agency, and that part of the civilian (Pentagon) leadership most aligned with the powerful financial forces that are the real overseers of the country.[16]

Factional infighting—in this case within elements of the military component, and the financial one—could, and according to Cook indeed were occurring in the 1980s. Such infighting is, in a sense, the inevitable result of the tensions between those:

1) who know how to make or build the technology, i.e., the scientific and engineering component;
2) who know how to deploy or use the technology, i.e., the military component; and,
3) who claim partial ownership or interest in the technology by dint of having funded it, namely, the financial interests.

Technologies such as the x-ray laser represented a real potential for those knowing how to build and deploy such technologies to break away not only from their 'overseers' in government but from their presumed financial masters. Citing a massive four-volume study of future weapons technologies commissioned by the US Air Force Chief of Staff in 1995-96 entitled Air Force 2025, Engdahl observes that the technologies referred to in the study "were considered the systems necessary" for the United States to remain the world's dominant air and space power.[17] One such system was an orbital bombardment platform launching small solid projectiles which would be used to "penetrate the earth to a depth of half a mile" in order to destroy underground bunkers and other targets.[18] Yet another system was a space-based laser cannon, which would not only be capable of attacking "ground or airborne targets by melting or cracking cockpit canopies, burning through control cables, exploding fuel tanks… exploding or melting munitions pods" and so on, but also of "burning a large variety of strategic targets," which could be anything from "damns, industrial and defense facilities and munitions factories," and all of this "in a fraction of a second."[19] Let it be noted that such a laser cannon is hardly a defensive weapon, but rather, an offensive one and a strategic one at that, since it is capable of pinpoint mass destruction in an instant and, unlike a nuclear bomb, presumably re-useable. Let it also be noted that robotic technologies would, in turn, allow the deployment of such weaponry in deep space against potential targets not even on this planet.

Bertell also notes that "According to Defense News, 13-19 April 1992, the US deployed an electromagnetic pulse weapon (EMP)" during Operation Desert Storm that was "designed to mimic the flash of electricity from a nuclear bomb" and which is "capable of knocking out communications over a wide area."(p. 100). A much more powerful version of this system, called Hermes III is based at the Sandia National Laboratory in New Mexico, and "is capable for producing 20 trillion watt pulses lasting 20 billionths to 25 billionths of a second…"(p. 100). The US military also discovered that using phased array over-the-horizon radars known as PAVE PAWS (Precision Acquisition Vehicle re-Entry Phased Array Warning System) could crash airplanes or launch or explode the a military aircraft's missiles.(pp. 101-102). Significantly, the USA's HAARP (High Altitude Auroral Research Project), and Europe's/Germany's EISCAT are both such phased arrays.

Colonel of the US Air Force who directed the US Government's early anti-missile defense effort when it was still top secret…".[20] Bowman comments on the implication of the Air Force 2025 study by noting that it mirrored

> …the results of studies we performed in the 1970s and early 1980s. The difference is that then we considered the results sufficient reason to continue our national policy of keeping weapons out of space, while now they entice the hawks into discarding treaty constraints and pursuing a still more total form of absolute military superiority. Bush's first budget quadrupled the spending on laser battle stations. in his new budget, he gives the space warriors an essentially blank check. Now he has once again renamed and reorganized the Pentagon office doing 'Star Wars.'
> Under Reagan and Bush I, it was the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization (SDIO). Under Clinton, it became the Ballistic Missile Defense Organization (BMDO). Now Bush II had made it the Missile Defense Agency (MDA) and given it the freedom from oversight and audit previously enjoyed only by the black programs. If Congress doesn't act soon, this new independent agency may take their essentially unlimited budget and spend it outside of public and Congressional scrutiny on weapons we won't know anything about until they're in space. In theory, then, the space warriors would rule the world, able to destroy any target on earth without warning.[21]

It should be evident by now that, given the extensive financing represented in previous chapters, that the likelihood is that these technologies were already developed and most likely deployed, again without oversight. The Air Force 2025 study was merely announcing their existence, and, pace Bowman, announcing the very distinct possibility that these technologies now constituted something utterly outside the normal channels of oversight, and hence the "military arm" of a breakaway civilization.

B. Weaponizing Planet Earth:
The Technologies of Geophysical Warfare and the Achievement of Kardashev Class One Civilization Capabilities
1. Weather Warfare

Frightening as these inventories and capabilities are, however, they pale by comparison to those which weaponize planet Earth herself, weapons that indicate most clearly that a very small segment of humanity has truly broken away from the rest, and pulled ahead of the civilization the vast bulk of us live in. Former Carter Administration national security advisor, and geopolitical guru Zbigniew Brzezinkski noted this overall trend within human civilization as one component, by dint of the acquisition of these types of breathtaking capabilities began to pull away from the rest of humanity, a phenomenon he called the "technetronic revolution":

> The cumulative effect of the technetronic revolution is contradictory. On the one hand, this revolution marks the beginnings of a global community; on the other hand, it fragments humanity and detaches it from its traditional moorings. The technetronic revolution is widening the spectrum of the human condition… The result could be a profound three-way split in the attitudes and views of mankind. The coexistence of agrarian, industrial, and new technetronic societies, each providing different perspectives on life, would make understanding more difficult at the very time it becomes more possible, and it would render the global acceptance of certain norms less likely even as it becomes more imperative.[22]

Just what are these technological capabilities that would introduce such a split? They are, as Brzezinski avers, mostly military in nature:

> In addition to improved rocketry, multi-missiles, and more powerful and more accurate bombs, future developments may well include automated or manned space warships, deep-sea installations, chemical and biological weapons, death rays, and still other forms of warfare—even the weather may be tampered with. These new weapons could either encourage expectations of one-sided, relatively "inexpensive" victory; permit proxy contests that will be decisive in their strategic political outcome but will be fought by only a few human beings… or even by robots in outer space; or simply create such mutual instability > that the breakdown of peace will become inevitable, in spite of man's rational recognition of the futility of war.[23]

---

Brzezinski foresaw the consequences of technological developments almost forty years ago when he first wrote Between Two Ages, developments that, with the capability of manipulating the weather itself—which is ultimately, let it be recalled, a planetary system and therefore on the cusp of Civilization One class capabilities—would allow one, as the late Jerry Smith observe, to conduct "war covertly by causing droughts, storms, volcanic eruptions and floods" and thus raising the question "how would the general public know if such a war were being fought?"[24]

The question is a profound one, and implies the methodology we must pursue: One would have to have a knowledge of the basic principles and deployment capabilities of such technologies, of their signatures, and of corresponding political and economic activity. This may seem an absurd conjunction of concepts, even though we have earlier hinted at it. Jerry Smith points out, however, that the language of the U.S. military itself commits the same kind of Freudian slip, and in doing so, may be signaling not only the existence of the breakaway civilization, but who some of its ultimate masters may be, for the Air Force 2025 study referred to earlier actually contains a paper entitled Weather as a Force Multiplier: Owning the Weather in 2025.[25] The opening statements of this particular paper carry their own weighty implications for this methodology:

> In 2025, US aerospace forces can 'own the weather' by capitalizing on emerging technologies and focusing development of those technologies to war-fighting applications. Such a capability offers the war fighter tools to shape the battlespace in ways never before possible. It provides opportunities to impact operations across the full spectrum of conflict and is pertinent to all possible futures. The purpose of this paper is to outline a strategy for the use of a future weather-modification system to achieve military objectives.[26]

[25] Ibid., p. xix, emphasis added.

[26] Ibid., pp. xix-xx.

There are two senses in which weather modification capabilities can be considered a force multiplier: (1) in a "soft" sense, such as creating weather conditions to interfere with an enemy's formations and operational plans, while creating weather conditions to optimize one's own, or (2) using weather itself directly as a weapon to destroy strategic enemy targets.

More importantly, however, in both senses of weather modification as a force multiplier, one would look for the coincidence of weather phenomena with political and/or military and/or economic objectives being achieved or inhibited. Consequently, the ability to control weather may conveniently explain why, now, there is a new kind of financial security being offered in various markets: the weather derivative, and as we shall see, there are even darker capabilities hinted at in the literature. For example,

> In 1996, Russian space and weather-control scientists hooked up with Gianfranco Bisiacchi, then head of Mexico's space efforts, and founded Electrificación Local de la Atmosfera Terrestre (ELAT). Nominal results from the three ground stations set up be ELAT in 1998 were so impressive—rainfall was reported to increase by as much as 30%—that Mexican state governments were soon clamoring for more facilities…
> ELAT claims credit for ending the severe drought in Northern Mexico. Since 2000, says Bisiacchi, the amount of annual rain in the region has been "30% to 35% greater than what it was during the 1990s. In fact, the lakes of the region that were dry are now full."[27]

This was accomplished not by the usual methods of cloud seeding, but by generating charged ions at the ground based stations and then beaming them into the atmosphere. "That, they claim, fosters clumping on both airborne dust particles and ice crystals touched by a charged ion."[28] Bear this basic electromagnetic concept in mind, for we shall be returning to it, for basically it implies the ability to create weather systems.

2. Steering Hurricanes

But one may also envision the technologies and techniques of steering large naturally occurring systems as well, and this again implies a class one civilization capability in the sense that such large weather systems are planetary phenomena. Smith notes that the effort "to steer or reduce the force of hurricanes" became a concern after World War Two, for the relatively benign purpose of protecting people and property.[29] Of course, this would imply the ability to increase the force of hurricanes and to steer them for offensive purposes.[30] One scientific paper, "Controlling Hurricanes—Can Hurricanes and Other Severe Tropical Storms Be Moderated or Deflected?" by Dr. Ross N. Hoffman, a "member of several NASA science teams,"[31] makes these possibilities distinctly clear:

[27] Jerry E. Smith, Weather Warfare, p. 30.

[28] Ibid.

> But must these fearful forces of nature be forever beyond our control? My research colleagues and I think not. Our team is investigating how we might learn to nudge hurricanes onto more benign paths or otherwise defuse them. Although this bold goal probably lies decades in the future, we think our results show that it is not too early to study the possibilities.
> … What is more, it turns out the very thing that makes forecasting any weather difficult—the atmosphere's extreme sensitivity to small stimuli—may well be the key to achieving the control we seek. our first attempt at influencing the course of a simulated hurricane by making minor changes to the storm's initial state, for example, proved remarkably successful, and the subsequent results have continued to look favorable, too.[32]

In the light of the confident military predictions already surveyed, and in the light of technologies and curious "coincidences" to be outlined later in this chapter, I strongly believe that the goal lies not "decades in the future," but that it has been already achieved.

[29] Jerry E. Smith*, Weather Warfare*, p. 39.

[30] Ibid., p. 51: Smith states: "Clearly if one can steer a hurricane away from a population center one can, using the exact same technology, steer it into one." Additionally, if one can defuse or weaken a storm via any such technological means, one could increase the intensity of a system as well.

[31] Ibid.

[32] Ibid., pp. 40-41, emphasis added. Smith notes the first American military attempt to control a hurricane actually occurred in 1947(a significant year it seems), with Project Cirrus, which seeded a hurricane with 176 pounds of dry ice. After the seeding occurred, the hurricane "abruptly changed direction and came on shore near Savanna, Georgia, where it did extensive damage to property and causing two fatalities. In what has since become almost standard procedure, the U.S. military classified the data from the seeding of this hurricane to frustrate litigation."(p. 42). But I would suggest, additionally, that the data was classified for another reason as well, namely, that the scientists in charge of the project had determined some correlation between the seeding and the direction of the hurricane, which implied the ability to steer the storm.

The signal indicator here is the acknowledgement that but "minor changes" to the initial systems state can result in significant amplified effects both as to the intensity and duration of a storm but also its direction. This defines the key feature of the militarization of planetary systems, for as Dr. Gordon J.F. Macdonald put it, "The key to geophysical warfare is the identification of environmental instabilities to which the addition of a small amount of energy would release vastly greater amounts of energy."[33] This means that the fundamental energy and steerage considerations are in the nature of non-linear physics. Dr. Ross N. Hoffman, to whose paper on the steerage of hurricanes we have already referred, observes that the key—like Sam Israel's "Forward Propagation program" outlined in part one—lies in the ability to make successful non-linear equation predictions of what occurs when one modifies an initial system state just enough that the introduced modification develops a feed-back loop to propagate throughout the system:

> We have modified for our experiments a highly effective forecast initialization system called four-dimensional variational data assimilation (4DVAR). the fourth dimension to which the name refers is time…
> After simulating a hurricane that occurred in the past, we can then change one or more of its characteristics at any given time and examine the effects of these perturbations. It turns out that most such alterations simply die out. Only interventions with special characteristics—a particular pattern or structure that induces self-reinforcement—will develop sufficiently to have a major effect on a storm… To explore whether the sensitivity of the atmospheric system could be exploited to modify atmospheric phenomena as powerful as hurricanes, our research group… conducted computer simulation experiments for two hurricanes that occurred in 1992. When Hurricane Iniki passed over the Hawaiian island of Kauai in September of that year, several people died, property damage was enormous and entire forests were leveled. Hurricane Andrew, which struck Florida just south of Miami the month before, left the region devastated.
> Surprisingly, given the imperfections of existing forecasting technologies, our first simulation experiment was an immediate > success. To alter the path of Iniki, we first chose where we wanted the storm to end up after six hours—about 60 miles west of the expected track. Then we used this target to create artificial observations and fed these into 4DVAR. We set the computer to calculate the smallest change to the initial set of the hurricane's key defining properties that would yield a track leading to the target location.

> Although the original and altered versions of Hurricane Iniki looked nearly identical in structure, the changes in key variable were large enough that the latter veered off to the west for the first six hours of the simulation and then traveled due north, so that Kauai escaped the storm's most damaging winds. The relatively small, artificial alterations to the storm's initial conditions had propagated through the complex set of nonlinear equations that simulated the storm to result in the desired relocation after six hours.[34]

Nonlinear equations and nonlinear systems propagation and feedback loops, however, are but three of the physics conceptions that we must bear in mind in the militarization of geophysical systems. The other conception we must also scrutinize is the standard explanation that storm systems such as hurricanes or tornados are exclusively thermodynamic, rather than electromagnetic-thermodynamic systems, and to do this, we must have a closer look at tornados as electro-dynamic systems, and to the possibilities of weather weaponization this affords.

3. Tinkering with Tornados[35]

The standard academic meteorological view of the formation of tornadoes is that they are formed solely and exclusively by thermodynamic processes. As a boy, and growing up in the midwest, I grew up with pictures of the oftentimes strange and bizarre damage that tornadoes left in their wake, and quickly concluded that the standard thermodynamic explanations left a lot to be desired, as they seemed to have been formed on the basis of a consideration of only part of the evidence, and then using the model formed on that basis—the thermodynamic one—to explain the rest of the evidence, or rather, to explain it away.

[34] Jerry E. Smith, Weather Warfare, pp. 51-53, emphasis added.

[35] This section of this chapter originally appeared in slightly different form as a white paper in the members' subscription area on my website, entitled "Tinkering with Tornadoes: The Implications of the Electromagnetic Theory."

As a young man, I entertained the idea that tornadoes were electromagnetic phenomena chiefly, though not exclusively, and that opinion has not changed. Finally, however, I am moved to write on some of my observations over the years, largely because I have found, finally, an article that I think is worthy of consideration. I am also moved to write about this theory because of the spate of questions flowing on the internet in the wake of the devastating outburst of tornados that left devastation in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and Joplin, Missouri. That devastation has prompted speculation that this outburst was the product of a technology being deliberately applied, speculation that was not helped by the statements of Russian political leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky the same week, to the effect that Russia had devastating weapons that could, among other things, engineer the weather.

The importance of the electromagnetic theory of tornado formation is thus immediately obvious, for such a basis of formation would also conceivably allow a technology to do the following things, each of which implies an increasing level of technological development and sophistication in its application:

1) To steer the storm by creations of cyclonic systems;
2) To damp, ameliorate, or even dissipate a tornadic storm;
3) To increase, intensify or strengthen a tornadic storm;
4) To create the storm whole cloth, and to steer, or target it.

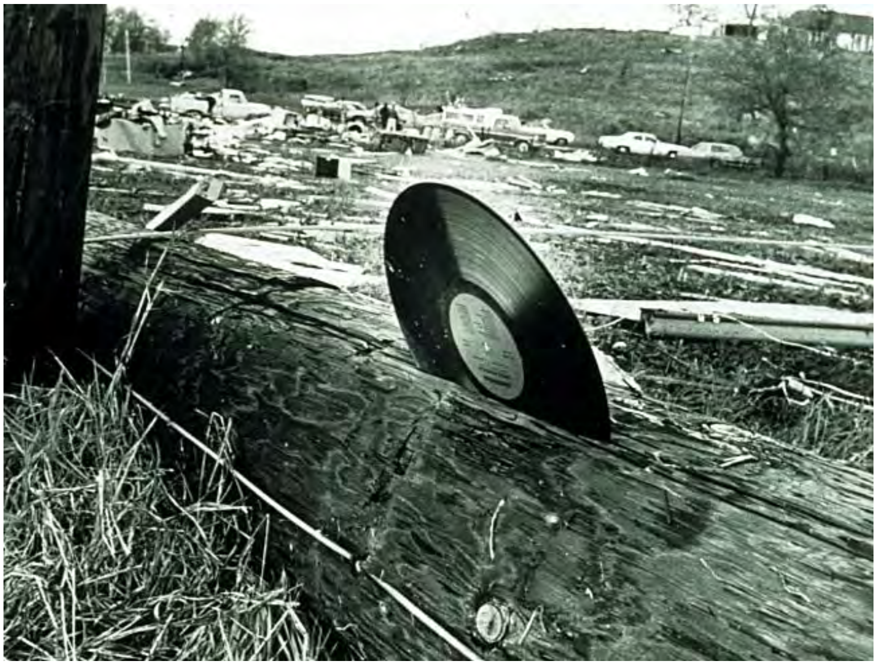
In this section we shall consider:

1) some classes of evidence overlooked by the thermodynamic theory, based on the paper "Observations on the Electromagnetic Nature of Tornadic Supercell Thunderstorms" by Charles L. Chandler, a paper I recommend,
2) connections suggested by that evidence, that Mr. Chandler does not pursue or invoke,
3) an outline of his theory of the electromagnetic nature of tornadoes, and
4) the implications of that theory for the creation of a tornado-engineering technology in connection with other technologies and principles outlined in the remainder of this chapter.

a. Some Classes of Evidence Overlooked by the Thermodynamic Theory

(1) Embedded Objects

Consider the following familiar type of tornado damage, where one object is embedded in another (typically a tree or telephone pole, but not always):



Record in Tree
wea00226, NOAA's National Weather Service (NWS) Collection[36]

The most obvious explanation for such phenomena is that such objects are literally driven by high velocity winds into trees and so on, and the latter made perhaps slightly more "porous" by dint of the extreme low pressures caused by tornadoes as they pass by. This indeed seems to be the most sensible explanation.

(2) Levitating, or Suctioned, Cars and People?

The suction-dynamic explanation is also a favorite explanation for the phenomenon of the levitation of cars, but it is precisely here, reasons Chandler, that problems begin to surface. Chandler states this belief in the following fashion: "Tornadoes are suction vortexes, and the general public has come to think of them as giant vacuum cleaner hoses that can pick up large objects in precisely the same manner as a household vacuum cleaner picks up small objects." Here it is important to distinguish between motion inside, and outside, the actual tornado vortex.

First, noting the levitation of objects—typically vehicles—outside the vortex, Chandler is worth citing at length:

> Then there is a different type of levitation that sometimes occurs outside of the vortex. Scientists have not applied any critical scrutiny to these reports, and the common "explanation" is flatly absurd. A tornado was nearby; tornadoes are suction vortexes; things were picked up; any questions? Yet outside of the vortex, the lines of motion are parallel to the ground. So the vertical motion within the vortex would be irrelevant, even if the conventional framework could explain it. A critical treatment of the topic requires that we explain how objects are picked up just with horizontal air motion.
> At first blush, this doesn't seem like a hard task. Cars will become airborne if subjected to crosswinds above roughly 60 m/s… Contrary to popular belief, it is not the Bernoulli Effect that lifts up the cars, wherein a low pressure has developed above the car. Rather, when air broadsides the car, some of it gets forced under the car, creating a high pressure below it, and this is the force that lifts up the car. Once off the ground, the car is then rapidly accelerated in the direction of the wind, and hits the ground (for the first time at least) 5 m or more away. If it bounces, wind can once again get under the car and lift it up, and the process repeats. So all that is necessary for cars to get levitated is that the windspeed be in excess of 60 m/s, which is in the EF2 range. And there is plenty of evidence of cars being picked up and bounced for some distance in the strong winds of EF2+ tornadoes.[37]

---

[37] Charles L. Chandler, "Observations on the Electromagnetic Nature of Tornadic Supercell Thunderstorms", Section 40, "Tornadic Levitation."

The problem with this explanation is that it does not account for non-wind driven types of levitation witnessed and reported by tornado survivors. Chandler mentions the following examples:

> But there are a number of well-documented cases of vehicles being picked up and behaving in a manner that cannot be explained in such simple terms. In these cases, the vehicles were picked up after the strongest winds had passed, and instead of being accelerated in the direction of the winds, they simply hovered for a while.
> For example, during the tornado that hit La Plata, MD, on April 28, 2002, a bus with 30 people aboard was lifted off the ground, kept suspended in air for several seconds, and then set back down on the wheels. High wind speeds could have picked up the bus, but then the bus would have been accelerated horizontally, and it would have hit the ground hard and rolled several times, destroying the bus and probably killing many of the passengers.
> Here's a similar report, again from Maryland, this time from Steve Tracton, Ph.D. (meteorology):
> In 1995, I was in my car one night, patiently waiting the opportunity to turn from a driveway onto a street in Temple Hills, MD, when seemingly out of nowhere the wind increased to what I perceived as hurricane strength. Needless to say, I was totally surprised and scared beyond belief when my car rose at least two feet off the ground. Fortunately, the wind decreased as rapidly as it had increased, and my car settled back down on the driveway.
> Watching any of the videos of cars hitting the ground after being picked up by high wind speeds, do the words "settled back down" come to mind?
> The following is an eyewitness report of a car being picked up by a tornado, and a photo of the results.
> The man in the house near us was very lucky. He was in the yard and was hanging on for dear life and watched his car raise about 5 feet in the air and float for a few feet toward his house. The car then was gently lowered on his fence and it tilted on its side and was gently lowered to the ground. His house was not touched and he was next to the car and was not harmed. He was hanging on that corner post that you see with the brace on it.[38]

When the Russian was asked how the car came to be in this position, he answered:

[38] Charles L. Chandler, "Observations on the Electromagnetic Nature of Tornadic Supercell Thunderstorms", Section 40, "Tornadic Levitation."

> The car actually floated after the main body of the tornado passed over head and was out of sight. The winds were still strong but I was watching the car as was the man who owned the car. The wind damage was done and the car just gently lowered onto the fence. It did not crash to the ground. The fence held the car side up and the car tipped then gently lowered on its side.
> Yes, slight damage but the car was uprighted after the fence removed and driven away. No dents except slight impressions from rocks and such as it laid on its side…[39]

Chandler then asks what is for our(and his) purposes the most significant question: "How could strong winds pick up a car and then gently set it down on a wooden fence — why was the lateral acceleration so slight? And why did this happen after the tornado had already passed?"[40] There are also, Chandler observes, people who have been picked up by tornadoes, carried for a distance, and then set gently back down.[41]

The most damaging example to the strictly thermodynamic model of tornadic levitation is the cases of houses themselves:

> … (There) have been cases where entire houses have been picked up and carried, and then set back down, damaged but still relatively intact. The anomalous aspect of this is not that an object as big as a house could be picked up. Houses are mainly empty space, with lots of surface area upon which the winds can exert force. But houses simply are not built in such a way that they can be picked up, except from underneath, without falling apart. Without being able to get underneath the house to pick it up, the only other way to generate the necessary uplift without destroying the house is with a force that can act upon the entire mass at once. There are only two such forces in nature operative at this scale — gravity and electromagnetism. It's not gravity, because the houses were picked up. That leaves electromagnetism.[42]

[40] Ibid., emphasis added.

[41] I well remember myself such reports, for in the 1966 tornado that struck Topeka, Kansas, a local reporter was doing a radio remote broadcast by Burnett's Mound off Fairlawn in the Southwest part of the city. As he was reporting, the funnel began to descend and he decided to abandon his position. He began running but soon realized his frantic efforts were getting him nowhere. He looked down and he was indeed airborne, floating gently over the city, only to be set back down, his face caked in mud.

[42] Chandler, op. cit.

We will return to Chandler's actual electromagnetic model in a moment. For now, we need to look at another clue as to the electromagnetic nature of these storms.

(3) Blue-Green Colors, RF Emissions, and The Implication that "They" Knew All Along

One feature often noted by tornado and super-cell storm observers—and it is a phenomenon I myself have often witnessed—is the peculiar blue-green tint to the clouds and atmosphere that oftentimes accompany such storms. This blue-green color is typical of the ionization of the atmosphere—in effect, turning it into a kind of "cold plasma" for want of a better analogy—and is the first strong indicator that the electromagnetic component of tornadic storms may indeed be the paramount factor, with thermodynamic effects the result or "signature" of these more fundamental physical processes:

> Identifying the microphysical processes responsible for a luminous color is a complex endeavor, but one sure source of photon emission is the capture of an electron by a positive ion. In order for this to be happening enough to create visible luminosity, there would have to be a lot of ions picking up free electrons. Studies have shown that while the precipitation that falls to the ground originates from a region in the cloud that is predominantly negative, outside of the cloud the precipitation has a predominantly positive charge. The only possible conclusion is that something is stripping the electrons from the falling precipitation, but there's (obviously) nothing in the thermodynamic model that can do this.
> There's really only one possibility here. The particles would have to pass through positively-charged air, losing electrons in the process. This, then, constitutes one of the lines of evidence in support of the contention that there is a positive double-layer surrounding the negative charge stream.[43]

[43] Charles L. Chandler, "Observations on the Electromagnetic Nature of Tornadic Supercell Thunderstorms," Section 17. Chandler also notes in a passage immediately following these arguments: "Please note that contemplating the nature of green thunderstorms is heresy. Consider the following quote from Scientific American. Research on green thunderstorms is limited and not well funded. As Penn State's Craig Bohren says, this is "not exactly a hot topic of research. Indeed, being curious about them can be hazardous to one's career." For example, the small grant from the National Science Foundation for the portable spectrophotometer Frank Gallagher used

However, there is yet another intriguing fact about tornadoes that deserves mentioning as it bears directly on the electromagnetic hypothesis, and Chandler spends some time with it in his lengthy paper: radio frequency emissions. Tornadoes are known to emit sustained Radio Frequency (RF) pulses in the frequency range of 20 to 140 Megahertz (MHz). Additionally there is a relationship between higher frequency emissions and more powerful tornadoes (i.e., tornadoes in the F4-F5 category).[44]

(4) Lightning Inside the Funnel

One very unusual feature of tornadoes that has been witnessed—though very seldom for obvious reasons—is the phenomenon of lightning inside the funnel vortex. Chandler observes that while tornadoes are passing through a vicinity, the number of lightning strikes in the same vicinity diminishes dramatically.[45] One explanation for this phenomenon is that for some reason, the electromagnetic charge may be concentrated within the tornado funnel itself. Several eyewitnesses who have been beneath a tornado and who have been able to see up inside the cortex have reported seeing streamers of lightning inside the vortex. In fact, in some cases, they report seeing two vortices, the outer fast-moving column of air, and an interior vortex circulating much more slowly, and inside of which the lightning is to be seen. Consider the following report that appeared in the June 10, 1996 issue of Time:

> January 21, 1992, Near Cripple Creek, Colorado. Shortly after 2 PM, while fishing at Skagway Resevoir, D. McGown spotted an ominous cloud formation developing in the west. A horizontal, black cloud rolled toward him. Suddenly, it lifted to reveal a huge, twisting funnel was derided by then Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich's office, and by Richard Pombo, then a Republican congressman from California, who denounced Bohren in the Congressional Record." One has to wonder exactly why curiosity about green thunderstorms could be a hazard to a career in meteorology unless there was some connection to alternative physics models for such systems, and the implied technological ability to manipulation of those systems that would follow from such principles.

> advancing directly at him. He threw himself to the ground, but got a good look up into the interior of the funnel.
> "The outside of the tornado was spinning so fast my eye couldn't following it, but the inside was rotating almost lazily. I could see a thousand feet up inside it. Tiny fingers of lightning lined the hollow tube."[46]

Another report from 1943 from McKinney, Texas has a witness describing seeing the inside of a funnel, which appeared to be luminous and, again, with streamers of lightning.[47]

On June 22, 1928, Mr. Will Keller, a farmer near the town of Greenberg, KS (subsequently destroyed decades later by a tornado), also saw up into the vortex of a tornado. In his own words:

> At last the great shaggy end of the funnel hung directly overhead. Everything was as still as death. There was a strong gassy odor and it seemed that I could not breathe. There was a screaming, hissing sound coming directly from the end of the funnel. I looked up and to my astonishment saw right into the heart of the tornado. There was a circular opening in the center of the funnel, about 50 or 100 feet in diameter, and extending straight upward for a distance of at least one half mile, as best as I could judge under the circumstances. The walls of this opening were of rotating clouds and and the whole was made brilliantly visible by constant flashes of lightning which zigzagged from side to side. Had it not been for the lightning I could not have seen the opening, not any distance up into it anyway.[48]

Note what we have: (1) lightning inside the funnel vortex, and (2) in some cases, two vortices, an external wind-vortex and an internal, slower vortex, creating a rotation differential between the two, and (3) the entire system under intense direct current electrical stress.[49] All of these things argue for the basic electromagnetic nature of tornadoes.

b. A Basic Outline of Chandler's Theory

With these odd facts in mind, let us now outline Chandler's electromagnetic theory, noting first of all that his paper attempts to gather all disparate types of evidence—including the above survey—and to account for it. As we have already observed, the levitation of houses and cars cannot really be accounted for by a purely thermodynamic model of tornadoes.

Chandler begins by noting that within the super-cell thunderstorm there are two regions of electrical charge activity, which generate a circulation of air: there is an inner "doughnut" or toroid of negative charge, and circulating around this toroid, and an outer sheath of positively-charged air circulating around it. It is this electrical circulation that ultimately explains certain features of tornados, including their ability to stick closely to the ground, that the standard thermodynamic model cannot:

> The present work agrees that the driving force in a tornado is the low pressure under the supercell's updraft. But the defining characteristic of a tornado is that it attaches robustly to the surface of the Earth, and this isn't explicable in fluid dynamic terms (at the given pressures, densities, viscosities, speeds, angular momenta, skin friction coefficients, etc.). The only possible conclusion is that some other force must be present, and the only other force present in the atmosphere is electromagnetism. Previous works considered the possibility that a weak but sustained electric current between the ground and the cloud could cause a tornado. An electric current can, indeed, cause a discharge vortex, but it cannot cause a tornado, as there is no way to concentrate the release of energy at the solid boundary, begging the original question. The present work takes a different approach. If a charged double-layer is traveling down around the outside of the cloud, then at the bottom of the cloud this double-layer will get rammed down to the ground (as the RFD and FFD), and then skidded along the ground toward the updraft. Because of its electric charge, it will induce an opposite charge in the Earth, and then it will be attracted to that opposite charge. If the tornadic inflow is attracted to the Earth, it becomes easy to understand how the tornado attaches so robustly to the ground. A vortex is not an entity, but rather, a condition in a medium, and in order to understand the vortex, we have to neglect the vortex and study the medium instead. So we should not say that the tornado is binding to the ground, but rather, that the tornadic inflow is binding to the ground. If an electrostatic attraction is added to the fluid dynamic factors, a tornadic vortex becomes possible. A wide variety of > observational and instrumental evidence is considered, without finding reason to abandon the hypothesis that a charged double-layer is a necessary condition for tornado genesis.[50]

It is this electrical charge differential between regions of air that accounts for the strange phenomena also observed with tornadoes, including the apparent levitation of vehicles and objects otherwise not able to be accounted for in a standard thermodynamic model, as for example, levitation:

> The (electromagnetic) model asserts that the tornadic inflow is positively-charged, and the surface of the Earth has an induced negative charge. This means that particulate matter from the surface that is getting blown in the wind will be negatively-charged. Objects exposed to the tornadic inflow (such as people, cars, etc.) will be sandblasted with this particulate matter, and will therefore pick up a negative charge. After becoming negatively charged, the objects will be attracted by the electric force to the positively-charged air around them. Since there is more air above them than below them, the net force will be upward. And since electromagnetism is 39 orders of magnitude more powerful than gravity, even an extremely small EM force can be the determining factor.[51]

In other words, it is the charge differential between the ambient medium of the vortex itself and the objects it levitates that is the key, and with this, as we shall see, we have a potential "steering mechanism" in addition to the obvious steering mechanisms suggested by low pressure cyclones themselves.

c. An Unusual Parallel Description

It should be noted that the reported cases of objects embedded in other objects by tornadoes bears an unusual resemblance to something at first glance completely different: the reported embedding of people in bulkheads during the alleged Philadelphia Experiment. I have written about this elsewhere,[52] but for our purposes here it is worth noting that in the case of the alleged experiment, we are dealing with rotating electrical fields. This suggests, though certainly does not prove, that the known and similar phenomena observed with tornados might not in fact be the product of thermodynamic fluid forces, but rather, a little understood electromagnetic phenomenon. It should similarly be noted that similar embeddings have been observed by John Hutchison in his experiments with the so-called Hutchison Effect.

d. Implications for a Tornado-Engineering Technology

With these ideas in mind, we now return to our initial four considerations to inquire whether a technological application could be envisioned to explain four cases or modalities:

1) To steer the storm by creations of cyclonic systems;
2) To damp, ameliorate, or even dissipate a tornadic storm;
3) To increase, intensify or strengthen a tornadic storm;
4) To create the storm whole cloth, and to steer, or target it.

As we shall discover later in this chapter when we consider the technologies and principles represented by HAARP, such technologies, by creating regions of ionospheric heating, could also create regions of intense low pressures which could trigger earthquakes.

(1) The Ability to Steer Storms

By a similar procedure or ionospheric heating, then, it would be possible to create regions of low pressure to move or manipulate entire weather systems, in short, to steer a storm in a general fashion. Additionally, the ability to manipulate regions in the ionosphere to create regions of relativistic accelerated particles also implies the ability to manipulate the creation of regions of charge differentials around storms to steer such a system with more precision than merely by creations of cyclones of low pressure. Effectively, in other words, ionospheric heating technologies such as HAARP imply, by the nature of the case, a general steering capability for weather systems, and could further imply an even more precise targeting capability for weather systems. In short, the technology currently in existence, in my opinion, argues that the first capability has already been achieved. Such ability also implies the ability to steer storms away from certain areas, in other words, to attempt to mitigate damage to highly populated areas, by driving storms away from them (and that of course implies the ability to target such areas).

(2) The Ability to Damp Storms

A more difficult proposition is presented by the implied ability to damp, ameliorate, or completely dissipate a storm, but again, the same conditions apply, only in reverse: If the technology exists to create charged regions of the atmosphere, then that same technology could conceivably be used to neutralize regions of charge differentials if such regions were known. Chandler's hypothesis allows one to conjecture on the broad structures of supercell storms, thus creating the possibility that storms could be damped.

(3) The Ability to Intensify Storms

While the ability to damp or ameliorate storms is apparently more difficult, the third modality in our list is not so. It would be possible to intensify storms by intensifying existing naturally occurring low pressure cyclones, or alternatively, by creating another low pressure system in close proximity to a naturally existing one. This would have a double effect, both of steering a storm system and to intensify the cyclonic system, for as the natural tendency of such vortices in close proximity to each other is for such vortices to merge into a more powerful vortex, this activity would allow a storm to be steered as well, using the natural attraction between such vortices to draw the storm in a certain direction. In short, the existing technology could additionally account for the ability to intensify naturally occurring storms. In other words, within existing principles of physics, and with the known operational parameters of HAARP-like ionospheric heater technologies, the first three capabilities in our list already exist.

(4) The Ability to Create a Storm Whole Cloth

We come to the final and most difficult matter, the actual creation of supercell thunderstorms and tornadoes. While this is indeed the most difficult modality of deploying such technologies, it should now be evident that there is nothing, really, to prevent their use in the actual creation of such weather systems. Careful monitoring of humidity and temperature, and frontal conditions, would of course allow the use of these technologies to stimulate the emergence of regions of charge differentials, the creation of local and intense regions of low pressure, where such conditions already exist; in short, the creation of conditions for supercell creation or modification of existing conditions to do so. Similarly this technology could be used to steer the jet stream, manipulate frontal conditions, create inflow of warm moist air over regions where one later wished to create a supercell.

With increased experimentation and precision control over the elements of a storm it is within the bounds of theoretical possibility, in my opinion, that one could create tornadoes and steer them with some precision.

Given that the blue-green signatures of ionization and therefore of strong electromagnetic activity have been known for a very long time to be associated with such storms, there is no doubt in my mind that elaboration of electromagnetic models of such storms was undertaken covertly and was underway for quite some time,[53] and this means, quite simply, that experimentation in the steerage, intensification and amelioration of storms was also under way.

All of these things strongly argue that the technologies to manipulate weather systems on a planetary scale already exist. But even these pale by comparison to the next level of technology: the ability to manipulate geophysical systems themselves in the creation of volcanism and earthquakes.

4. HAARP, EISCAT and Ionospheric Heaters: Geophysical Systems Warfare, and the New Geopolitical Imperative

This manipulation of geophysical systems is best epitomized in the popular imagination by the technologies of ionospheric heaters, and more particularly by the High Altitude Auroral Research Project or HAARP array in Gakona, Alaska, a vast field of phased array radio antennae, and similar ionospheric heaters in the possession of Russia, Japan, and Europe/Germany's EISCAT. This technology works by "manipulating the layers of the Earth's atmosphere,"[54] that is to say, we are dealing with a technology on the cusp of a Class One Civilization capability, and as we shall see subsequently, possibly even a technology on the cusp of Class Two capability. This technology indeed is capable of using "planet Earth itself as a weapon, harnessing the power of natural processes for war."[55]

Rosalie Bertell notes that HAARP's publicly stated purposes emphasize some an odd assortment of aims:

> The stated aim of HAARP is to 'understand, simulate and control ionospheric processes that might alter the performance of communication and surveillance systems.' The HAARP system will beam 3.6 megawatts … of high-frequency radio energy into the ionosphere in order to (in the words of its proposal):
> - generate extremely low frequency (ELF) waves for communicating with submerged submarines,
> - conduct geophysical probes to identify and characterize national ionospheric processes so that techniques can be developed to mitigate or control them,
> - generate ionospheric lenses to focus large amounts of high frequency (HF) energy, thus providing a means of triggering ionospheric processes that potentially could be exploited for Department of Defense purposes,
> - induce electron acceleration for infrared (IR) and other optical emissions which could be used to control radio wave propagation properties,
> - generate geomagnetic field aligned ionization to control the reflection/scattering properties of radio waves.[56]

Note that the ability to use low frequency waves to communicate with submarines involves using the Earth itself as a transmitting "antenna," a concept fraught with its own dangers as we shall discover.

In the case of HAARP, there is no known capability of this sort, which would require buried antennae. Rather, the technique employed by HAARP is believed to be to converge beams from the phased antennae on the electrojet, > and when the synchronised rays hit it at a right angle they cause the river of electromagnetic energy to spread sideways. When the rays are > turned off, the jet returns to normal. If the transmitted rays are turned on and off in a rhythm, the motion outward and inward creates an alternating current that generates pulsed ELF waves. These low frequency waves are reflected back to Earth and can be used for communications with submerged submarines and for 'deep Earth tomography', which involves 'scanning the internal structure of the planet…[57]

The ability to scan the interior structure of the planet would be a crucial step in the technology tree to acquire earthquake production capability, since this capability would be reliant upon the identification of instabilities within planetary structure that could be weaponized.

Note also that another stated goal of HAARP is to manipulate and control ionospheric processes, including the generation of "lenses" to focus "large amounts of high frequency energy" for defense purposes. This is a euphemism for the ability to focus the enormous electrostatic potential of the ionosphere and discharge it.[58]

We are dealing, bluntly, with a breakaway civilization technologies.

a. The Ionosphere, Missile Defense Experiments, and the Beginnings of Offensive Resonance Possibilities

To see how all this might work, however, we need to have a basic understanding of the geophysics behind it. The Earth is sheathed in protective layers that support its fragile biosphere, and these we need to understand before we can understand the use of ionospheric heater technologies as potential weapons. These protective layers may be divided into two general layers, (1) the upper layer or magnetosphere, beginning from 280 to 375 miles above the Earth's surface, and extending to approximately 32,000 miles, and (2) the lower layer or ionosphere, that is, the Earth's atmosphere itself. Within these two layers, there are further divisions:

1) Magnetosphere:

[57] Bertell, Planet Earth: The Latest Weapon of War, p. 122.

[58] One may imagine further developments of this principle, namely, the use of two or more such ionospheric heaters in concert, to focus upon one target region an interferometric pattern of electromagnetic radiation. The amount of energy potentially available in such a use might possibly be in the giga- or tera-joule range. HAARP alone, as already noted, has a broadcast power in the giga-wattage range.

    a) Lower or Inner Van Allen Radiation belt, from about 1,300 to 3,100 miles above the surface of the Earth (though in the case of some anomalous regions can dip as low as approximately 200 miles above the Earth;
    b) Upper or Outer Van Allen Radiation belt, from about 8,000 to approximately 35,000 miles about the surface of the Earth;
2) Ionosphere: The atmosphere or ionosphere proper has five layers as follows:
    a) Troposphere, extending from the surface of the Earth to approximate 6-10 miles above it;
    b) Stratosphere, from 6-10 miles to 30 miles above the surface;
    c) Mesosphere, from about 30 to 50 miles above the Earth's surface;
    d) Thermosphere or lower Ionosphere, from approximately 50 to 60 miles above the Earth's surface; and finally,
    e) Upper Ionosphere or Exosphere, from approximately 60 t0 280-375 miles above the surface.[59]

It is important to note that, in each of these layers, and especially in the Van Allen Belts, charged particles circulate in a huge sea of energy in layers and systems that are fundamentally interrelated electro-dynamic systems.

Early Cold War era American and Soviet experiments in missile defense shields were designed to take advantage of this fact. For example, in August and September 1958, in Project Argus, the U.S. Navy detonated three atom bombs 300 miles about the South Atlantic ocean, at the anomalous point where the inner Van Allen Belt dips to about 125-250 miles of the Earth's surface.[60] One probable purpose of the tests was to study the effects of Electro-Magnetic Pulse or EMP, the phenomenon produced by nuclear explosions that interferes with radio and radar operations. But another likely possible purpose for the tests was to study the behavior of charged particles within the layers of the ionosphere for the purpose of exploiting it virtually unlimited source of energy and potential destructive power.[61]

> These nuclear explosions created new magnetic radiation belts and injected sufficient electrons and other energetic particles into the

[59] Bertell, Planet Earth: The Latest Weapon of War, p. 55.

> ionosphere to cause worldwide effects. It is not known how long these belts lasted but they were observed five years after the explosions. The electrons travelled back and forth along the newly created magnetic force lines, causing artificial 'auroras' when striking the atmosphere near the north pole. This phenomenon was apparently what inspired the concept of a space 'shield' against incoming missiles. If natural Earth processes destroyed incoming debris, could an artificial shield be created against intercontinental missiles?[62]

Bertell is choosing her words carefully but it is clear what she is implying: the basic geophysics of the Earth provided a natural defense of the planet, and, with proper stimulation, these systems could be tweaked into systems of defense against ICBMs tipped with hydrogen bombs, and eventually, could be tweaked into even deadlier strategic weapons of mass destruction than the hydrogen bomb and ICBM.

A hint of these more deadly Class One and Two Civilization capabilities and technologies was revealed in a 1968 proposal in the United States for a system of "microwave energy satellites" that would capture the Sun's energy and beam it to the Earth:[63]

> It was planned that the satellites would intercept solar radiation using solar cells, and then transmit the energy via a microwave beam to receiving antennas, called rectennas, on Earth. the rectenna sites, each capable of generating five gigawatts of electricity, were expected to take up 145 square kilometres of land, and would preclude habitation by humans, animals or even vegetation. Plans for controlling wildlife and birds were sketchy, depending, apparently, on letting them die if they wandered too close to a rectenna or flew through a microwave beam.[64]

Obviously, such a program had clear military applications, given that the microwave beams would devastate 145 square kilometers—an area similar in size to the area devastated with a small hydrogen bomb, and, notably, one would have none of the inaccuracy of an ICBM, nor none of the fallout associated with a thermonuclear bomb.[65] More to the point, one could imagine an even more horrific "upgrade" to the concept, using a maser, laser, x-ray laser or graser (gamma-ray laser) to ionize a channel of air through the atmosphere as a kind of "channel" for a vast amount of electrons in the ionosphere or inner Van Allen Belt to follow. One would, in other words, be targeting a region on the Earth with a precision unheard of by any missile, through which static discharges—lightening strikes—several magnitudes of order more powerful than anything in nature would follow. One could, by such a system, devastate an entire region in mere seconds.[66] And lest one think it was solely the West developing these breakaway civilization capabilities, the Soviet Union in 1962 followed with its own high altitude nuclear explosions in 1962, creating three new radiation belts of its own from 4300 to 8100 miles above the Earth.[67]

---

[62] Bertell, Planet Earth: The Latest Weapon of War, p. 64. Bertell also observes that "The effects of Project argus on Earth have never been fully revealed."(p. 64)

[63] Ibid., p. 84. Bertell notes that these satellites were each to have been the size of Manhattan island and thus presumably constructed in space.

[64] Ibid.

[65] Ibid., p. 85.

These potentialities for strategic offensive geophysical weapons systems thus make the publicly stated purposes for HAARP and similar ionospheric heaters dubious at best, for as I noted in Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops, such god-like technologies afford the ideal matrix for covert and psychological warfare operations. Indeed, Bertell herself notes that "The US Department of Defense provides a manual for its industrial contractors which states: 'Cover stories about projects must be believable and cannot reveal any information regarding the true nature of the project.'"[68] The true nature here being the potentiality for offensive strategic use through the identification of instabilities in systems, and their exploitation through resonance effects.[69]

---

[66] Bertell observes that there were other potential uses that critics of the Solar Power Satellite program noted, namely, the ability to direct the microwave beams away from the receiving rectennae "to intersect near enemy personnel" in which case the system would function like "a microwave over—it could kill people and spare buildings," or, conceivably, be used "to ignite combustible materials." (Bertell, Planet Earth: The Latest Weapon of War, p. 86). I needn't comment on the implications of these statements for the scenario of the collapse of the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center on 9/11.

[68] Ibid., p. 122, citing "The National Industrial Security Program Manual," March 1992.

[69] Ibid., pp. 125-126. Bertell notes that such resonance effects can be huge in nature, citing the rings of Saturn as an example. One standard method of psychological operations designed to hide the purpose of technologies and concepts is what might be called "divide and hide," i.e., parceling out not only the technology in various compartments of a black project, such that only a few know its real use and significance, but similarly parceling out knowledge in various locations, in the open. The true significance of the components can only

C. Implied Geopolitical Imperatives of the Technologies

As we noted much earlier in this chapter, these resonant effects have as their basis the exploitation of systemic geophysical instabilities, and though we have thus far considered only meteorological instabilities rather than properly geophysical ones within the planet itself, it is worth pausing to consider the implied geopolitical imperatives of the technologies reviewed thus far from the point of view of the power elite(s) within such a breakaway civilization structure.

Such technologies imply a capacity for strategic mass destruction on a scale commensurate with, if not exceeding, the capabilities of the world's thermonuclear arsenals, and they also imply two other things: (1) plausible deniability in their use, and (2) no apparent blowback or consequence to the user in their deployment and operational use. These facts, plus the relative ease with which such technologies could be engineered, present the breakaway civilization's factions with an imperative, namely, to seek to put into place, if necessary with the emerging technologies themselves, a mechanism of global governance to prevent the or avoid the proliferation of such technologies to rivals, and to avoid the potential for factional infighting becoming more intense as the technologies evolve and develop. In short, it presents the elites possessing such capabilities with the imperatives behind the 1970s Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT), only magnified several times over in their urgency. These imperatives well now become much more visible in the next chapter, when we turn to examine geophysical weapons in the proper sense, or, the ability to engineer earthquakes, and all the incipient Class Two capabilities that some of these technologies imply.

be known by 'connecting the dots." One example of hiding things in the open regarding HAARP is the Federal Environmental Impact Statement that was filed by the U.S. Air Force, which stated that HAARP's transmissions "'can raise the internal body temperature of nearby people, ignite road flares in the trunks of cars, detonate aerial munitions used in electronic fuses, and scramble aircraft communications, navigation and flight control systems.' Even small increases in electromagnetic radiation can cause health problems such as cataracts and leukaemia, also altering brain chemistry, blood sugar levels, blood pressure and heart rates."(Bertell, op. cit. p. 126.)

PULSES, PLANETS, AND PYRAMIDS: KARDASHEV CLASSES AND COVERT CONFLICT, PART TWO

"So, we've seen trillions of dollars in tax money or Federal credit being harvested, pulled out and pulled out and pulled out… The debasement is this enormous amount of money being clawed out of the government and clawed out of society. It's the cost of organized crime. It's the cost of financial fraud. The question is, where's that money going?… and I assure you it is not going to… off-shore bank accounts, (because) we're talking about much too much money. We're talking about the kind of money that builds private space programmes. We're talking about the kind of money that builds corporate armies. We're talking about enough money to endow a private government… So, we're talking about enough money to buy and control the planet. And so I think Black Budget."

Catherine Austin Fitts[1]

Indeed, as Catherine Austin Fitts rightly observes in the epigraph above, a few trillions of dollars in pocket change, a quadrillion of derivatives here, a quadrillion there, can buy a secret space program, and it might also fund a few tornados and hurricanes, purchase a few earthquakes, finance a few solar flares, reverse engineer some flying saucers, and have enough left over to fund a buyout of the globe and a new global government.

It is the globe itself that constitutes the key element of geophysical warfare, and the key that turns opens the lock to such earthquake weapons are systemic instabilities. Here, however, we enter the murky world of the intricate relationships between geophysics, plate tectonics, electromagnetic energy, waves, and nuclear weapons, and as we shall see in the next section of this book, UFOs. Our entry into this bizarre, macabre and nightmarish world is via a little known 1963 military project called Project West Ford.

A. Nukes, Tomography, Earthquakes, and Longitudinal Waves

1. Project West Ford: Entry into a Mystery

By 1958, the atmospheric nuclear testing that the United States and Soviet Union had been conducting was put on hold.[2] But this did not stop bizarre experimentation; Rosalie Bertell writes:

> In 1961, Keesings Historisch Archief reported that the US Military planned to create a 'telecommunications shield' in the ionosphere in order to counteract the interference to radio communication caused by solar wind. The plan was to bring into orbit 350,000 million copper needles, each 204 centimetres long. Researchers hoped that these trillions of needles would form a belt 10km (6 miles) thick and 40 km (25 miles) wide and that the needles would be distributed about 100 metres apart. They could then bounce radio waves off this artificial shield rather than the 'unreliable' ionosphere. Although this project focused on problems with radio communication, it again reflects the idea of a space shield, which was rapidly gaining ground in the minds of military planners.
> The military actually did try this experiment, tossing 350,000 million copper needles into orbit![3]

The project was known as Project West Ford, and it was launched in May 1963, though according to another source, Anthony Kendall, the U.S. Air Force "launched 480 million tiny copper needles" which created an artificial ring around the world.[4]

Each needle was 1.8 centimeters long, 0.0018 centimeters in diameter and weighed 40 micrograms, and were specifically designed "to be exactly half of the wavelength of 8000 Mhz microwaves. This length would create strong reflections when the microwaves struck the copper needles, in effect making them tiny dipole antennae each repeating in all directions the exact same signal they received."[5] This is an intriguing, if not profoundly disturbing, project, in view of the fact that certain circles within the American technocratic elite would propose, within a mere five years of the successful completion of Project West Ford, the encirclement of the Earth with microwave power satellites beaming down enough energy to roast 145 square kilometers, as detailed in the previous chapter!

But there were other possible implications to Project West Ford that began to be speculated about within a year after it was done:

> Since this experiment is not something the military later bragged about or one they expanded as planned, we can assume it was 'unsuccessful' for their purposes. What damage it did to the complicated upper atmosphere is unknown. One independent researcher, Leigh Richmond Donahue, along with her physicist husband, Walter Richmond, tracked such events in the postwar years. She wrote:
> "…when the military sent up a band of tiny copper wires into the ionosphere to orbit the planet 'so as to reflect radio waves and make reception clearer' we had the 8.5 Alaskan earthquake and Chile lost a good deal of its coast. That band of copper wires interfered with the planetary magnetic field."
> While we cannot prove this hypothesis right or wrong, it was put forward by serious scientists and was the beginning of attempts to connect human disturbance of our atmosphere with unwanted violent happenings on the surface of the planet. Non-military geophysicists were shut out of these experiments.[6]

The earthquake referred to here is the March 27, 1964 Good Friday earthquake that struck Anchorage and other points in Alaska, an earthquake that lasted an unbelievable four minutes in some places, and that registered 9.2 on the Richter scale.

The reason some scientists began to connect the dots between earthquakes and magnetic field disturbances—and as we shall shortly see, nuclear detonations—is rather simple. Earthquakes, as measured by the Richter scale, can be converted into the equivalent of electrical current energy released, or the equivalent of the energy of the explosion of TNT, in which case the 1964 9.2 Alaska earthquake would have released an incredible 4.0 exajoules, or the approximate equivalent of detonating a hydrogen bomb of an unbelievable 950 megatons.[7] All this is to say that geophysical warfare—the ability to engineer earthquakes—most likely became an intense, and intensely secret, area of investigation for the breakaway civilization's scientists and technocrats, since the energies being manipulated and subject to the potential control of man far exceeded anything being done in the USA's or USSR's hydrogen bomb projects.

Recall that the largest thermonuclear device ever detonated by man was the Russian "Tsar Bomba," with a yield of 57-67 megatons (depending on the source cited). The Anchorage quake exceeded this by more than an order of magnitude! The 1960 Valdivia Chile earthquake

As soon as electromagnetic precursors to earthquakes began to be suspected, researchers began reporting them:

> On 28 July 1976 the Tangshan earthquake in China, which left 650,000 people dead, was preceded by an airglow said to have been caused by the Soviet ionospheric heater. On 23 September 1977 the Washington Post reported a strange star-like ball of light over Petrosavodsk. A similar airglow effect was reported over the American Midwest on 23 September 1993, at a time of disastrous flooding. At the same time, a lightning flash, rising from the tops of the clouds up into the atmosphere, was reported. This was recognised as a new geophysical phenomenon—normal lightning flows between two clouds, or from clouds to Earth.
> On 12 September 1989, magnetometers at Corralitos (near Monterey Bay, in California) detected unusual ultra-low frequency waves between 0.01 Hertz and 10 Hertz. This is the lowest range of ELF waves. These waves grew to about 30 times their first intensity, and finally subsided on 5 October 1989. On 17 October they suddenly appeared again at 2:00 pm local time, with signals so strong that they went off the scale. Three hours later the San Francisco earthquake took place. On 29 March 1993, the Washington Times reported that 'satellites and ground sensors detected mysterious radiowaves or related electrical and magnetic activity before major earthquakes in Southern California during 1986-7, Armenia in 1988, and Japan and Northern California in 1989. The 17 January 1994 earthquake in Los Angeles was also preceded by unusual radio waves and two sonic booms. These strange 'coincidences' have never been completely explained.[8]

As we shall see momentarily, these are not really coincidences at all; they may be the signatures of technologies producing the quakes.

exceeded even this at 9.5 on the Richter scale, or an unbelievable 11 exajoules, the equivalent of blowing up a hydrogen bomb with a yield of 2.7 giga-tons!

a. Earthquake Engineering and the Second Kardashev Corollary

But first it is worth pausing briefly at this juncture to consider an implication of the hypothesis being developed, namely, any small changes within one geophysical system, such as those caused in the ionosphere by Project West Ford, may have had much larger resonant consequences in another geophysical system, such as would allow for such effects to be engineered and artificially manipulated.

In the preface I observed that the Kardashev civilization classification system was based upon the energy requirements of that civilization. But I also noted a corollary: that the energy required by a civilization implied also the ability to manipulate systems at that level. Thus, a class one civilization required the energy of an entire planet, and hence, the ability to manipulate systems on a planetary scale. A class two civilization required the energy of an entire star, and hence the ability to manipulate stellar systems, and so on.

However, the "key to geophysical warfare is the identification of environmental instabilities to which the addition of a small amount of energy would release vastly greater amounts of energy."[9] Thus, one arrives at a Second Corollary to the Kardashev System, which may be stated as follows: By dint of the principle of the resonant exploitation of systemic instabilities, it is not necessary for a civilization to reach class one or two status in energy requirements to be able to manipulate systems on a class one (planetary), class (two) stellar, or class three (galactic) scale. In fact, the reverse may be true, for by acquiring the technological capability to achieve the effects of class one or two capabilities, one may in fact be "leveraging" the energy requirements and technologies of such civilizations.

b. Earthquake Engineering and The Geopolitical Implication

Such energies and capabilities reinforce the geopolitical imperatives referred to at the end of the previous chapter, namely, the absolute need to create a global mechanism of control over such technological potential lest their acquisition by various factions and components within the structure lead to infighting by its means, and thus break down the structure and threatening further human progress.

Indeed, there are hints and suggestions of precisely such cooperation. On June 21 1977, The New York Times reported that the

[9] Bertell, Planet Earth: The Latest Weapon of War, p. 131.

United States had sold a 40-ton magnet, thought to be the largest in the world at that time, to the Soviet Union, along with scientific technicians. According to the report, the magnet could generate a magnetic field 250,000 times stronger than that of the Earth, and ultimately, was designed to increase "the power of the Soviet Woodpecker transmitters,"[10] transmitters that many researchers, including retired U.S. Army Lt. Col. Tom Bearden, believe to be components of Soviet "scalar" or "quantum potential" weapons systems.

Another strong suggestion that while there may be covert "earthquake wars" being fought with such technologies at one level, at yet another level, there is deep cooperation, cooperation perhaps born from the geopolitical imperatives implied by such technologies. Researcher Jerry Smith noted in his landmark study Weather Warfare: The Military's Plan to Draft Mother Nature, that three prominent Russian scientists were on an initial US committee investigating geophysical technologies. The committee was sponsored by the Office of Naval Research and the East-West Space Science Center of the University of Maryland. The three Russian scientists were

1) Alexander V. Gurevich, "Head, Ionospheric Division, Lebedev Institute" and a "Corresponding Member of the Russian Academy of Sciences";
2) Roald Z. Sagdeev, a professor of physics at the University of Maryland and also a member of the Russian Academy of Sciences; and,
3) Gennady M. Milikh, the committee's secretary.[11]

Of these, Sagdeev is particularly interesting, since he had been the "Director of the Soviet Union's Space Research Institute… for fifteen years. While there he directed many high-profile multinational projects, including the joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. Apollo-Soyuz program, and international missions to probe Halley's comet and later to Phobos, a moon of Mars."[12] Such levels of cooperation on technologies with a distinctive geophysical warfare implication, and as we shall also discover later in this chapter, an off-planet capability as well, suggest that the technologies themselves might ultimately be being developed for use against another kind of potential threat entirely. But before we can explore that other potential threat, there are further terrestrial geopolitical imperatives of this technology that must be mentioned.

(1) The 1993 Kalgoorlie Australia "Meteor" and a Further Geopolitical Implication

In June of 1993 a small newspaper in the wilds of Western Australia, the Kalgoorlie Miner, stated that a "meteor fireball flying from south to north between Leonora and Laverton" was spotted by "several observers on 28 May."[13] Some of these observers reported that as the fireball flew overhead it made "a pulsed roaring noise, similar to a very loud diesel train."[14] After the sighting, an earthquake measuring approximately 4 on the Richter magnitude scale was reported by "23 different seismic receivers around Western Australia. After the seismic wave hit, they reported hearing a huge, long, drawn-out explosion similar but not quite the same as a mine blast. Although seismographs have been in place since 1900, there is no record of any previous earthquake in this area, nor do aboriginal people have any memory of such an event."[15] In the absence of other explanations, it was initially assumed that the Australian outback had been struck by a meteorite.

But from such simple beginnings, the story quickly grew into something bizarre and sinister, something betokening precisely the kind of factional warfare between the components of the breakaway civilization, components we outlined in the Preface. Estimating the point of probable impact to be in the Eastern Goldfields of Western Australia, geologist Harry Mason visited the site in May and June of 1995, and to his consternation and surprise, discovered absolutely "no sign of an impact crater or ground anomaly."[16] Interviewing several witnesses, Mason uncovered an unusual catalog of facts:

> (People) heard the fireball well before they saw it; it was a large orange-red spherical fireball with a very small bluish conical tail; the speed was like that of a 747 jet liner; the fireball flew apparently parallel to Earth's curvature in a long 'nap of the Earth' arcing trajectory at low altitude (about 2000 metres) over a distance of at least 250 kilmoetres; the fireball arced down toward the ground and disappeared behind trees or low hills; then a blinding massive high > energy burst of blue-white light lit up the night as if it was daylight. Observers could see more than 100 kilometres in every direction at ground level; a red colour flare then shot vertically skywards and a massive seismic ground wave hit the observers; a very loud major explosive blast followed; that was heard over a 250km by 150km corridor; minor quake damage was reported as far as 150hm southeast.[17]

Additionally, while the fireball lit up the sky, dogs in the area "went totally berserk," indicating something about the phenomenon may have been either ultrasonic or electromagnetic in nature.[18]

However, the oddest fact of them all, one which indicated that a very shadowy player may have been involved, was the fact that the entire area in which the incident occurred > had just been purchased by the Japanese Aum Sinri Kyo 'Supreme Truth' Sect, accused of instigating the 1995 Tokyo subway gas attack. the deal was closed on 23 April 1993, only 35 days before the first fireballs were seen. The deputy leader of AUM initiated the purchase to 'conduct experiments there for the benefit of mankind'. It cannot be shown whether or not these experiments had any connection with the fireballs. The chief lawyer of the US Senate Inquiry into the AUM sect informed Harry Mason of the AUM's great interest in electromagnetic weapons and their power to induce earthquakes.[19]

Moreover, personnel from the sect were present in the area on the night of the sightings and earthquakes.[20]

While it cannot be demonstrated that "these experiments had any connection with the fireballs," it can be shown, however, that there is a correlation between such electromagnetic phenomena and earthquakes, and thus, the prospect is raised that indeed the Kilgoorlie-Australian fireball-earthquake episode was indeed possibly caused by a faction of the breakaway civilization, one with clear connections to World War Two fascism, flexing its geophysical warfare muscles.[21]

To see how electromagnetic phenomena and earthquakes are related, and just how far back the technology and theoretical thinking for its production goes, we have to return once again to man who is perhaps the greatest scientist and engineer of all time, Nikola Tesla, who first proposed electromagnetic technologies for doing so in 1908.[22] But Tesla had already taken out a patent for such a device in 1894!

acquire such "scalar" weapons technologies. It also corroborates, and may indeed be the direct reference, of the remarks of former Clinton Administration Secretary of Defense William Cohen.

[23] Dale Pond and Walter Baumgartner, Nikola Tesla's Earthquake Machine, with Tesla's Original Patents plus New Blueprints to build your own Working Model(The Message Company, 1997), p. 93.

The principle of its operation may be gleaned by recounting an incident that occurred when Tesla tested one such oscillator in his laboratory. Attaching the piston end of the oscillator (visible in the center of the drawing on the previous page) to an iron pillar "that went down through the center of his loft building at 46 East Houston Street"[24] to the building's basement. Turning the vibrator on, Tesla would step up the frequency of the piston's oscillations, observing and taking notes as first one, and then another, piece of furniture and equipment in his laboratory began to dance wildly.[25] But something else was happening, something that would soon capture the imagination of the inventor:

> What Tesla was unaware of on this occasion was that vibrations from the oscillator, traveling down the iron pillar with escalating force, were being carried through the substructure of Manhattan in all directions. (Normally earthquakes are more severe at a distance from their epicenter.) Buildings began to shake, windows chattered, and citizens poured onto the streets in the nearby Italian and Chinese neighborhoods.[26]

The police, who already viewed Tesla as something of a "mad scientist," dispatched two officers to his laboratory when it became known that no other part of New York City was experiencing any tremors. By the time the officers arrived at Tesla's headquarters, he had already smashed the oscillator with a sledgehammer, informing the officers that they were "just a trifle too late" to witness his experiment which he "found it necessary to stop… suddenly and unexpectedly and in an unusual way…"[27]

The idea of thus using resonant vibrations and inherent systemic instabilities thus began to exercise its grip on Tesla's powerful mind, and he immediately foresaw the use of mechanical vibrations to locate mineral deposits beneath the earth and even "to determine the physical constant", i.e., the exact mechanical resonance, of the earth.[28] Indeed, an exact probing of the interior structure of the Earth becomes essential to the fundamental principle of geophysical warfare, for that principle is dependent upon the identification of, and resonant loading of instabilities within geophysical systems.[29]

However, Tesla also foresaw other possibilities:

> "So powerful are the effects of the telegeodynamic oscillator," said Tesla in reviewing the subject in the thirties, "that I could now go over to the Empire State Building and reduce it to a tangled mass of wreckage in a very short time. I could accomplish this result with utmost certainly and without any difficulty whatever. I would use a small mechanical vibrating device, an engine so small you could slip it in your pocket. I could attach it to any part of the building, start it in operation, allow it twelve to thirteen minutes to come to full resonance. The building would first respond with gentle tremors, and the vibrations would then become so powerful that the whole structure would go into resonant oscillations of such great amplitude and power that rivets in the steel beams would be loosened and sheared. The outer stone coating would be thrown off and then the skeleton steel structure would collapse in all its parts."[30]

Similarly, Tesla boasted to a friend that he could do the same to the Brooklyn Bridge "in less than an hour."[31]

Never one to think on a small scale, Tesla also conceived of the use of the principle as the ultimate geophysical doomsday weapon, for he maintained that it would be possible to split the Earth by the very same means, "split it as a boy would split an apple—and forever end the career of man."[32] Tesla went on to explain the mechanism of doing so by resonance. Suppose, he maintained, that one would explode a ton of dynamite at a particular point on the Earth's surface or beneath it. A longitudinal pulse would spread from that point concentrically around the Earth until it contracted again at the antipode, where it would spread once again, and contract upon the original point of detonation, where, at that instant, one would again detonate, or pulse the wave, again and again, until the wave grew in such amplitude that the Earth could no longer damp the vibrations, and it would split.[33] In a matter of a few weeks "he could set the Earth's crust into such a state of vibration that it would rise and fall hundreds of feet, throwing rivers out of their beds, wrecking buildings, and practically destroying civilization."[34]

There are two very important points to bear in mind here. Firstly, the basic principles—and with Tesla's electro-mechanical oscillator, the basic technologies—of geophysical warfare have been around for more than a century. Secondly, it is well-known that the banking-money power fraternity suppressed the development of Tesla's wireless beaming of power, and the physics that went with it. The implication is thus rather profound, for these facts suggest that the basic outlines of a breakaway civilization may have begun circa the turn of the last century, and may have begun as a private and corporate development, vastly expanding itself as monetary and financial requirements of the Second World War and Cold War compelled the covert penetration of the much vaster financial resources of government(s) to make it possible. We shall present more intriguing and suggestive information in part three of this book that tends to indicate, from a very different angle, that the possibility of a turn-of-the-century beginning of the breakaway civilization may be the case.

3. Nuclear Weapons, Longitudinal Waves, and Earthquakes

a. Longitudinal Waves, Nukes, and Earthquakes

It was the advent of nuclear weapons, however, that made the potentialities of geophysical warfare a much more distinctive possibility. For one thing, the enormous power of nuclear devices made it possible to "see" all the way into the Earth's core, since their powerful longitudinal pulses could penetrate that deeply. This allowed scientists to discover that, beneath the molten core of the Earth, there is yet another, solid core.[35]

But there was something else that nuclear weapons appeared to be doing, something that basically confirmed Nikola Tesla's proclamations of the capabilities of geophysical weapons:

[35] Ibid., p. 129.

> Underground nuclear explosions have also set off earthquakes. The best documented of these occurred deep in the vast Nevada desert in 1968. The United States government set off a nuclear weapon on a fault line to see if they could induce an earthquake—and got one! This took place under the code name Project Faultless.
> According to the Nevada Division of Environmental Protection Project Faultless was detonated at the Central Nevada Test Area (CNTA) in emplacement borehole UC-1 on 19 January 1968 at a depth of 3,200 feet below ground surface. Officially, Faultless was designed to study the behavior and characteristics of seismic signals generated by nuclear detonations and to differentiate them from seismic signals generated by naturally occurring earthquakes, and also to evaluate the usefulness of the site for higher-yield nuclear tests that could not be safvely conducted at the Nevada Test Site (NTS) near Las Vegas. It was intentionally placed on a fault line to see if the high yield explosion would set off an earthquake. It has been argued that the scientists in charge of the shot were convinced that such was impossible, hence the name "faultless."[36]

Note that the military is tacitly admitting that its studies of such detonations are for the purposes of geophysical warfare, to determine the difference between artificially generated seismic pulses, and naturally occurring ones.

The Project Faultless test was designed to be a very large test, of just under one megaton, though its size was never publicly announced.[37] Further tests, one code-named Adagio, were also scheduled and these, judging from the size and depth of the drill holes for the tests, would possibly have been in the multi-megaton range.[38] When the test occurred on January 19, 1968, however, windows broke at a high school 87 miles away in Ely, Nevada, and the naturally occurring faults at the test site itself were so disturbed that the site was rendered unusable and further tests were cancelled.[39] In spite of U.S. Department of Energy reassurances that there is no correlation between nuclear tests and earthquakes, the test of an atom bomb in Nevada on June 19, 1992, followed four days later by another such test, was also followed by a series of earthquakes in the Mojave Desert with Richter scale readings as high as 7.6.[40]

[39] Ibid.

Other nations' scientists were not as reassuring as the U.S. Department of Energy:

> A study conducted in 1975-76 by two Japanese scientists, entitled "Recent abnormal Phenomena on Earth and Atomic Power Tests," by Shigeyoshi Matsumae, president of Tokai University, and Yoshio Kato, head of the University's Department of Aerospace Science, concluded:
> "Abnormal meteorological phenomena, earthquakes and fluctuations of the earth's axis are related in a direct cause-and-effect to testing of nuclear devices… Nuclear testing is the cause of abnormal polar motion of the earth. By applying the dates of nuclear tests with a force of more than 150 kilotons, we found it obvious that the position of the pole slid radically at the time of the nuclear explosion… Some of the sudden changes measured up to one meter in distance.[41]

Nor were the Japanese alone in coming to such conclusions, for the British magazine New Scientist reported on 12 October 1978 that the 1978 earthquake in Tabas, Iran that killed at least 25,000 people "may have been triggered by an underground nuclear explosion… British seismologists believe the Tabas earthquake implies a nuclear test that has gone awry,"[42] and this at a time when seismic laboratories at the University of Uppsala, Sweden, reported a Soviet thermonuclear test of approximately 10 megatons had occurred only 36 hours before the Iranian earthquake.[43]

Canadian Gary T. Whiteford, Professor of Geography at the University of New Brunswick, echoed his colleague's concerns in a paper for the August 1992 edition of War and Peace Digest entitled "Earthquakes and Nuclear Testing: Dangerous Patterns and Trends." The magazine summarized Whiteford's paper as unequivocally supporting the correlation of nuclear testing and earthquakes:

> Within the data he found other suggestive patterns. The one-two nuclear test punch that preceded by only a few days the July earthquakes in California this year may reveal a special danger. The largest earthquake this century took place in Tangshan in North-East

> China on July 27 1976. It measured 8.2 and killed 800,000 people. Only five days earlier the French had tested a bomb in the Mururoa atoll in the Pacific. Four days later the United States tested a bomb in Nevada. Twenty-four hours later the earthquake hit China.[44]

This is a significant statement, for the detonation of two nuclear bombs, at different times, suggests that the earthquake in China was caused by the interferometry of the resulting waves from the two detonations, and this raises the possibility that one could cause such quakes by the interference of two such longitudinal electrical waves, the very type of waves many, including this author, believe was the basic concept behind Tesla's idea for the wireless transmission of power.

b. Tesla, Bearden, Nukes, Longitudinal Pulses, and the Medium

It is the possibility of an electromagnetic, rather than merely nuclear-mechanical, generation of such killer earthquakes that informed Dr. Andrea Puharich to speculate that it was produced by the use of Tesla-type electromagnetic technologies. Puharich noted that the New York Times reported on June 5, 1977 that "just before the first tremor at 3:42 AM, the sky lit up 'like daylight.' The multi-hued lights, mainly white and red, were seen up to 200 miles away. Leafs on many trees were burned to a crisp and growing vegetables were scorched on one side, as if by a fireball."[45] It is this fact that lead many to consider alternative explanations for such earthquakes.

The key connection between such nuclear, and electromagnetic, possibilities for geophysical warfare lie in unusual properties of rotating plasmas, one of which is their ability to converse transverse electromagnetic waves into longitudinal electromagnetic waves, and vice-versa.[46] Thus, a rotating medium such as the Earth's atmosphere, could be energized by a technology, such as HAARP, to produce an ionized gas or plasma, which could in turn generate transverse or longitudinal waves which would be deeply Earth-penetrating waves:

[46] T.E. Bearden, Ph.D.(Lt. Col. U.S. Army, Retired), Fer De Lance: Briefing on Soviet Scalar Electromagnetic Weapons, 2nd Edition (Cheniere, 2002), p. 87.

> To complete the military investigation of the whole Earth system it was necessary to probe the solid earth itself, and this again involves the use of wave technology.[47]

Here, as in so many places, the technology is capable of a dual function, both to probe the Earth, and to exploit its instabilities:

> Ionospheric heaters such as HAARP create extremely low frequency (ELF) waves which are reflected back to the Earth by the ionosphere. These rays can be directed through the Earth in a method called deep earth tomography. Since the beamed radiation used to convert the direct electrical current of the electrojet into alternating current must be pulsed, it is reasonable to assume that the ELF radiation it generates will also be pulsed. Pulsed ELF waves can be used to convey mechanical effects, vibrations at great distances through the Earth.[48]

Such technologies, operating in the 8-10 Hertz range, would be operating in the normal frequency range of human and animal brains, and thus be capable of a mind manipulation use, as well as for the purposes of probing and mapping the Earth's interior, or for more direct exploitation of instabilities.[49]

This implies something very significant to our expanding methodology for detecting the use of such generated and manipulated earthquakes: the presence prior or during such an event of low frequency electromagnetic waves, which would, in some cases, case precisely the type of air glow reported for the Tangshan earthquake, the glow typical of high ionization of the atmosphere and thus the exploitation of its plasma properties in the generation of powerful longitudinal waves. Indeed, such airglows were reported in September 1993 during the heavy flooding that took place in the American midwest that year.[50] Similar phenomena have been detected prior to some earthquakes:

> On 12 September 1989, magnetometers at Corralitos(near Monterey Bay, in California) detected unusual ultra-low frequency waves between 0.01 Hertz and 10 Hertz. This is the lowest range of ELF waves. these waves grew to about 30 times their first intensity, and finally subsided on 5 October 1989. On 17 October they suddenly appeared again at 2:00 pm local time, which signals so strong that they > went off the scale. Three hours later the San Francisco earthquake took place. On 29 March 1992, the Washington Times reported that 'satellites and ground sensors detected mysterious radio waves or related electrical and magnetic activity before major earthquakes in Southern California during 1986-7, Armenia in 1988, and Japan and Northern California in 1989. The 17 January 1994 earthquake in Los Angeles was also preceded by unusual radio waves and two sonic booms. These strange 'coincidences' have never been completely explained.[51]

As will be seen in the next section, this fact implies certain things for a methodology of determining when a technology may be in play in earthquake generation.

For the moment, however, we note that the Russian state Duma's Committees on International Affairs and Defense in August 2002 issued a report describing HAARP, and by implication, similar technologies and installations, as "a qualitatively new type of weapon" and left no doubt about the qualitative change it represented:

> Under the High Frequency Active Auroral Research Program (HAARP) the USA is creating new integral geophysical weapons that may influence the near-Earth medium with high-frequency radio waves. The significance of this qualitative leap could be compared to the transition from cold steel to firearms, or from conventional weapons to nuclear weapons. This new type of weapon differs from previous types in that the near-Earth medium becomes at once an object of direct influence and its component.[52]

Given the ability of plasmas—ionized gases—to generate longitundinal waves, however, it becomes possible that such transmitters could be used not only on the near-Earth medium for weather generation and manipulation, but for direct modification and probing of the Earth itself.

But what have nuclear weapons, longitudinal waves, earthquakes, and Tesla to do with each other? What really is the possible physics underlying them?

One possible answer is provided by retired U.S. Army lieutenant colonel Thomas E. Bearden, in a signal paper from 1981 entitled "Tesla's Secret and the Soviet Tesla Weapons." Here once again Bearden returns to the idea of the scalar potential, ϕ, of James Clerk

Maxwell, and to the idea that this potential represents an internal stress in the physical medium which is an "instantaneous stress" on the fabric of spacetime.[53] This stress, Bearden notes, referencing the now well-known 1903 paper of British physicist E.T. Whittaker, "On the Partial Differential Equations of Mathematical Physics," can be decomposed into longitudinal waves, and hence, that the scalar electrostatic potential is "a measure of the intensity of the virtual state flux through a 4-dimensional spacetime point."[54]

Unpacking all this, Bearden unfolds an profoundly interesting chain of reasoning, one with huge implications as we shall see. He begins by noting that electrical polarity, or charge, "is a 4-dimensional concept."[55] Particle charge, in turn, is intimately related to the spin of the particle. But mass, however, is something very different:

> Now mass is a spatial, 3-dimensional concept. Rigorously, mass does not exist in time—masstime exists in time. Mass and charge are thus of differing dimensionalities!
> Also, according to quantum mechanics, the charge of a particle—e.g., of an electron—is due to the continual flux of virtual particles given off and absorbed by the observable particle of mass. Thus charge also is conceptually a measure of the virtual flux density, and directly related to ϕ (the scalar electrostatic potential). Further, since the charge exists in time, it is the charge of a particle of spatial mass that gives it the property of masstime, or existing in time.[56]

From this, Bearden attempts to reconstruct, on the basis of Whittaker's 1903 paper, what Tesla's wireless beaming of power was actually doing. The field generated by the scalar potential ϕ, he noted, > need not involve observable mass accumulation, but only charge (virtual flowrate intensity) accumulation. Accumulated masses are like [56] Ibid., pp. 3-4. It should be noted that charge, mass, and spin are the three main things scientists look at in the identification of the many particles in the quantum mechanical zoo. It should be noted that the Higgs boson was first predicted in 1964, and that more recent developments of the theory indicate the possibility of more than one Higgs boson. See John A. Gowan, "Introduction to the Higgs Boson Papers," at http://www.johnagowan.org/sect16.html for a decent summary of links and papers.

> so many gallons of water; accumulated charge is like so much pressure on both the water (space) and the time in which the water is existing.
> Now, if one varies the (scalar electrostatic potential) solely as a point function, one would have a purely scalar complex longitudinal wave, and not a vector wave at all. This is the fundamentally new electrical wave that Tesla discovered in 1899.
>
> Rigorously, all vector fields are two-point functions and thus decomposable into two scalar fields, as Whittaker showed in 1903. It follows that any vector wave can be decomposed into two scalar waves. By implication, therefore, a normal transverse (electromagnetic) vector wave, (for example), must simply be two coupled scalar (Tesla) waves—and these scalars independently would be longitudinal if uncoupled…
> A tesla (scalar potential) wave—i.e. a massless wave in pure ϕ_0, the stress of the spacetime medium—would have very strange characteristics indeed. For one thing, since it moves in a complex 4-space, it has many more modes of movement than does a simple wave in 3-space.[57]

This requires a pause and a bit of unpacking. What Bearden is suggesting, behind all this dense language, is that charge is simply the measure of the intensity of virtual flux through any given point, and as such, since the intensity or density of a charge can vary, so can the virtual flow itself, or, to put it in more Kozyrevian terms, so can the degree of temporal flow itself.

Two or more longitudinal waves can thus be made to move through higher-dimensional or +3-spatial regions at different intensities or times, to converge at a particular point. If a triangle is the two-dimensional signature of a three-dimensional tetrahedron, then, how would one recognize such +3-space higher dimensional "longitudinal wave convergence" occurring in our three-dimensional world? Bearden's highly speculative answer is worth citing in full:

> Actually, a ϕ_4-wave (i.e., a scalar wave in four dimensional space, ed.) can and will interact with some of the other existing ϕ_4-waves in the medium transversed, and this interaction can involve pair-coupling into (electromagnetic) vector fields and waves, an interaction not presently in the electrodynamics theory. The result of scalar pair-coupling creates a finite amount of vector "drag" on the ϕ_4-wave, so it then has less than infinite velocity. However, if this drag is small due to limited > pair-coupling, the scalar wave's velocity through the slightly dragging medium still may be far greater than the speed of vector EM waves (light) in vacuum. On the other hand, if the pair-coupling is made severe, the ϕ-wave may move at a speed considerably below the speed of vector light waves in vacuum. The velocity of the ϕ_4-wave is thus both variable and controllable or adjustable (e.g., simply by varying its initial amplitude, which through a given medium changes the percentage of pair-coupling and hence the degree of drag on the scalar wave).[58]

We are now in the presence of a dilemma, one which we shall confront again in part three, and with a vengeance, namely, the admission that the speculative solution being offered does not exist in current electrodynamics, though it is clearly implied by Whittaker's 1903 paper, leads two possibilities open: (1) one is dealing with outright "pseudo-science", or (2) one is dealing with a suppressed science.

For the moment, let us assume the latter is true for the sake of argument, and allow Bearden himself to unpack what he is actually saying:

> An earthquake fault zone is such a scalar interferometer. Stresses and charge pileups exist in the plates on each side adjacent to the fault, with stress relief existing in the middle in the fault fracture itself.[59]
> Since the rock is locally nonlinear, the mechanical stresses and electrical currents in it are also locally nonlinear. This results in the generation of multiple frequencies of ϕ_4-waves from each side of the fault interferometer, yielding two complex Fourier expansion patterns of scalar potential waves…
> Since much of the piezoelectric material in the stressed rocks is quartz grains, the features of quartz are of particular interest. Each little quartz grain is itself highly stressed, and has stress cracks. It is therefore a little scalar interferometer. Further, quartz is transparent to infrared and ultraviolet; and the random orientation of all the quartz scalar interferometers may also form a Prigogine system far from thermodynamic equilibrium.[60]

[59] Ibid., pp. 9, 11.

[60] Ibid., pp. 11-12.

Recall here that the essence of geophysical warfare was to identify and capitalize on such instabilities. In other words, the two regions on each side of a fault represent the 3-space unfolding of two different scalar potentials, and the fault itself represents the "topological common surface" of the two, a surface of pure massless stress, which may be "defined" as the sum of stress of the two regions.

We noted earlier that rotating plasmas under stress can produce such longitudinal waves from transverse waves, or vice-versa. And here we come to the possible heart of a mystery that has been present in my books since The Giza Death Star and much more recently in The Grid of the Gods, and that is difficulty of yield-calculations of early thermonuclear tests. We now have another clue as to why these devices may be transducing or gating more energy into the reaction than can perhaps be accounted for by normal models, for in a standard thermonuclear device, two bombs are present, an atom bomb, which is used to generate the enormous radiation—in essence a highly charged longitudinal wave—required to set off a second fusion bomb, which itself generates, mere fractions of a second later, another enormous pulse. As these waves interact the reaction itself becomes a plasma scalar interferometer, plugged into the all other locally occurring stresses.

Bearden notes that all of this is "exciting, for it means that Tesla stress waves can affect either space or time individually, or both space and time simultaneously, or even oscillate back and forth between primarily affecting time and primarily affecting space,"[61] the reason being because

> All of these exist in the flow of time, and they are affected if the time stream in which they exist is affected. This was the awful secret that Tesla partially discovered by 1900… Thus by transmitting a scalar standing wave into the earth, he could easily tap the fiery scalar fields produced in the molten core of the planet itself, turning them into ordinary electromagnetic energy. In such a case, a single generator would enable anyone to put up a simple antenna and extract all the free energy desired.
> When Tesla's alarmed financial backers discovered this was his real intent, they considered him a dangerous madman and found it necessary to ruthlessly stop him at all costs. And so his financial support was withdrawn, he was harassed in his more subtle patent

---

> efforts (and the patents themselves were adulterated), and his name gradually was removed from all the electrical textbooks.[62]

However, we must now begin to question the standard explanations for the financial power's suppression of Tesla, his plans, and his technology, for as is now evident—and as would have been evident to those powerful men by dint of the expert advice they would have been able to buy—the weaponization potential of Tesla's devices and concepts were enormous.

Likewise, the geopolitical consequences in a politically divided world were also enormous. For the elite, a means therefore had to be found to suppress the public development not only of the technology, but to erase the concepts that underwrote it from public attention. In this we may perhaps discern the real beginning of the breakaway civilization. Of course, if one has been following the ongoing story of Nazi secret weapons that I and other researchers have been developing, or the interpretation of postwar Soviet research that Col. Bearden has developed over so many years, this effort was, by the end of World War Two, ultimately unsuccessful as it became evident that many different factions—not all of them in the orbit of the Anglo-American financial elite—had acquired and were using such technologies.

But there is another implication that the total culture of total power of the breakaway civilization would immediately understand, if anything close to Bearden's speculations on fault lines as scalar interferometers was understood in Tesla's time (and we have already seen Tesla's remarks indicating that something like it may have been in his mind). And for this, we need a brief excursion into ancient times and modern interests.

c. Pyramid Possibilities

Obviously, what is true of naturally occurring fault lines in the Earth as common surfaces of an interferometer of two regions of a nonlinear medium under stress, would be true of any such artificially created "fault" created by using nonlinear quartz-bearing rock, and placing it under enormous stress, such as pyramids, which would be, on Bearden's view, massive man-made scalar interferometers. Indeed, such conceptualization formed the basis of my own thinking behind my hypothesis that the Great Pyramid may have represented a sophisticated weapon system of mass destruction.[63]

[62] Ibid., p. 18.

Recently alternative researcher Nick Redfern published an important and intriguing book about the military-industrial complex's interest in ancient archaeology, The Pyramids and the Pentagon: The Government's Top Secret Pursuit of Mystical relics, Ancient Astronauts, and Lost Civilizations. In it, Redfern states an intriguing thesis:

> The controversy-filled theory that a number of humankind's most impressive and legendary constructions, such as the pyramids of Egypt, the similar structures that pepper whole swathes of South and Central America, and England's Stonehenge, were built via the use of fantastic technologies long lost to the fog of time, is one that provokes a great deal of interest and attention, as well as loud and vexed voices.
> In essence, the amazing theory suggests that the raising and placing of massive stone blocks in eras long past was achieved by the manipulation and nullification of gravitational forces or anti-gravity, in simple terms…
> Even more sensationally, the U.S. military has taken a keen and provable interest in these particular matters and beliefs. The story continues that the Pentagon has secretly taken much of its inspiration in investigating these undeniably alternative issues from studying the work of authors in the field of ancient astronaut research.[64]

For our purposes, we would observe only that such an interest in ancient things would be the logical development of the "total culture of total power", especially if it adhered to the view that there existed a technologically sophisticated civilization on planet Earth in high antiquity, a civilization that encoded its science in sophisticated myths, metaphors, texts, and monuments.

I have argued this view in many books, and believe it to have been a functioning ideological component of another great contemporary breakaway civilization, Nazi Germany. Moreover, with the post-war deals with the Axis devils recounted in the preface and in my other books, this interest by the military-industrial complex of the USA may not only represent the total culture of total power of that breakaway civilization, it may represent the legacy of that Nazi influence in its postwar development and formation.

[63] It should be noted that all stone pyramids are natural interferometers, and as such, may be components of a vast machine in their own right, perhaps of a defensive nature, perhaps of an offensive one. See also my blog "More Fun with the 'Area 51 Pyramid': How to Get to Unnamed Road, NV," July 7, 2012, http://gizadeathstar.com/2012/07/more-fun-with-the-area-51-pyramid-how-to-get-to-unnamed-road-nv/

[64] Nick Redfern, The Pyramids and the Pentagon: The Government's Top Secret Pursuit of Mystical Relics, Ancient Astronauts, and Lost Civilizations (New Page Books, 2012), pp. 65-66.

In any case, Redfern highlights a little-known fact that would have been of interest to this total culture of total power, the text The Meadows of Gold and Mines of Gems, by the ninth-century Arab adventurer and world traveler, Abu al-hasan ali al-Mas'udi.[65] In it, al-Mas'udi:

> recorded tantalizing, centuries-old lore that had come his way during his explorations (that) strongly suggested the pyramids were created by what today we would most likely refer to as some form of levitation.
> The incredible story that al-Mas'udi uncovered went like this: When building the pyramids, their creators carefully positioned what was described as a magical papyrus underneath the edges of the mighty stones that were to be used in the construction process. Then, one by one, the stones were struck by what was curiously, and rather enigmatically, described only as a rod of metal. Lo and behold, the stones then slowly began to rise into the air, and like dutiful soldiers unquestioningly following orders, proceeded in slow, methodical, single-file fashion a number of feet above a paved pathway surrounded on both sides by similar, mysterious metal rods. For around 150 feet, al-Mas'udi noted, the gigantic stones moved forward, usually with nothing more than the very gentlest of prods from the keeper of the mysterious rod to ensure they stayed on track, before finally, and very softly, settling back to the ground.
> At that point, the process was duly repeated. The stones were struck once more, rose up from the surface, and again traveled in the desired direction, for yet another 150 feet or so. And so the strange, repetitive task continued, time and time again, until all of the stones finally reached their ultimate destination. Then, in a distinctly far more complex feat, the stones were struck again, but this time in a fashion that caused them to float even higher into the air. Then, when they reached the desired point, they were carefully and with incredible ease, manipulated into place, one-by-one, by hand and nothing else, until the huge pyramid in question was finally completed.[66]

For our purposes, the implications of this story, if true, in conjunction with Mr. Redfern's thesis, and taken against the backdrop of the Nazis' evident interest in the militarization of ancient esoteric lore and tradition represented by Heinrich Himmler's creation of the SS Ahnenerbedienst, is that a similar secret and interdisciplinary "team" or unit would exist within the breakaway civilization, tasked with the examination of ancient texts and monuments, all for the purpose of gaining further knowledge and technologies of its hegemony. Indeed, the possibility arises that it may see itself as the deliberate attempt to recreate that civilization of high antiquity.

B. The Methodology of the Indications of Geophysical Wars, and Disturbing Class Two Stellar Possibilities

1. Methodological Implications

Fascinating as such a possibility may be, however, our attention must now return to the methodological implications that the previous chapters have unfolded. How would one detect the actual deployment of such plausibly deniable technologies in actual use, deployed in actual "covert wars"? From all that has preceded, we conclude that any such method of detection would in effect be an interdisciplinary effort, coordinating the following two broad classes of data:

1) In the occurrence of any natural disaster, such as a tsunami, earthquake, or severe weather storm, were there antecedent technological signatures, such as extremely low frequency broadcasts, unusual activity by HAARP or other ionospheric heaters, or nuclear tests? In the case of earthquakes particularly, how deep or shallow was the epicenter, and how sharp was the initial P-wave?
2) Was there unusual stock, bond, or currency market activity in the area, country, or region affected prior to the event? or, similarly, or in conjunction with it or shortly thereafter, was there stepped up or unusual political activity prior to the event in question? In either case, who was behind the activity? Or have any nations made public statements to the effect that such events are engineered?

As cases in point, it is worth noting that in the wake of the devastating earthquake that struck Haiti, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez appeared on officially-backed Russian Today TV, and stated that the quake was engineered by the U.S. More recently Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadenijad has accused the USA of engineering Iran's draught.

Peculiar as these claims may seem, there is a corroboration that oddly recently appeared in the financial and securities markets: the weather derivative, which is a handy instrument to have around if one also has the instrumentalities of weather modification.

In this respect, there is one "hugely stunning" example of exactly the kind of pattern that this methodology implies, and this comes from former Bush Administration Assistant Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, Catherine Austin Fitts, in an interview on November 26, 2011 with Bonnie Faulkner entitled "Unpacking Mr. Global." There Ms. Fitts put the connection of the methodology with hidden technologies, black budgets, disaster-and-market manipulation with some force:

> Catherine Austin Fitts (11:25): "Right. And I think the biggest problem is starting at the end of World War II, we created a financial mechanism through the CIA Act and the National Security Act in combination and then with a variety of Executive Directives that allowed private corporations to be the beneficiary of that money. So, you've created between those steps, you created a financial mechanism where Government can borrow money and use that money to give money to private corporations on a non-accountable basis to own and control the most dazzling newest, hottest technology on the planet. And Government and elected representatives lost control of the technology. And as frustrated as we can sometimes get with Congress or the Federal Government, the reality is the Federal Government and Congress do not control that technology. We now have private corporations in control of that technology. And we have what I call a Breakaway Civilisation. We have a group of people who have so much money and so much power and, literally, don't feel under any compunction to obey the laws of the Constitution or any other laws for that matter."
> Bonnie Faulkner: "And what kind of technology are we talking about?"
> Catherine Austin Fitts (12:43): "Well, that's the question. We can only speculate. But I think we have the technology to control the weather or influence the weather. I think we have technology that can trigger earthquakes and tsunamis. I think we have invisible weaponry, certainly, that can basically invade any and all privacy. And we have computer systems that can hack banks and on and on and on. We have very, very powerful technology."
> Bonnie Faulkner: "Yes. And I'm sure they're rolling a lot of it out in these wars that we're not even aware of."

> Catherine Austin Fitts (13:16): “Right. Well, I’ll never forget. I have a wonderful friend who wanted to buy a world bond fund, and this is many years ago, and they asked me to do a search. And I looked and I looked. And finally I found two that I could kinda stomach. And, at the time, I wasn’t big on world bond funds, but, so they bought them. One of them had 15% of the money in Indonesian sovereign debt. And they bought them. And then, about a week after they bought them, the one with the Indonesian sovereign debt dropped by 15% overnight, massive insider trading. The market’s calm. Interest rates are the same. There’s no reason, nothing. And we called the sponsor. And we try and ask questions. We were like, ‘What is going on?’ I couldn’t fathom it. It was like the strangest thing I’d ever seen. A week later the Indonesian Tsunami happened and I realised they knew. They knew it was coming. They knew. How’d they know? And it’s funny ‘cos I’m a very happy person. I literally lay down and thought for a week. I thought, ‘How do you manage money in a world where people know that a tsunami’s gonna happen a week later and keep it to themselves and just trade on the inside information?’[67]

Fitts’ remarks return us once again to the implications of the first part of this book, namely, that if there is such insider trading, it is based upon access to the knowledge that such technologies exist, and will be scheduled for use.[68]

[67] Catherine Austin Fitts and Bonnie Faulkner, “Unpacking Mr. Global, Part Two,” http://mediaroots.org/mr-transcript-unpacking-mr.-global-part-2.php.

[68] This author has entertained the suspicion that the Haiti quake was not only the product of a technology, but that the subsequent earthquake near the region of Paral, Chile—close to the area of the ex-Nazi compound of Colonia Dignidad, was a response, and thus, that this was an “earthquake” war. Similarly, I have maintained a similar possibility existed for the devastating earthquakes that his the southern Soviet Union just prior to the German reunification, and I have maintained similar suspicions that the Fukushima earthquake and tsunami may have been induced by a technology. In the case of Haiti, it was a well-known haven and money-laundering point between the West and various other factions, and striking it could conceivably have dealt a blow to some activities. The earthquake in Chile, and its location, speaks for itself. In the case of the Soviet earthquakes prior to the reunification of Germany, the possible political background speaks for itself. In the case of Fukushima, the Japanese government had, prior to the event, sent clear signals to the USA that it was moving toward a greater opening to Asia and particularly China, while simultaneously “requesting” in strong language that the USA shut down its base in Okinawa. Since the Fukushima tragedy, tensions in Japanese and Chinese relations have risen again in response to the Japanese government’s inexplicable reversal of its prior policy.

2. A Brief Look at the Solar, or Stellar, Implications

There is one final implication of the technologies and concepts briefly reviewed in this chapter, and it is the stellar, or solar one. We have already noted that a rotating plasma medium, such as would be obtained by the ionization of the Earth's atmosphere either in localized cyclonic systems, or in the more generalized heating of the atmosphere as it rotates and blows around the Earth, is an ideal medium for the creation of longitudinal from transverse waves, and vice versa. Given Bearden's speculations that scalar waves "travel" in +3-space, their resonance effects could therefore effect the activity of the Sun itself, implying a commensurate expansion of the methodology outlined in the previous section. In other words, the very concepts and technologies that we have argued in this and the previous chapter that lie on the verge of Kardashev Class One civilization capabilities, have even deeper implications and possibilities, in that they might lie on the cusp of Class Two capabilities as well.[69]

The technologies outlined in this part of the book have led us to an unusual place, for not only does the doctrine of full spectrum dominance impel the development of a total culture of total power, that culture in turn drives the necessity to create the bureaucratic instrumentalities for the pursuit of power from outer space to the ancient past. As we have seen, it implies that its real beginnings may lie even further back in our history than the Second World War, with the advent of the modern age and the man who made our electrical world—with all its vast potential for scalar good and evil—possible: Nikola Tesla. There is, as we shall discover in the next part, another suggestive set of facts to corroborate this view, and the connection to UFOs. But first, a brief review is in order in the next chapter.

---

[69] It should also be observed that the technologies and agendas that co-author Scott D. deHart and I outlined in our book Transhumanism: A Grimoire of Alchemical Agendas (Feral House, 2012), also directly compel the emergence of a culture of a breakaway civilization, as we repeatedly observe in that book.

COUNTERFEITING CONFLICT FOR FUN, PROFIT AND WORLD DOMINATION:

CONCLUSIONS TO PART TWO

"If we also consider the possibility of covert breakthroughs in propulsion technology, and the 'off the grid' nature of the deep-black world itself, we come to the possibility that we are dealing with, in effect, a 'breakaway civilization.' One with loose connections at various points to the open civilization of humanity, but with great independence, secrecy, and a monopoly of certain key scientific secrets."

Richard M. Dolan[1]

Certain key scientific secrets: with these words of Richard Dolan, and the survey undertaken in the previous chapters, we now arrive at the point where we must pause and reprise the argument thus far. In Part One, we observed that the financial arrangements surveyed there suggested a kind of "American national-security apparatus gone international," one which comprised the following sectors:

1) The financial component (i.e. the central and prime banks);
2) The corporate component (i.e., the corporations conducting the research to be outlined in future chapters);
3) The intelligence and covert operations component, represented by the heavy presence of figures like Ed Lansdale in the financial activities outlined in previous chapters; and,
4) The military component.

We also noted that the vast scale of financial fraud and industrial scale counterfeiting implied a technological development requiring such funds, above and beyond the needs dictated by the creation of a hidden system of finance, a "covert slush fund", for covert operations activities.

Additionally, we also observed three major "factions" within this structure as well:

[1] Richard M. Dolan, UFOs and the National Security State, Vol. 2: the Cover-Up Exposed, 1973-1991 (Keyhole Publishing Company, 2009), pp. 564-565.

1) An American component, represented by the interface between the corporate, financial, military, and intelligence-covert operations national security structure that we have seen in play, and particularly in chapter 4;
2) A postwar European-international Fascist or Nazi component, deeply interlocked with corporate and financial Europe, and as I have indicated elsewhere, with the criminal underground or Mafia drug trade;
3) A postwar Asian elite, comprised largely of the same nexus of relationships between the Japanese imperial family, the political and corporate elites of Japan, and a criminal underground.

The presence of all these factions and the Cold War necessity of the containment and rollback of Communism created a culture of covert operations governed by four principles, each of which constituted a stage in the defeat of Communism: (1) containment, (2) confrontation, (3) rollback, (4) defeat.

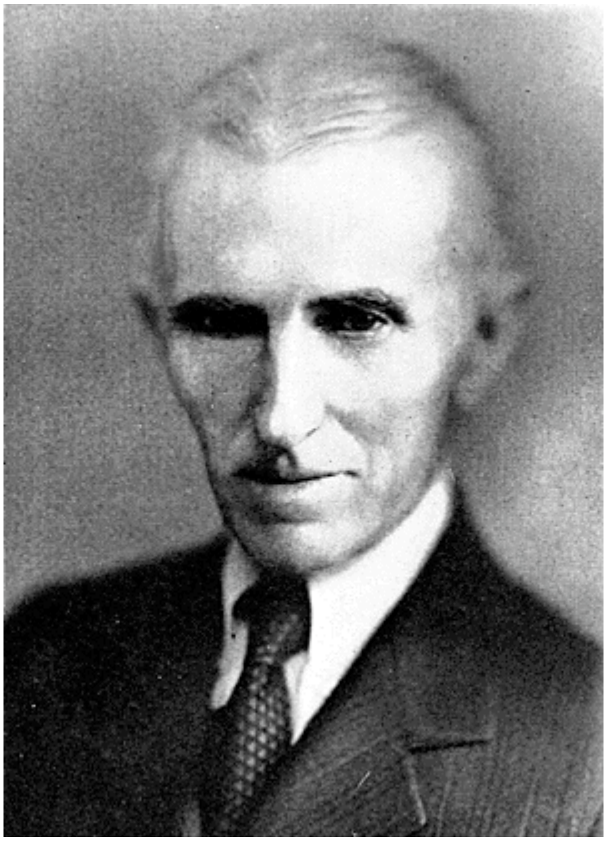
We have also argued, however, that it is this culture of covert operations that, in part, inspired the types of technologies surveyed here in Part Two, the technologies by which to fight a covert war with plausible deniability via the manipulation of natural geophysical systems from the weather to fault lines, to the human mind.

These technologies, as we have seen, implied an unusually interdisciplinary methodology for their use in actual operations, and it is best to repeat them:

1) In the occurrence of any natural disaster, such as a tsunami, earthquake, or severe weather storm, were there antecedent technological signatures, such as extremely low frequency broadcasts, unusual activity by HAARP or other ionospheric heaters, or nuclear tests? In the case of earthquakes particularly, how deep or shallow was the epicenter, and how sharp was the initial P-wave?
2) Was there unusual stock, bond, or currency market activity in the area, country, or region affected prior to the event? Or, similarly, or in conjunction with it, was there stepped up or unusual political activity prior to the event in question? In either case, who was behind the activity? Or have any nations made public statements to the effect that such events are engineered?

Note the implication of the last point: for unusual activity, whether monetary, or more importantly, political activity, could also be interpreted as a message from one party to another, and this idea of sending messages in conjunction with some of these technologies will become a very crucial point in the next and final part of this book, for now, finally, we come to the what Richard Dolan, and many others, believe to be the core issue driving the postwar formation of the breakaway civilization: the UFO.

But here again, the beginnings of that vast expansion of the postwar covert operations and black technologies capability may have had a much earlier rudimentary beginning, a beginning “coincidental” with the emergence of Tesla’s world-transforming technologies, and the early suppression of some of them.



Nikola Tesla in Later Life

PART THREE:
COVERT WARS AND CELESTIAL PSYOPS

"Two years later, in 1967, Robert Salas was stationed at Malmstrom Air Force Base in Montana. The former Air Force captain was monitoring a launch-control center equipped with 10 nuclear Minuteman missiles when UFOs appeared in the sky above them just as something unexpected occurred to the 10 defense weapons. "'As we looked at the display board in front of us, the missiles began going into an unlaunchable, or no-go, mode. They couldn't be launched— it went from green to red,' Salas told AOL, explaining how it was extraordinary that so many missiles could malfunction at the same time."

"'The overarching issue is that the U.S. government will not admit the reality of UFOs and the fact that they are superior craft piloted by unknown entities (who) have a distinct and ongoing interest in this nation's nuclear weapons program,' (Robert) Hastings speculated."

AIRSHIP ARCANA AND THE DELLSCHAU DILEMMA:

SECRET SOCIETIES AND SECRET SCIENCE

"Though the country observed the great airshow in 1897, the 1897 airship mystery may have actually began in 1840's New York and it may have ended in Houston in 1923 with the death of Charles A.A. Dellschau."
Michael Busby[1]

UFOs are not unique to modern human history, and indeed, they may in a certain sense be viewed as a rather common occurrence throughout most ages. Additionally, they may not only be viewed as a kind of historical commonplace, but moreover may also be viewed as perhaps having the uncanny ability to appear at crucial junctures in human history, perhaps even as influencing the course of events at those junctures.

It is recorded, for example, that during Alexander the Great's siege of the crucial city of Tyre, five "flying shields" were seen by both the attacking Macedonians and the defenders in the city, until one of the "shields" shot a "lightning bolt" which destroyed one of the walls of the city's fortifications, allowing Alexander's army to storm and capture the fortress.[2] There are some who believe that Ezekiel's vision of wheels within wheels, or Constantine's vision prior to his victorious campaign to reunify the Roman Empire and convert to Christianity, was caused by a UFO.

The famous French Ufologist Dr. Jacques Vallee has recorded incidents of UFOs in mediaeval Europe in 1034, where a cigar-shaped UFO was sighted, and observed to change course,[3] to a mediaeval Japanese incident in 1235, where a General Yoritsume and his troops watched a dazzling display of lights performing some impossible maneuvers in the sky: in other words, they were not stars. General Yoritsume ordered one of the first recorded scientific investigations of the phenomenon, and, in a response that can only be qualified as a mediaeval Japanese version of the U.S. Air Force's Project Bluebook, Yoritsume was reassured by his scientists that the phenomenon was merely the wind making the stars move.[4]

Form 1347-1350, Western Europe experienced the Black Death, the massive epidemic of bubonic plague that was, according to some, brought from the Orient by the trading ships of Venice and Genoa, which has, of course, fueled speculations and conspiracy theories by some that this was the deliberate act of a corrupt financial oligarchy already touting the idea that the world was over-populated. But there is another possible story, and it is a disturbing one:

> While conventional science tells us that the fierce pandemic was caused by bacteria carried by rat fleas, there were also persistent reports from the time of strange flying objects moving low through the sky, leaving a trail of suspicious waving a vapor in their wake. Wherever and whenever these objects were seen, the plague would soon break out in that area.
> Other strange occurrences while the plague swept Europe included reports of "comets" flashing through the troubled night, strange animals washing up on European shores and many times, sounds like thunder being heard even when the skies were clear.[5]

Two things served to change the pace of sighting and reporting of the UFO, however, and these were the industrial revolution, and the advent of technologies like the telegraph and later telephone, that made the near-instantaneous transmission of information across great distances possible, and which made the potential of a technological emulation of such sightings possible.

Nothing so signaled this shift as the outbreak in the USA and Europe as the great "airship" mystery of the post-Civil War period of the second half of the nineteenth century.

A. Airship Arcana

Most people tend to dismiss the nineteenth airship mystery as being related to the question and culture of a breakaway civilization, but as will now be seen, it is deeply related to the question of its historical origins and the possible motivations behind it, for indeed, the sightings that broke out in the USA, especially during the 1890s, raised the public awareness of the UFO for the first time, even though these sightings were not at that time called UFOs. Much more importantly, the sightings impressed upon the public mind the implications of two things: technology, and its secret development.

Researcher Michael Busby has written what is probably the indispensible study of the airship mystery, and his work will be reviewed closely here, for it is by a careful contemplation of its contents that the shadowy outlines of a breakaway civilization, in its infancy, begin to emerge.

Busby notes even though there was "ample debate concerning the flying machines' origins in 1897," the year of the most concentrated and numerous sightings, "including the supposition that the machines were of extraterrestrial design, all of the 1896-97 newspaper accounts referred to the flying objects as airships."[6] Besides this consistency, there are numerous others. Busby observes that by employing "the numerous, dated newspaper accounts as a timeline," the sightings begin to follow "an easily identifiable path beginning in California, proceeding east to the Midwest (Illinois, Indiana, Michigan), then changing to a southerly course and traversing Missouri, Kansas, and Oklahoma before arriving in Texas and Louisiana in April 1897."[7] More importantly, these reports also evidence a similar pattern:

> People saw the airship, or airship(s), at night, sometimes following a straight line, sometimes stopping then starting again then changing course before disappearing over the horizon. The descriptions of the size, shape, and sounds associated with the airship(s) are similar, regardless of the location and date of the sighting.[8]

This pattern is evident throughout the over 1200 newspaper reports, beginning in November 1896 and ending in May 1897 in Texas.[9]

It would be wrong to assume that this pattern was confined to generalities. On the contrary, it included specifics; newspaper accounts included descriptions of speeds and "swishing sounds,"[10] searchlights and flashes of light coming from the "airships," and the obvious ability to maneuver independently and under apparent intelligent direction,[11] sudden accelerations and a cigar-shape or Zeppelin-like appearance,[12] descriptions of flashes, sparks, and electrical motors,[13] descriptions of "sails" and "fans" projecting from cigar shapes,[14] flapping wings,[15] and estimations of their dimensions, and speculations upon their mode of propulsion and potentials for military application.[16] There were even some descriptions of these "airships" traveling at "meteor-like speed" and even of little green, or burnt-black men.[17]

More importantly, however, were the strangely human aspects of the mystery. For example, a majority of the sightings appeared to follow railroad lines from one locale to another, and as railroad stations were often the local telegraph office, news of a sighting often was first reported by passengers on trains, and quickly telegraphed from one location to another.[18]

1. "Contact": The Crash and Recovery Meme:
a. Aurora, TX and the Death of an ET?

The airship mystery, like its later 20th century counterpart, the UFO enigma, likewise has its own set of ambiguities about potential crash and recovery scenarios and this ambiguity is reflected in stories of the airship that can clearly be construed in an extraterrestrial sense, and those which give clear recounting of landed airships, with human crews, speaking English, making repairs.

Surely the strangest aspect of the entire airship case in this instance is the account of the crash of one of the airships in Aurora, Texas, on April 17, 1897. Here is the account of what may, in fact, be the first modern, and real, Roswell, as reported on April 19, 1897, by the Dallas Morning News and the Galveston News:

> Aurora, Wise Co, Tex., April 17. —(To The News)—About 6 o'clock this morning the early risers of Aurora were astonished at the sudden appearance of the airship which has been sailing through the country.

> It was traveling due north, and much nearer the earth than ever before. Evidently some of the machinery was out of order, for it was making a speed of only ten or twelve miles an hour and gradually settling toward the earth. It sailed directly over the public square, and when it reached the north part of town collided with the tower of Judge Proctor's windmill and went to pieces with a terrific explosion, scattering debris over several acres of ground, wrecking the windmill and water tank and destroying the judge's flower garden.

> The pilot of the ship is supposed to have been the only one on board, and while his remains are badly disfigured, enough of the original has been picked up to show that he was not an inhabitant of this world. Mr. T.J. Weems, the United States Signal Service officer at this place gave it as his opinion that he was a native of the planet Mars.
> Papers found on his person—evidently the record of his travels—are written in some unknown hieroglyphics, and cannot be deciphered. The ship was too badly wrecked to form any conclusion as to its construction or motive power. >
> The town is full of people today who are viewing the wreck and gathering specimens of the strange metal from the debris. The pilot's funeral will take place at noon tomorrow. S.E. Hayden[19]

Busby makes the following comment about the statements of the U.S. Signals Service officer, T.J. Weems, and his opinion that the disfigured body originated from Mars, i.e., was extraterrestrial in origin:

> Many people quickly dismiss this account because of the claim that an alien body was recovered. But, why would a government official, probably with no long-term ties to the community, lie about the recovery of a body? Was this a gaffe by a United States official, similar to another famous incident at Roswell, New Mexico, fifty years later?[20]

I continue to have difficulty believing that ET can travel through the blackness of interplanetary space with his advanced technology, only to crash it into windmills in Texas, so the same question might be turned around: could we be looking, again, at an attempt by a government official to obfuscate a truth—the recovery of a body—by misdirecting attention as to the origin of the technology recovered? This possibility may be indicated by the article's reference to a notebook covered in "hieroglyphics," an important point as we shall discover in section B.

Busby himself hints at other interpretations to the crash at the beginning of his book:

> Were the (appearances) of these strange flying vessels and the purported crash of an airship at Aurora, Texas, a prelude to the alleged events that occurred fifty years later near Roswell, New Mexico? Or, did an epidemic of mass hysteria sweep a good proportion of the country? Were the stories the product of newspaper writers' imaginations? Were the flying machines a secret government project (and was there a subsequent government cover-up)?[21]

In the beginning of his book, Busby answers that by focusing his research on the Texas sightings and the Aurora crash, events which he calls "the grand finale" of the airship sightings, that clues are found that contain the answers.[22]

These clues lie in the contextual details surrounding the Aurora crash, and it is worth citing Busby extensively:

> If the Aurora sighting and crash occurred in the absence of any other airship sighting in the area then it would be much easier to consign the account to the heap of known hoaxes. However, there were numerous airship sightings—more than thirty were reported in the North Texas region, including Rhome and Tioga—the evening before the crash. Rhome and Tioga are close by Aurora. Two airship sightings were made at 3:00 A.M. on the morning of the crash, one in Dallas and one in Ladonia. Also, another sighting of an airship said to be experiencing mechanical difficulties, occurred in Stephenville at some early, indeterminate hour before the crash. With so many reported airship sightings nearby, one cannot summarily dismiss the Aurora account.
> One of the sightings near Aurora is of particular interest. An airship was seen near Stephenville early on the morning, but before 6:00 A.M., of the crash. The airship was observed on the ground experiencing mechanical problems by many distinguished citizens shortly prior to the Aurora crash. the airship was previously observed on the ground only when it was experiencing mechanical difficulties or the crew needed to replenish their water supply. Stephenville is sixty-eight miles south of Aurora.[23]

[22] Ibid.

[23] Ibid., pp. 125-126.

By correlating various Texas and Oklahoma sightings accounts and directions, Busby concluded that they indicated the possibility of a base near Sherman, Texas, north of Dallas and close to the Oklahoma border.[24]

With this in mind, Busby observes that the Aurora crash takes on a different flavor when viewed in this context:

> If my supposition is correct, that the pilot was trying to get to his daytime hideout, why was he flying over Aurora if he came from Stephenville? If the daytime hideout was north and east of Sherman, as I predict, he could have taken a more direct approach by going more northeast from Stephenville. It seems reasonable to think that a pilot on a ship experiencing difficulties would want to go in as direct a line as possible to home base. In that case, a ship in Stephenville would not fly over Aurora. But let's look a little closer at the issue.
> A plausible explanation for the airship's presence over Aurora the morning of the crash is that the pilot, after leaving Stephenville, did not want to fly over the large cities of Fort Worth and Dallas in the daytime. Remember, the airships avoided flying in the daylight for several good reasons. Flying over the metropolitan areas in full daylight offered the guntotin' (sic) citizens an opportunity to "puncture the air department" of both the airship and the airmen with their shootin' irons. The only accounts of daytime sightings occurred when an airship was on the ground undergoing repairs and then it was seen by relatively few people.[25]

It is this aspect of the airship mystery—sightings of grounded ships undergoing repairs, and even actual contact with their crews by witnesses—that begins to put us in touch with what may have been the first phase in the development of a breakaway civilization.

b. Contact with Human Crews

Just slightly more than a week before the Aurora, Texas crash, the Dallas Morning News reported on April 10, 1897, a story dated the previous day from Paris, Texas. The story was short, but highly significant:

> Paris, Texas, April 9. —For several days The News has contained specials from different points stating that parties had an airship in the > night. A man named McKnight has been working on an airship at U.S. Marshal Williams' ranch for some time and it is claimed he has been traveling around by night in his ship. While McKnight will not corroborate the statement, many who are in a position to know say his aerial navigation has at last become a success.[26]

This is the first suggestive hint that one might be looking at a special project of some sort, one, perhaps, involving personnel of the U.S. government.

The Aurora crash was not a unique event in the history airship mystery, for merely four days previously, in April 13, in Kalamazoo County, Michigan, two local residents, both former soldiers, had heard a sound like the explosion of "heavy ordnance," and later investigation turned up debris which appeared to be "part of some electric appliance" and a "propeller blade of some very light material," which might have been aluminum.[27] In another sighting near Dallas, the day after the Aurora crash, witnesses reported an airship at a mere 200 feet altitude. One man saw three men on board, along with "something he took for a large Newfoundland dog," and heard speech "but could not understand what they said. From the tone of voice he took them to be Spaniards or Mexicans."[28] Clearly, the description of the event and occupants was of a human crew.

On Friday, April 16, 1897, one witness spotted a grounded airship in a remote clearing, and a crewman making repairs with a hammer and chisel.[29] And on the day of the Aurora crash, yet another Texan saw a grounded cigar-shaped airship, and three men of its crew, two of whom went to work on its "rigging," while the third called to the witness and asked him to mail some letters for him! When the witness began to take notes of the encounter, he was told not to report about it, and that the crew was doing "experiments" and hoped to "revolutionize travel and transportation."[30] This is a significant sighting and report, because it tends again to confirm the view that the airships represented a secret experimental project of some sort.

[26] cited in Michael Busby, Solving the 1897 Airship Mystery, p. 31, emphasis added. Busby also notes on p. 32 that a fire destroyed the records of the local 1890 census, and hence, one cannot corroborate a McKnight in or near Paris, Texas. Busby also observes, however, that there was a Charles McKnight residing in Sherman in the 1870 census.

[27] Ibid., pp. 95-96.

[28] Ibid., p. 99, Busby's emphases. Citing The Dallas Morning News, April 19, 1897, p. 5.

[29] Ibid., p. 73.

[30] Ibiid., p. 89.

This view is dramatically confirmed by a story that ran in the Dallas Morning News on April 19, 1897, and this time, the story was significant for naming the names not only of the witnesses, but some of those of the "crew" or the mechanism's inventors. The story, initially reported on April 17, 1897 from Stephenville, Texas, by C.L. McIlhany, indicated that he and a number of prominent citizens of the town saw a cigar-shaped airship on the ground. The newspaper article went on to state:

> (The airship) consists of a cigar shaped body about sixty feet in length, to which is attached two immense aeroplanes, and the motive power is an immense wheel at each end, in appearance much like a metallic windmill. It is driven by an immense electric engine, which derives it(s) power from storage batteries. The crew consisted, as stated, of two men who gave their names as S.E. Tillman and A.E. Dolbar. They report they have been making an experimental trip to comply with a contract with certain capitalists of New York, who are backing them.[31]

Note three critical things. Firstly, the propulsion appeared to be via propellers, but electrically powered ones, which would be one reason so many sightings exist of people having contact with the crew of the airships, who request water, presumably for recharging the ships' batteries. This would be a crucial reason for why so many airships appeared to follow railroad lines, for water towers to replenish their steam engines would be spaced at regular intervals. Secondly, electrically powered airships—and let it be recalled that within this time frame, Tesla was making similar claims—would not require petroleum. Tesla would, of course, perform his famous Colorado Springs experiments a year later, and upon his return to New York City, would begin his proposal for the wireless transmission of power, which, as he himself indicated, could power flight. Thirdly, and finally, it is clearly and explicitly stated in the article itself that the airships were a private and semi-secret development by "certain capitalists of New York," a fact which, when combined with the earlier cited reported about a development on lands belonging to a member of the U.S. executive branch (the Marshalls' service), exhibits precisely the same outlines of the breakaway civilization that emerges after World War Two.

2. "Wilson"

Tillman and Dolbar were not the only names that were mentioned by reports of sightings of grounded airships and contacts with their crews. By far one of the most recurring mysteries is the identity of the mysterious "Mr. Wilson" who so often makes an appearance in reports of contact with airship crews.[32] For example, The Houston Daily Post of April 21, 1897, reported that a Mr. J.R. Ligon of Beaumont, Texas, witnessed a grounded airship and interacted with its crew:

> "I and my son Charley drove home at 11 o'clock Monday night," said Mr. Ligon, "and were unhitching the horse when we saw lights in the Johnson pasture, a few hundred yards distance. We went there to investigate and discovered four men moving around a large dark object, and when I hailed them they answered and asked if they could get some water. I told them that they could. They came to my house, each bringing two baskets, and after filling them, started to return. I accosted one of the men and he told me his name was Wilson and that he and his companions were traveling in a flying machine. They were returning from a trip out on the gulf and were now headed toward Iowa where the airship was built."
> Mr. Ligon says he accompanied the men to the ship, and describes it as being 130 feet long and 20 feet wide. It was propelled by four large wings, two on either side, and steered by propellers attached to the bow and stern, electricity being the power used. The hull of the ship is made of steel and contains apartments into which compressed air is pumped when the ship is in action. The ship carries a water ballast that is pumped to the bow when it is desired to bring the vessel to the earth and to the stern when the course is skyward. Mr. Ligon says the workings of the ship were thus described to him by the man Wilson, who also stated that this ship was only one of five that had been built in a quiet Iowa village.[33]

The story, at first glance, may seem to be describing some sort of eccentric zeppelin, but upon careful reflection, is really describing something unusual, indeed, improbable, and quite remarkable, namely a steel airship, with a quantity of water and electrical equipment, both weighty and bulky items, and compressed air.

[32] "Wilson" becomes the main character in William Harbison's novel of Nazi flying saucer development, Genesis.

[33] Michael Busby, Solving the 1897 Airship Mystery, pp. 169-170, emphasis Busby's.

So what, exactly, provided this ungainly contraption its lift!? As we shall shortly discover, the answer to this question is even more improbable than the descriptions of the craft and the cumbersome, awkward questions they pose.

"Wilson" made his second appearance in an article of the Dallas Morning News of May 16, 1897, where he was mentioned in a lengthy letter written to a local physician, Dr. D.H. Tucker.[34] In it, the author recounts seeing a grounded airship and meeting its crew, a Mr. Walters, Mr. Warren, and Mr. Wilson.[35] More importantly, it makes technical claims that render the airships even more ungainly, unlikely, and improbable, yet, given the numerous reports, they are nonetheless there, and thus, the claims have to be taken seriously. "There were," the author of the letter writes,

> … a number of incandescent lamps about the walls and hanging from the ceiling, and I immediately concluded that the motive power of the ship was electricity and so expressed myself to Mr. Wilson. He said this was not the case, but that it was propelled and sustained by a gas which had the property of great compressibility under a slight pressure and a correspondingly great power of expansion. That he had invented a machine or rather engine that once started worked automatically and that one had only to attend to the governance which regulated the speed. I was not prepared wholly to accept this explanation and intimated as much in my expression of astonishment, but I was convinced of it when he showed me the apparatus for generating the gas and the engine for utilizing it.
> Not being a practical mechanic I can not (sic) enter into details of this engine's construction, but this much I was able to understand: That there was a receiver made of aluminum (and of this metal the engine and everything connected with the ship so far as I saw was constructed), from which pipes passed to what appeared to me to be a square box, at each end of which was a cylinder with an exhaust chamber, in which worked a piston attached to a very singularly constructed driving wheel like the sprocket of a bicycle, except that there were four wheels, one within the other, and these Mr. Wilson called the accumulators. There were two sets of such wheels with a combined velocity surpassing anything heretofore constructed. By the peculiar arrangement of the wheel within a wheel the balance of the centripetal and centrifugal forces was preserved in the presence of 65,000 revolutions a minute; that is, the velocity of revolution in these [34] This letter is reproduced in toto in Michael Busby's Solving the 1897 Airship Mystery, pp. 171-176.

[35] Ibid., p. 172.

> wheels would equal 65,000 revolutions of an ordinary wheel ten feet in diameter in one minute if such a thing were possible.[36]

As we shall discover, this detail of the motive (and presumably, lifting) power of an unknown gas is corroborated from a very unlikely quarter. But howsoever one views it, the airships, be they steel or aluminum, were not zeppelins in any conventional sense.

3. A Secret Project, but Whose?

a. Dolbear, Tillman, and Hearst

So who were the mysterious men mentioned as crew members of some of the airships? In one newspaper report of the time, Wilson gave his place of residence as being Goshen, New York,[37] and this proved to be one of the clues that led to the unraveling of the mystery. Wilson turned out to be Hiram Wilson, an actual investor in the airship project. He and other investors had worked on their secretive project for several years, and "had parts of the ship constructed to order in different sections of the country, whence they were shipped" to a rendezvous near San Francisco and there assembled.[38]

Note what we have:

1) Private investors, representations of the involvement of New York "capitalists";
2) Compartmentalization of the project by ordering parts in various places, and assembling them at a "remote" location, preventing outsiders from learning any secrets about what the parts may have been for;
3) Some connection, as indicated by the involvement of various officials, to the federal government; and finally,
4) an unusual technology of motive power and lift, in some cases, electrical, and in the Wilson case, compressed gas of some sort.

And all this is occurring, once again, at the same time Nikola Tesla will do extraordinary electrical experimentation, when he will propose a world system of wireless power, which can also power flight, and, within a decade, his ideas will be totally suppressed and forgotten, just like the airships.

[37] Ibid., p. 183.

[38] Ibid., p. 221.

The concurrence of these events cannot, in my opinion, be coincidental.

But what of Tillman and Dolbar?

Tillman, as it turns out, was in all likelihood Captain Samuel Escue Tillman, a "professor of chemistry at West Point Military Academy"[39] from 1880 until he became superintendent of the academy in 1917! Tillman's involvement thus makes perfect sense if a motive and/or lift technology was developed involving a compressible gas. For his part, Dolbar was in all likelihood Professor Amos E. Dolbear of Tufts University.[40] Both Tillman and Dolbear also had an interest in batteries and electricity.[41] But all this would have required significant capital, and moreover, a presence both on the East and West coast, since the clues of the mystery point to both places. In Busby's opinion, the major hidden capitalist player may have been William Randolph Hearst.[42]

Tillman's presence in all of this strongly suggests not only the same type of interface between factions within the military and the corporate world that we have encountered previously, for he could hardly have been > absent from his post at West Point and roaming the countryside in an airship (without being) either AWOL (A serious infraction of military law, punishable by imprisonment) or participating in the flying experiments with the knowledge and approval of his superiors. Since he went on to serve in the army, including a tour of duty as superintendent of the U.S. Military Academy, until he retired with no known disciplinary actions, it is probable the U.S. government was knowledgeable of his participation in the flying experiments. To what extent the government participated in the experiments is unknown.[43]

We have, in other words, the same elements we encounter after World War Two: private corporate involvement, and a presence of the military. Busby is unequivocal in stating his conclusions:

> The body of evidence points to a true airship story of terrestrial origin, with test flights beginning in California in the fall of 1896 and proceeding across the country to the Midwest before turning south and arriving in Texas in April 1897. A group of well-financed, secretive individuals, based in a remote California community, a quiet Iowa village, and a small New York town have left behind a wondrous story of daring accomplishment. It appears they did not just suddenly appear out of the thin mists of time but may have been secretly building and flying machines for over forty-eight years.[44]

As we have seen, there are two aspects to the technological reports of the airships and their lift and motive power—electricity, and compressible gas—that are rather incredible.

At the beginning of his book, Busby asks why such a technology - which quite apparently worked, whatever it really was—did not lead to a revolution in transportation: the arrival of mass air transportation some two decades before it actually appeared.[45] However, as has already been pointed out, several aspects of the reported characteristics of the airships make no real sense: steel construction, plus water, electric, or compressible gas for motive power, and possibly lift. Whatever this technology was, it was not what was seen with the dirigible or zeppelin, and it is not what we see now. I have suggested one possible answer, namely, that because the motive power was in some cases electricity, it was not petroleum, and hence, for the capitalists, it may have posed a threat, or been perceived as not being profitable enough.

There may, however, have been another factor…

b. Electric Propulsion, a Peculiar Masonic Reference, and Psychological Warfare Potentialities

In my previous essay on the subject of the breakaway civilization, Saucers, Swastikas, and Psyops, I observed that SS Lt. Colonel Otto Skorzeny may have proposed using some of the advanced Nazi technologies represented by the Bell project, and perhaps some of their advanced aerodynes, in a psychological warfare operation.

In this respect, one of the most intriguing newspaper articles, which I have briefly mentioned before, covering the Texas aspect of the airship mystery was reported by The Dallas Morning News on April 19, 1897, entitled "C.G. Williams Saw It. It Was On the Ground and He Interviewed the Captain. In this instance, I cite Busby's italicized and boldface emphasis only as italics, for I wish to draw the reader's attention to one remark by a boldface emphasis which is my own:

> Greenville, Hunt Co., Tex., April 17. —(To The News.)—I have surely seen the airship. I saw it last night about 12 o'clock. I was walking across a field two miles south of town. I was in a meditative mood, and suddenly I was aroused by a brilliant light in front of me. I was dazzled by the light and frightened almost out of my sense. I should have left the place at once but my legs refused to move.
>
> As soon as I could recover a little I noticed that the lights had gone out and by the light of the moon I saw an immense cigar shaped vessel resting on the ground in front of me. I saw three men walk out of the vessel. Two of them went to work about the rigging of the ship. The other called to me and asked if I would mail some letters for him. This gave me courage to approach and talk to him. Having been at one time connected with a daily paper and by mere reporting instinct I took out my pencil and paper. Seeing this the strange visitor said:
> "See here, young man, don't give this thing away. We are experimenting with this vessel. So far it is a success. We expect to revolutionize travel and transportation. We have seen a few copies of the daily newspaper and are very much amused and entertained at the accounts of the appearance of our ship. If you will promise on the square not to reveal what I tell you I will give you a little history of our adventures.
>
> "At a little town in the interior of New York state I have worked for many years on my ship. About two weeks ago I started accompanied by these two assistants to make a trial trip…
> "…I am going home in a few days to improve my ship. I find some improvement necessary to perfect it…"
>
> I had a good opportunity to look at the exterior of the monster while its occupant was talking. it is much the shape of a cigar. The main body appeared to be about 30 feet long. Great wing shaped fans spread out on either side. At the front end was a large wheel much like the side wheel on a steamboat but made of very light material. At the end was a fan-like projection like the tail of a fish. The whole was about 75 feet long. I asked my visitor to explain the ship, how it was propelled, etc. Hi simply replied:
> "Electricity. Within are electrical machines, which furnish the motive power and the lights. When once in motion the wind operating on the large wheel in front like a windmill, keeps the ship in motion and but little electricity is needed. Now, young man, I can't tell you any more. Just wait and you will learn all about it. If you will mail these letters and not disclose the names and address and keep this all quiet for > awhile, and will give me your name I will return soon and take you with me on a trip to Mexico and South America."

> I promised not to give him away. He and his assistants went inside, there was a flash of light, a sizzling noise, the monster rose gracefully and flew away in a northeast direction…[46]

Note that the crew member conversing is very likely Hiram Wilson, since he mentions New York as his home. If so, then we have a contradiction to some degree, since in this report he maintains that the mode of propulsion is electrical, whereas, as we saw previously, in another account he maintained it was by means of compressible gas. It would appear then that one is dealing with obfuscation: two differing accounts of a technology are being given by the occupants of the airships themselves, and thus it is possible that each version is not the whole truth, nor, on the other hand, a complete fabrication and falsehood.

More importantly, note the expression that the anonymous crew member uses to elicit a promise to keep their identities secret: "If you will promise on the square not to reveal what I tell you I will give you a little history of our adventures." The phrase "on the square" is of course a reference to the Masonic fraternity, for brothers of that fraternity are said to be "on the square," and oaths and promises are sworn on an altar upon which rests a compass and square. Though slight, and passing, this reference suggests that a secret society may have also been involved in the secretive construction of the airships. This conclusion, far-fetched as it may sound, is not all that remote, as will be shown in a moment.

But first, there is one final remark we must attend to, one made in an affidavit recorded by The Austin American Statesman, again on April 17, 1897:

> But, difficult as it is to believe that these airships have been invented and are operated by men of the earth, even that is more easily believed than to believe that these ships are manned and sailed by celestial crews and portend the beginning of another dispensation pointed out by the inspired writers.[47]

This reference to "another dispensation" of "the inspired writers" provides the clue, for one the one hand, as we have seen, the vast preponderance of evidence of sightings recorded at the time indicate that the airships were human in origin, incredible as they then seemed, or ponderous and incredible as they now seem to us. The reference to "another dispensation" indicates that theological system that was beginning to emerge at approximately this same time period, and as I and co-author Scott D. deHart suggested in Yahweh, the Two-Faced God, this system itself shows all the signs of having been deliberately concocted with elite financial backing.[48]

In other words, people were already connecting the appearance and use of an exotic human technology as represented by the airships with the possibilities presented by the manipulation via technological means of religious, psychological, and social expectation. Otto Skorzeny's usage of advanced technology to promote psychological operations had been anticipated by almost fifty years!

However, what of Busby's strange remarks that, in fact, the airship mystery may have even begun some decades prior to the flap of 1896-1897? And what of the strange writing in "hieroglyphics" that was allegedly found on the dead body of the pilot in the Aurora crash?

Busby states of the latter that

> The papers with "hieroglyphics" sound too much like the coded notebooks of Dellschau, who recorded secrets concerning the Sonora Aero Club…

(based in northern California, within reach of San Francisco, let it be noted)

> …in his notebooks using a code known only to him and perhaps any accomplices he may have had. It would prove most fruitful to compare these papers to Dellschau's notebooks and determine the points of similarity.[49]

With Dellschau, we arrive at perhaps the strangest player in the airship mystery, and at perhaps the most important indicator that we are looking at the bare beginnings of a breakaway civilization.

B. The Dellschau Dilemma[50]

This will be perhaps the strangest section of this book, in that it is reporting on a tidbit of information I uncovered while reading a fascinating book on the 1800s "airship mystery," The Secrets of Dellschau, by Dennis Crenshaw with P.G. Navarro[51]. This information directly ties Charles Dellschau to one of the people on the fringes of the assassination of President Kennedy, a significant figure, as we shall see.

For those who do not know, Dellschau was an artist whose truly strange depictions of airships in his paintings can be found by any standard Internet search. Dellschau is thought to have been connected to the mysterious Sonora Aero Club, a "secret society" that many suspect was behind the sudden appearance of the "airships" during the late 1800s. The reasons for suspecting Dellschau as having been connected to this society are simple:

1) Dellschau's artistic subjects were invariably of "airships", zeppelin-like airships that were seen over Germany during the 1850s, and later during the 1880s and 1890s in the U.S.A., principally in California, Texas, and the Midwest; and
2) Dellschau invariably accompanied his paintings with "coded" information, information that referred to various members of the Sonora Aero Club by name.

Additionally, Dellschau also made it clear that the Sonora Aero Club was but one such "secret society" attempting to build and fly "aeros" or airships, others being located on the east coast of the U.S.A. Furthermore, the activities of these various aerial secret societies were, according to Dellschau, coordinated by a parent body in Germany bearing only the cryptic designation "NYMZA," a society for which Dellschau apparently "spied."[52]

Before proceeding, note that we have yet another peculiar resemblance to the post-World War Two pattern of the breakaway civilization surveyed in previous pages, for we now have the entry of Germany, the other great contributor to the development of advanced technology, and the other great developer of vast secret projects bureaucracies during the war. Succinctly put, it appears that while the Second World War constituted the matrix and impetus for the vast postwar growth of the entity, it took its hidden beginnings in the nineteenth century in those countries, with the involvement of secret groups, secret finance, and the possible if not probable involvement of military men.

1. The Kennedy Connection: Jean DeMenil

Crenshaw notes that Dellshau's unusual paintings—all of which depict some fanciful airship and machinery condign to the descriptions of the airships we have already encountered—are now selling for more than $25,000 apiece. These paintings Dellschau bound in hand-made books of 2 to 4" thickness. As Crenshaw also notes, three of these books were purchased by the DeMenil family of Houston. Indeed, the Wikipedia article on DeMenil notes his patronage of the arts.[53]

The name DeMenil should raise the eyebrows of anyone familiar with the JFK assassination, and more importantly, with the famous Torbitt Document, a document circulated samizdat in its early years. This document, as I note in my book LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy: A Coalescence of Interests, was a summary of New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison's investigation of the assassination, and was compiled by a Texas lawyer with deep connections to President Johnson's political machine in that state.

The connection between Dellschau, DeMenil, and JFK, is the notorious "Permindex corporation" and Centro Mondiale Commerciale, both under investigation by DA Jim Garrison. For those who do not know the Torbitt document's statements on this matter, I reproduce here the section dealing with it from LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy:

> Permindex stood for "Permanent Industrial Expositions," the official name of the corporation. Founded in 1958 in Switzerland by Montreal lawyer L.M. Bloomfield, a "long time friend and confidant of J. Edgar Hoover,"[54] fully one half of Permindex's stock was held by Bloomfield, who was in overall charge of its European, African, and

North and South American operations.[55] One should not, on this basis, leap to the conclusion that Bloomfield was really the man in control, simply because of the amount of shares he held. It must be remembered that those wishing to conceal or cloak their involvement in the corporation and its activities could easily hold "hidden guns" to the heads of its publicly known officers and figures. Torbitt states unequivocally that Bloomfield "was the top coordinator for the network planning the assassination."[56]

The Permindex Corporation was closely allied to an Italian counterpart, also a subject of Garrison's investigation: Centro-Mondiale Commerciale, or World Trade Center, an Italian subsidiary of the World Trade Center Corporation and a CIA front. The man ultimately indicted by Jim Garrison, Clay Shaw, was a member of the boards of both corporations.[57] The ostensible purpose of Permindex was "to encourage trade between nations."[58] But according to Torbitt, the actual purposes were far more sinister:

> (Their) actual purpose was fourfold:
> 1. To fund and direct assassinations of European, Mid-East and world leaders considered threats to the Western World and to petroleum interests of the backers.
> 2. To furnish couriers, agents, and management in transporting, depositing and re-channeling funds through Swiss banks for Las Vegas, Miami, Havana and (the) international gambling syndicate.
> 3. To co-ordinate the espionage activities of the Solidarists and Division Five of the FBI with groups in sympathy with their objectives and to receive and channel funds and arms from the financiers to the action groups.
> 4. To build, acquire and operate hotels and gambling casinos in the Caribbean, Italy and at the other tourist areas.[59]

[59] "Nomenclature of an Assassination Cabal," NASA, Nazis, and JFK: The Torbitt Document and the JFK Assassination, pp. 48-49. Torbitt cites for these assertions: "Basel, Switzerland Publication A-Z, August, 1961; Canadian Le Devoir Publication, March, 1967; Rome Paesa Sera Publication, March, April, 1967, also 1959 thru (sic) 1960 files: Il Gornia of Milan, Italy, 1967-1968 files; Il Tempe, Rome, 1967-1968 files; New Orleans District Attorney Records; Swiss Intelligence, J.F. Kennedy files." Torbitt gives no indication how he acquired access to the files of Swiss Intelligence.

The rationalization for the involvement of various intelligence agencies and of the international Fascists with gambling and gun-running and therefore with Mafia operations as exemplified in this list becomes rather obvious, for implied in this activity is a degree of "sanction and protection" to these Mafia activities given by the intelligence agencies and presumably by the international Fascists as well. This, as we saw in chapter one, was indeed part of a pattern that began during World War Two and the covert arrangement between America's wartime OSS and Lucky Luciano. In return for such protection, the agencies and international Fascists would have received a "cut" in the action, and thus a nearly inexhaustible supply of steady and covert funding for black projects of all sorts, from intelligence operations to secret research projects.

Thus, while the name "Permindex" officially stood for "Permanent Industrial Expositions," there might be a more sinister significance to its abbreviated name as a kind of "permanent index" of people to be target for assassination.

In any case, it is when one looks closely at the members of the board and financial contributors of Permindex that the connections between American petroleum interests and post-war Nazis and Fascists deepens considerably. We have already noted that Clay Shaw was on the boards both of Permindex and Centro-Mondiale Commerciale. But there were other more intriguing members:

> The other members of the Board include a publisher of the Fascist National-Zeitung in West Germany, an Italian industrialist who married into the family of Adolph (sic) Hitler's finance minister, and a woman lawyer, the Secretary of the Fascist Party. (Public Corporations Records office, Berne, Switzerland)
> Also on the Board of Permindex was Ferenc Nagy, a Solidarist and Prime Minister of Hungary from 1946 to 1947; George Mandel, alias Mantello, a Hungarian fascist who supervised attempts to purchase national monuments for real estate development in Italy, and Munir Chourbagi, an uncle of King Farouk…
> The ruling clique of Permindex and its two subsidiaries, (sic) The Italo American Hotel Corporation and Centro Mondiale Commerciale, in addition to the sophisticated Nazis and Fascists heretofore named, were Gutierz di Spadofora, who was under-secretary of agriculture in Mussolini's Fascist regime and who was also a ruling lord in the Mafia with Italy and Southern Europe as his land area; Enrico Mantello (Henry Mandel, brother of George Mandel); Giuseppe Zigotti, the head of the Italian political party,

> Fascist Nationalist Association for Militia Arms; and Hungarian emigre and former Nazi, H. Simonfay…[60]

The Torbitt Document's list of heavy financial contributors to Permindex is even more revealing of deep political connections:

> The principal financiers of Permindex were a number of U.S. oil companies, H.L. Hunt of Dallas, Clint Murchison of Dallas, John DeMenil, Solidarist director of Houston, John Connally as executor of the Sid Richardson estate, Haliburton Oil Co., Senator Robert Kerr of Oklahoma, Troy Post of Dallas, Lloyd Cobb of New Orleans, Dr. Oechner of New Orleans,[61] George and Herman Brown of Brown & Root, Houston, Attorney Roy M. Cohn, Chairman of the Board for Lionel Corporation, New York City, Schemley Industries of New York City, Walter Dornberger, ex-Nazi general and his company, Bell Aerospace, Pan American World Airways, and its subsidiary, Intercontinental Hotel Corporation, Paul Raigorodsky of Dallas through his company, Claiborne Oil of New Orleans, Credit Suisse of Canada, Heineken's Brewery of Canada and a host of other munition (sic) makers and NASA contractors directed by the Defense Industrial Security Command.
> The gambling syndicate and Mafia contracting agents who handled the transactions with Permindex were ex-president Carlos Prio Socarras of Havana, Miami and Houston, Clifford Jones of Laz Vegas, Morris Dalitz of Las Vegas, Detroit, Cleveland and Havana, former head of the Cleveland mob and Roy Cohn, L.J. McWillie of Las Vegas, a gambling partner with Cliff Jones, Bobby Baker of Washington, DC, Ed Levinson of Law Vegas, Benny Siegelbaum of Miami, Henry Crown of Chicago, associate of the Mafia, Patrick Hoy of the controlling clique in General Dynamics and Joe Bonanno of Lionel Corporation of New York.[62]

For our purposes here, observe what we have represented in this list, as indicated by the italicized names and groups in the two previous quotations; there are:

[60] "Nomenclature of an Assassination Cabal," NASA, Nazis, and JFK: The Torbitt Document and the JFK Assassination, pp. 47-48, emphasis added.

[61] Pay attention to that Dr. Oechner, for we will encounter him later. Torbitt misspells his name, and he was in fact the famous physician Albert Oechsner, about whom more later in this chapter.

[62] Nomenclature of an Assassination Cabal," NASA, Nazis, and JFK: The Torbitt Document and the JFK Assassination, pp. 49-50.

1) The Petroleum Capitalist Interests, represented by the specific mention of Texas oil tycoons H.L. Hunt and Clint Murchison, and Paul Raidgorodsky, a close associate of George De Mohrenschildt, and future Texas Governor John Connally;
2) The Fascists and Nazi Interest, represented by Ferenc Nagy, Nazi puppet prime minister of Hungary, Nazi H. Simonfay, Italian Fascist and former Mussolini government member Gutierz di Spadofora; Nazi "Paperclip" scientist and General Walter Dornberger; and a group called "Solidarists" about whom we shall say more later;
3) The Mafia Interest represented by the most famous in the list, Lyndon Baines Johnson's personal aid, Bobby Baker, about whom we shall have much more to say in part two of this book;[63]
4) The Space Interest represented by various NASA contractors all of which are coordinated by something called the Defense Industrial Security Command, or DISC.

All of these were organized, according to "Torbitt," into five groups with Permindex forming the institutional connection between them:

> 1. The Czarist (sic) Russian, eastern European and Middle East exile organization called SOLIDARISTS, headed by Ferenc Nagy, ex-Hungarian premier, and John DeMenil, Russian exile from Houston, Texas, a close friend and supporter of Lyndon Johnson for over thirty years.[64]

[63] Torbitt also points out that New Orleans mobster Carlos Marcello was also a member of Permindex's board! Q.v. p. 117.

[64] Once again, Russ Bellant's, Old Nazis, The New Right, and the Republican Party: Domestic Fascist Networks and their Effect on U.S. Cold War Politics (Boston: South End Press, 1991) is crucial for an overview of the workings of this network. This network was represented within Republican Party politics beginning during the Reagan Administration by the Republican Heritage Groups Council (p. xvii). Bellant states explicitly that "the foundation of the Republican Heritage Group Council lay in Hitler's networks into East Europe before World War II. In each of those Eastern European countries, the German SS set up or funded political action organizations that helped form SS militias during the war." (p. 4, emphasis added). These groups were coordinated by General Reinhard Gehlen's Fremde Heere Ost, or "Foreign Armies East" which, of course, later became the West German Bundesnachrichtendienst.

> 2. A section of the AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHURCHES headed by H.L. Hunt of Dallas, Texas.[65]
> 3. A Cuban exile group called FREE CUBA COMMITTEE headed by Carlos Prio Socarras, ex-Cuban president.
> 4. An organization of United States, Caribbean, and Havana, Cuba gamblers called the Syndicate headed by Clifford Jones, ex-lieutenant governor of Nevada and Democratic National Committeeman, and Bobby Baker of Washington, DC. This group worked closely with a Mafia family headed by Joe Bonanno.
> 5. The SECURITY DIVISION of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) headed by Werner Von Braun, head of the German Nazi rocket program from 1932 through 1945. Headquarters for this group was the DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL SECURITY COMMAND at Muscle Shoals Redstone Arsenal in Alabama…[66]

The assassination, in other words, at its deepest level represented a coalescence of the interests of the Mafia, American intelligence (and specifically the intelligence and security connected with, of all things, NASA), anti-Castro Cubans, and big petroleum interests, especially those of the Texas oilmen

And there you have it: DeMenil was in the circle of Eastern European exiles in Texas that clustered around Dallas and Houston (obvious center of America's space program), and indeed, according to Torbitt was a leader of that community and close political supporter of Lyndon Johnson.

We must now consider the implications:

---

[65] Nomenclature of an Assassination Cabal," NASA, Nazis, and JFK: The Torbitt Document and the JFK Assassination, p. 54, notes that an individual known only was "Dimitri" was associated with the Hunts' American Council of Christian Churches… this may or may not be a significant clue, for one might have to look for a Dimitri or Dmitri (1) with ecclesiastical connections indicative of the Slavic character of his name, and (2) with personal or professional links to the Texas oil industry. George De Mohrenschildt, a member of the Dallas White Russian exile community and an oil geologist, might thus point to other hitherto uninvestigated areas of the assassination. There is, in fact, such an individual whose sister was an oil geologist…

[66] Ibid., pp. 26-27, italicized emphasis added, uncial emphasis in the original.

2. Implications of the Dellschau-DeMenil-JFK Connection

DeMenil, if the Torbitt document is to be believed, was a leader of the Eastern European exile community in Texas, and thus, this would have placed him in a position to know George DeMohrenschildt—Oswald's "handler" in Dallas—and additionally, since this community was, as I also noted in LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy, a large component of Nazi General Reinhard Gehlen's Fremde Heere Ost , this places DeMenil firmly within the orbit of the postwar Fascist organization, which, as the Torbitt document notes, was intimately connected to Permindex. This connection to German intelligence also places DeMenil directly in the network of private intelligence connections that was developed by the Texas oilmen Hunt and Murchison.

So what about the Dellschau connection? And why might it be so significant? As noted, Dellschau was German, and according to his strange notations on his paintings, worked for an organization called NYMZA, headquartered in Germany. It is quite the crucial point to note that absolutely no corroborating evidence for these assertions has ever been found, and therefore, we must evaluate Dellschau's assertions contextually.

It is in the light of this contextual evaluation that his assertions take on some significance. We have already noted the German connections of DeMenil, the Hunts, and the Murchisons, via Gehlen's exilee front organizations.

But there is another contextual connection. As I also noted in LBJ and the Conspiracy to Kill Kennedy, one of the reasons many advance for the murder of president Kennedy was his plan for a joint US-Soviet mission to the Moon, and his willingness to share whatever may have been found there. Additionally, as I have noted in other books, Kennedy also made direct inquiries to the CIA concerning the subject matter of UFOs (and hence, into the actual state of knowledge of the USA concerning advanced science and technology). Many assassination researchers believe that this inquiry, plus his willingness to share information with the Soviets, was sufficient reason to get him killed, and indeed, I myself have entertained this notion, simply for the fact that with the heavy Nazi presence and influence within American black projects at that time, they would have balked at sharing their secrets with their hated Communist enemy.

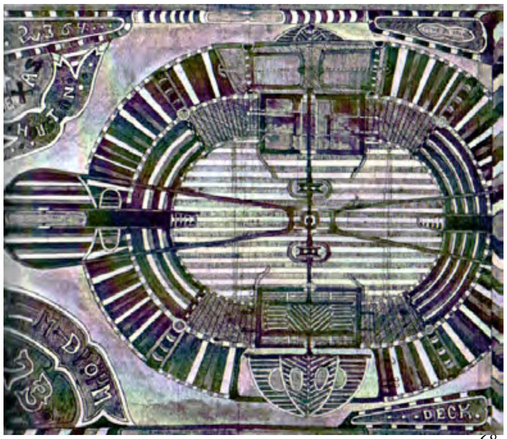
But there is yet another disturbing Dellschau-Nazi-Kennedy connection, and again, it comes from Crenshaw's book. Consider this "technical" detail reported by Crenshaw:

> Dellschau wrote that the NB gas which was used to negate weight was a liquid fuel or soupe as he called it, which when dropped into a lift hold or chamber, onto a rotating drum containing some unnamed black material, the liquid fuel turned to gas. This has not only provided the lift necessary to get the cumbersome aircraft off the ground, but it also turned a wheel, or turbine, which is designated in Dellschau's drawings as a motor.[67]

Rotating drums containing an unnamed material? That, I thought, "rings a bell." Clearly, whatever sorts of airships Dellschau and his associates were describing, they were not conventional dirigibles being propelled by internal combustion engines. While one might be tempted to dismiss this detail, it does bear an odd and curious resemblance to what is reported concerning the Nazi Bell story.

This idea of technical advancement is, of course, completely farfetched without further technical or contextual corroboration. Unfortunately, there is such technical and contextual corroboration, and it occurred in a Dellschau picture that literally made this author's jaw drop.

The picture was this:



Dellschau "Airship" Machinery Details[68]

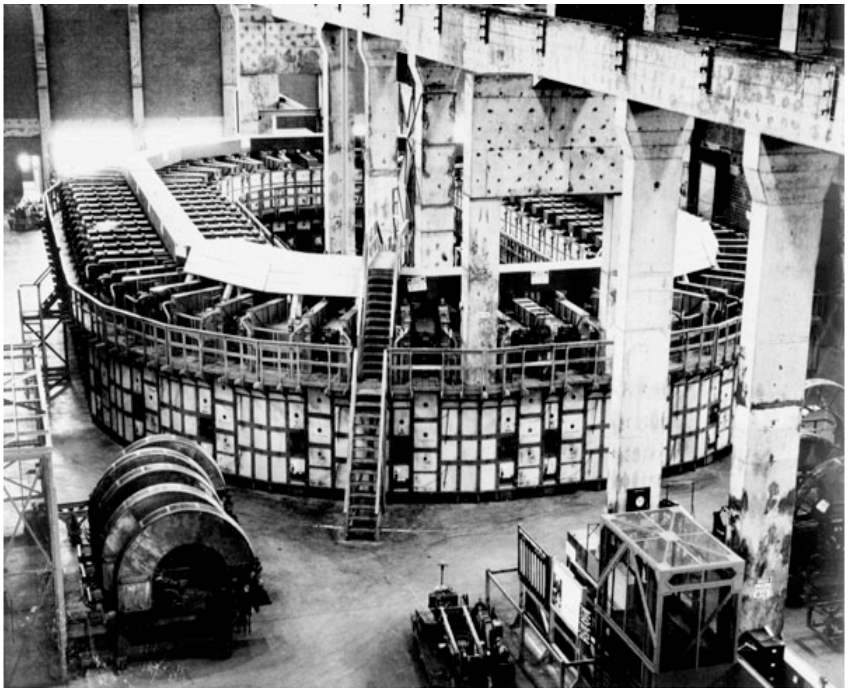
[67] Dennis Crenshaw, with P.G. Navarro, The Secrets of Dellschau, p. 165.

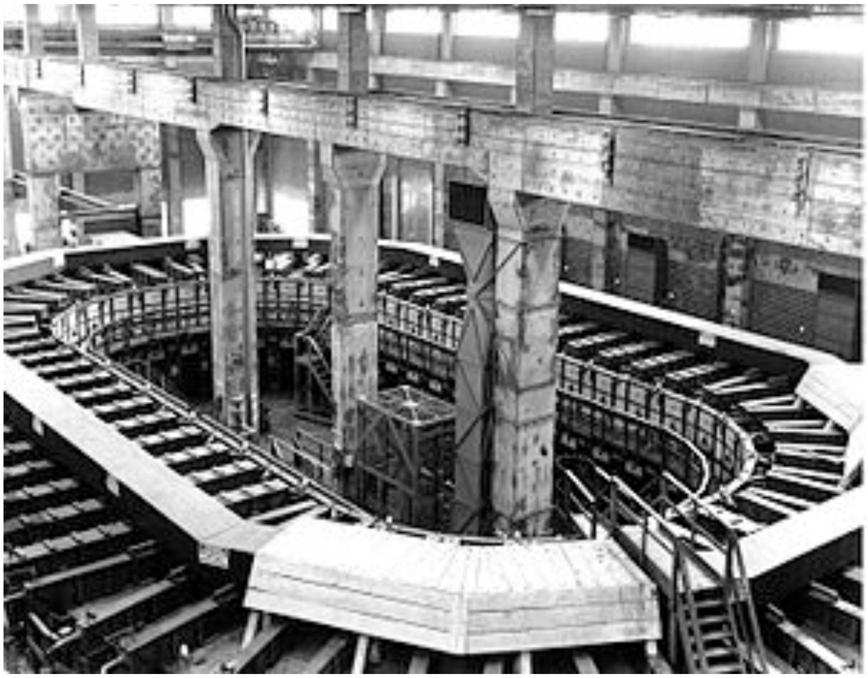
[68] Dennis Crenshaw, with P.G. Navarro, The Secrets of Dellschau, p. 201.

For those with a particle physicist's eye, the above painting (and note the windings at its top and bottom), will uncannily resemble something that had not even been invented in the 19th century, not to mention the fact that the physics behind the invention had not even been invented either. That invention is this:



One of E.O. Lawrence's Beta Calutrons Uranium Enrichment Cyclotrons at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, during World War Two

Another view will make the resemblance even more apparent:



Another view of one of Lawrence's Beta Calutron Uranium Enrichment Cyclotrons at Oak Ridge, Tennessee

Now I am certainly not maintaining that Dellschau and the Sonora Aero Club were flying around in airships powered by cyclotrons in the late nineteenth century!

But we do have the following significant points:

1) Dellschau is clearly depicting machinery, some of which bears too uncanny a resemblance to machines not yet officially invented, machines that, in turn, are dependent upon developments in physics that have not yet occurred;
2) Dellschau refers to technical details of some of these ships that also bear resemblances to aspects of the technology reported for the Nazi Bell;
3) Dellschau claims to represent a secret society based in Germany called NYMZA, which is coordinating the secret development of airships, for which secret society there has never been a shred of any further corroborating evidence;[69]

4) Some of Dellschau's paintings-books are purchased by Jean DeMenil, who has connections to Lyndon Johnson, the Texas East European Exile community, and therefore, to the private intelligence organizations of Hunt and Murchison, which was deeply connected to Nazi General Reinhard Gehlen's postwar military intelligence;
5) DeMenil further would have been in a position, and was therefore likely to have known, George De Mohrenschildt and the Dallas exile community.

It is when these five points are considered together that one must entertain the possibility that Dellschau did indeed represent some unknown group in Europe developing hidden aerial technologies, and that indeed there may be yet another, little-considered, connection to hidden technologies, groups, and the JFK assassination.

So what was Dellschau's mysterious NYMZA society in Germany, if indeed it even existed? According to Busby, Dellschau's notebooks indicate that it was yet another of the hidden financial hands behind the secretive airship development clubs.[70]

Beyond this, we cannot penetrate.

However, several things have now emerged, and they press the patterns outlined in previous chapters to a new level:

1) Significantly, the propulsion methods and lift generating technologies of the airships do not appear to be conventional by any means, since both electrical systems and compressible gases are mentioned;

---

[69] I am of course aware of the survival of the Bavarian Illuminati during the 1830s-and 1840s, and its probable transmutation into the revolutionary movements and societies that circulated in Europe during this time. There is, however, to my knowledge, no evidence that these societies were engaged in secret technological or scientific research, with the exceptions or indications that the Masons may have been involved in the secretive development of radio long before Tesla and Marconi, as I have detailed in another white paper in the members' area of my website. In that context, it is possible that Dellschau's claims may have a basis in some kernel of truth. In that case, the quest must be to establish if there is any known society with the name NYMZA or a name resembling it.

[70] Michael Busby, Solving the 1897 Airship Mystery, p. 27. For details of Dellschau's life, see pp. 324-325.

2) Significantly, within the same time frame, Tesla will conduct his revolutionary Colorado Springs experiments that will lead, within a decade, to his proposal for wireless transmission of electrical power, one purpose of which he envisions to be flight. This technology is suppressed by his financial backers, and similarly, the airship technology, which promised a revolution in transportation, is never publicly revealed. One can only assume, therefore, that the technology was either superseded by the development of the airplane, or that it was perceived to have to great a potential to be publicly revealed. But most importantly,
3) It would appear that, while the historical impetus for the creation of a vast system of hidden finance and alliances between private, government, Axis, and criminal components began after World War Two, this pattern of secret organizations, private finance, and government interface began on a smaller scale sometime in the nineteenth century, as did the perception of the possibilities of psychological operations in conjunction with it.

However, what began in the nineteenth century as a secret "airship" program, quickly morphed in the postwar era into a secret space program, one impelled not only by the need to reconnoiter, contain, rollback, and defeat the Soviet Union, but also by the need to discover what strange thing and entities may have been behind clearly hostile actions that were potentially threatening to the vast thermonuclear arsenals of the two superpowers. It was a dual dilemma, one requiring not only the development of technologies that could, to some extent, do double duty, but the vast system of finance to achieve it. We have already covered the latter, it is now, at last, time to deal with those strange events, entities, and responses to them.

SPY SATELLITES, NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND UFOS

"Behind the scenes, high-ranking Air Force officers are soberly concerned about the UFOs, but through official secrecy and ridicule, many citizens are led to believe the unknown flying objects are nonsense. To hide the facts, the Air Force has silenced its personnel."
Vice Admiral Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter (Ret.)[1]

When one says "covert wars" and "space" in the same sentence, one normally might think of secret space wars being fought by ray guns and exotic craft that are only visible at night, standing on rooftops, wearing night vision goggles. One might normally think of the now famous NASA space shuttle footage of STS 48, showing glowing disks, one of which makes an acute change of direction and goes zipping off into outer space as something quite evidently appears to be shot at it. Covert field propulsion technology and covert directed energy weaponry, all in one stunning video.[2]

Chances are, however, that one would not think of recent Russian charges that its Mars robotic probe failed as the result of American sabotage,[3] or that one would not think of the famous German World War One ace, the Red Baron, Manfred von Richthofen, firing on a silver disk more than 100 feet in diameter from his famous red Fokker triplane, sending it crashing into some woods on the ground, and seeing two occupants scramble out of it and escape into the trees.[4] Similarly, one probably would not think of British Royal Naval Air Service Sub-lieutenant J.E. Morgan, climbing into a rickety biplane in 1916 and taking off on a night flight to defend London against German zeppelins trying to bomb the city. Seeing something that resembled a flying railway carriage with the curtains drawn on lighted windows, Morgan assumed it was a German dirigible and fired on it with his service pistol. To his surprise, the "dirigible" behaved in most un-zeppelin-like fashion and shot straight up so quickly that Morgan, disoriented, crashed his plane in a swamp.[5]

Such "dirigible" sightings were not uncommon to England, for in 1909 it had its own version of the 1890s American airship show, and to similar effect. On March 23 of that year a police constable in East Anglia heard what he thought was an approaching automobile, but quickly realized the sound was coming from the sky. What he saw was a cigar-shaped object flying at what he thought was 1,000 feet altitude, with a powerful light coming from it. It flew away to the northwest at a tremendous speed.[6] Six weeks later, East Anglia was deluged with such a flood of similar sightings that the British press virtually had to become involved.[7]

All the reports "described the object as large and cigar shaped with powerful lights attached; all of them said it was able to fly against the wind and move at extremely high speed."[8] Of course, many began to suspect they were secret British weapons, or even German zeppelins sent to spy. The problem, however, was that dirigibles of the day at best managed about 50 miles per hour, whereas careful compilation of sightings at the day indicated that some of the ships were travelling at about 200 miles per hour,[9] a figure similar to the performance of some of the reported American airships of the 1890s.

All of this would have led to an initial, and highly secret, attempt to study the phenomenon, since such events would have been perceived as threats to national security, for as the British responses to the 1909 "airship" flap indicate, Britons immediately thought these were German attempts at espionage. But with World War Two and its aftermath, the cultural impetus to create, and emulate, such sightings rose dramatically, and we must review these in some detail to estimate their influence on the shape, policy, and activity of the breakaway civilization. For convenience's sake, we will deal with military sightings of UFOs, and divide this further into standard sightings, and nuclear-related sightings.

A. Military UFO Sightings

During World War Two, the sightings by Allied pilots of so-called "foo fighters" led to the first prolonged and secretive American military intelligence studies of a phenomenon that would dovetail into the postwar sightings of UFOs, and hence, into the establishment within a national security state of special UFO studies groups. As I recounted in Roswell and the Reich, pre-World War Two sightings over Scandinavia led Swedish authorities to posit that some of the technology may have been produced by or at some secret base, and notably, the Swedes did not specify Germany or any other major power behind the activity, leaving open the possibility that they had a completely independent group in mind.[10]

During the war, some foo fighter activity was clearly hostile to Allied airmen and their aircraft, and in some contexts, this occurred with clear contextual indicators of German origins for the activity.[11] However, it must be emphatically pointed out that not all foo fighter activity could be so attributed, since they were seen by pilots one both sides of the war, and in both the European and Pacific theaters, though it has been pointed out that sightings of "foo fighter"-like phenomena dropped dramatically after the German surrender.[12] These two facts alone would have inevitably led intelligence and military officers to conclude three things:

1) Some sightings possibly represented a Nazi technology in advance of anything in the Allied arsenals;
2) Some sightings possibly represented a completely different origin for the technology, and the Nazis may have had contact with said group, or emulated it, or both; and
3) In either case, the phenomenon represented a potential threat, and it should be studied, and, if possible, emulated, while means were found to dissuade whoever was behind it from taking any more overt action.

It is quite important to observe what the implications of the last point really are, for it implies not only psychological operations directed against the "people" behind the phenomenon, but additionally, that these operations would be of a nature to convince this group—whether human or otherwise—that direct military confrontation would not be in its interest. This would entail in its turn several possibilities. Operations of a confrontational nature could be designed to convince those behind the phenomenon that humanity had greater technological sophistication than it actually possessed, and this could come in the form of direct military challenges, such as President Truman's "shoot down" order, to more subtle attempts to "communicate", infiltrate, and influence. These points must be remembered in the ensuing review and analysis.

In any case, UFO sightings in military activities escalated during World War Two and remarkable things were observed in both theaters of the war. For example, in 1942, a Royal Australian Air Force pilot observed "a large airfoil, about 150 feet long and 50 feet wide. The airfoil tapered to a fin at its rear, and the RAAF pilot could see sporadic green flashes emanating from this area."[13] Keeping pace with the Australian airplane for a while, the object quickly accelerated and dove straight into the Pacific Ocean, leaving behind a whirlpool where it had dived.[14] If this sighting be true, then while it might be possible to rationalize such an object as the achievement of a human technology, it would appear more reasonable to assume that this was someone else's technology. Intelligence estimates, however, would have assumed a worst case scenario, and in that case would have concluded the latter, and as such, this conclusion would again have compelled the idea that the technology represented a potential threat.

1. The 1951 Korean War Incident: American Soldiers and a UFO Exchange Fire

Other Pacific sightings, however, suggested a technology more human, and less advanced in nature. In August 1944, an American B-29 Super-fortress bomber flying over Sumatra in Indonesia spotted an oval-shaped object approximately 1500 feet away. The object was bright, and pulsed through red and orange colors, and was "spewing a blue green exhaust plume."[15] After a series of maneuvers between the aircraft and the object, the latter finally simply accelerated straight up and disappeared.[16] Again one is confronted with an ambiguity, some of which is suggestive of a secretive human technology, such as the exhaust plume, and some of which is not, such as the disappearance straight up at tremendous speed. In either case, the conclusion for intelligence analysts would remain the same: the technology represented a potential threat, and it was in the hands of an unknown group whose origins themselves were ambiguous. UFO researcher and former NASA scientist Richard F. Haines uncovered one of the most significant instances not only of a military UFO sighting during wartime, but also of an apparent exchange of fire and "ordnance," if one wishes to call it that. The report was first filed as an interview between the witness, Francis P. Wall, who at the time of the incident was a private first class in the U.S. Army in the Korean War, and John Timmerman, who at the time worked with the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies.[17]

> This event that I am about to relate to you is the truth, so help me God. It happened in the early spring of 1951 in the country of Korea. We were in the army infantry. I was in the 25th Division, 27th regiment, 2nd Battalion, "Easy" Company. We were in what is known on the military maps are the Iron triangle, near Chorwon. We were to the left of Chorwon, just across from the mountain ridge from this city—town—whatever you want to call it. It is night. We are located upon the slopes of a mountain, between the fingers of a mountain as they run down toward the valley below where there is a Korean village. Previously we have sent our men into this village to warn the populous (sic) that we are going to bombard it with artillery. Upon this night this I'm talkin' about, we were doin' just that. We had aerial artillery bursts comin' in. And we suddenly noticed down, with the mountains to our backs, we noticed on our right-hand side what appeared to be a jack-o-lantern come wafting down across the mountain. And at first no one thought anything about it. So we noticed that this thing continued on down to the village where, indeed, the artillery air bursts were exploding. and we further noticed, by the way, it had an orange glow in the beginning, we further noticed that this object would get right into… it was that quick that it could get into the center of an airburst of artillery and yet remain unharmed. And, subsequently, this time element on this, I can't recall exactly, I would say anywhere from, oh, forty-five minutes to an hour all told…

[17] Richard F. Haines, Advanced Aerial Devices Reported During the Korean War (Los Altos, California: LDA Press, 1990), p. 18.

But then this object approached us. And it turned a blue-green brilliant light. It's hard to distinguish the size of it, there's no way to compare it. It pulsated. the light, that is, was pulsating. It wasn't, ah, regular. Alright, this object approached us. I asked for and received permission from Lt. Evans, our company commander at that time, to fire upon this object, of which I did with an M-1 rifle with armor-piercing bullets, or rounds in it. And I did hit it. It must have been metallic because you could hear when the projectile slammed into it.

Now, why do you say, why would that, ah, bullet damage this craft if the artillery rounds didn't? I don't know unless they had dropped their protective field around 'em, or whatever. That this, ah, technology envisions, that they had to protect it. But the object went wild and it… the light was goin' on and off and it went off completely once, briefly. And it was moving erratically from side to side as though it might crash to the ground. Then, a sound, which we had heard no sound previous to this, the sound of, like of, ah, you've heard diesel locomotives revving up. That's the way this thing sounded. And then, we were attacked, I guess you would call it. in any event, we were swept by some form of a ray that was emitted in pulses, in waves that you could visually see only when it was aiming directly at you. That is to say, like a searchlight sweeps around and the segment of light you would see it coming at you.

Now you would feel a burning, tingling sensation all over your body, as though something were penetrating you. And ah, so the company commander, Lt. Evans, hauled us into our bunkers… So, I'm in my bunker with another man. We're peeping out at this thing. It hovered over us for a while, lit up the whole area with its light that I'm telling you about, and then I saw it shoot off at a 45 degree angle, it's that quick, just, it was there and was gone. That quick. And it was as though that was the end of it. But, three days later the entire company of men had to be evacuated by ambulance. They had to cut roads in there and haul them out, They were too weak to walk. And they had dysentery and then subsequently, ah, when the doctors did see them, ah, they had an extremely high white blood cell count which the doctors could not account for.

Now let me inform you on this. In the military, especially the army, each day you file a report, a company report. Now, we had a confab about that. What do we do about this. Do we file it in the report or not? And the consensus was "no." Because they'd lock every one of us up, and think we were crazy. At that time no such thing as UFO had ever been heard of and we didn't know what it was. And I still don't know what it was. But I do know that since that time I have periods of disorientation, memory loss, and ah, I dropped from 180 pounds to 138 > pounds after I got back to this country. And I've had great difficulty keeping my weight up. Indeed, I'm retired and disabled today.[18]

Whatever attacked private Wall and his company, it is worth noting that a similar incident occurred on the Columbia River in the USA in 1981, when many eyewitnesses "described an orange spherical light which hung above the river while emitting a low, throbbing, diesel engine sound that was tape recorded."[19] One may reasonably assume that when Mr. Wall eventually reported the incident to the J. Allen Hynek center, that the US military-intelligence complex would have taken close note, simply for the fact that the actions of the UFO could clearly be interpreted as hostile and threatening, and because it evidenced an advanced technology.

2. A Vietnam War Incident: North Vietnamese Unit Liquidated by UFO

A similar incident during the Vietnam War definitely appears to have caught the interest of the national security state. During that war, as is now well known, the CIA and US military sponsored special operations assassination squads to conduct assassinations against targeted enemy leaders, sometimes within North Vietnam itself. During one such mission inside of North Vietnam in August 1968, an American special operations unit was inserted into the country by helicopter. Proceeding on foot, it located its target and assassinated him. North Vietnamese military units detected the team and pursued it back to the location where it would be extracted by helicopter. Once near their pickup point the special operations team spotted two hills and ascended the left one.[20] At this juncture, an extraordinary episode occurred:

> Just as the team was getting under cover, they heard the unmistakable chattering sound of AK-47 assault rifles firing from the next hill over. Enemy soldiers were nearby. But what were they shooting at?

The hit squad saw the enemy tracers going nearly straight up into the sky. The assassins were certain they were firing at their extraction aircraft—but they were in for a surprise.

Instead of seeing their rescue copter, they saw a large semicircular object appear over the hill next to their position. It was immediately clear this was not an aircraft that belonged to either side. This was a UFO, strange and alien. one member of the team recalled that its color kept changing from light blue to bright red. It was making no noise.

As soon as enemy tracers got close to the object, it suddenly stooped in midair, just a few hundred feet from where the U.S. special ops team was hiding.

The Americans saw a streak of light shoot out from the front of the object—then there was nothing but silence. The enemy barrage had ceased.

The UFO briefly lingered over the spot where the enemy had been firing at it, then turned and headed out to sea.

The hit squad waited about thirty minutes. Hearing no more enemy activity, they descended their hill and went to look around the enemy position. What they found was as startling as seeing the UFO itself. There were no enemy bodies, according to one member of the special ops team. Just the enemy's weapons—and they'd been melted down to almost nothing, leaving a smell that was so bad, it stayed with the team members for hours afterward.

The team's copter finally arrived and lifted them out. On returning to their base, one of the members immediately reported the incident to the high-ups. The other team members never saw him again.

Those remaining didn't say anything about the incident during their postmission debriefings. But soon after, they were questioned directly about it, not by military brass, but by civilians.

Their method of interrogation was extremely unusual. According to one team member, the civilians blindfolded each remaining member of the hit squad, taping their mouths shut as well. They were brought, individually, to an undisclosed location and put in a small room. Inside the room were three men: one wore a hood, keeping his face hidden. This person remained silent the whole time. According to one team member, when the questioning was over, all he recalled was seeing a bright flash of light. The next thing he knew he was back at his base, as were the others in his team.

Startled, he tried to talk to his colleagues about what had just happened, but none of them had any memory of the interrogation or the encounter with the UFO that preceded it. Only he did.[21]

This incident, if true, is significant for the fact that it would have directly involved the CIA in postmission debriefing, since it was involved with running such teams, and also because the sighting again involves the use of an advanced technology in direct intervention in human military operations between opposing combatants.

In short, it would again have been perceived as a national security issue and threat, and it is highly likely it would have been similarly handled by North Vietnam and by its Soviet backers.

3. The 1953 Kinross Incident

One of the most famous UFO incidents involving the US military is the 1953 Kinross incident, first reported by the famous early UFOlogist, Major Donald Keyhoe. On the evening of November 23, 1953, radar operators observed the return of an unknown object on their radar screens.[22] An F-89 fighter jet piloted by Lt. Felix Moncla, Jr., was scrambled from nearby Kinross field. Flying at over 500 mph, the radar operators watched as Lt. Moncla's aircraft was guided to the object and closed on the return on their screens, when, to their surprise, the two blips "merged into one, and then that blip faded from the screen."[23] No further radio contact with Moncla or his on-board radar operator, Lt. R.R. Wilson, was had again.

Search efforts conducted that night and the next day by both American and Canadian aircraft and ships discovered no remains of the missing aircraft, and the Chicago Tribune ran a short article reporting the incident, including the merger of the two radar returns into one.[24] On November 27, 1953, however, a local Canadian newspaper, the Sault Ste. Marie Evening News stated that the unknown object "had been identified as a Royal Canadian air Force C-47 transport."[25]

Keyhoe, unconvinced of this explanation, contacted the local U.S. Air Force Public Information officer—one Lt. Robert C. White—who offered the explanation that the Air Force radar operators had simply "read the scope wrong."[26] This only piqued Keyhoe's interest even more, and his conviction grew when the U.S.A.F. then offered yet another explanation, namely, that the other object had been a Canadian civilian airliner, a DC-3.

[26] Ibid., p. 146.

Compounding matters even further, the Air Force had offered two entirely different explanations to Lt. Moncla's widow, on two different occasions, from two different people! In the first instance, she was informed that her husband's fighter jet had flown too low and crashed into the lake. When she reasonably inquired if she could recover her husband's body, she was offered a second explanation: her husband's aircraft had exploded at high altitude.[27]

In other words, the Air Force had no explanation, nor, apparently, did it have any wreckage or any other physical evidence of the event, other than the fact that one of its planes and two of its airmen were missing after an encounter with "something," an encounter that once again may be interpreted as a hostile action. This is reflected by a comment that Jerome Clark makes in his recounting of the Kinross event:

> Then on June 28, 1956—or so Ohio ufologist Tom Comella would assert in Fate magazine six years later—Master Sgt. O.D. Hill, a Project Blue Book associate working out of Wright-Patterson AFB, confided to Comella's colleague Edgar Smith that the project's purpose was to "prevent another Pearl Harbor." (Smith and Comella had earlier dealings with Blue Book and so were known to the project, though neither had met Hill before this.) Asking not to be quoted, Hill related two instances of alleged UFO-related military-aircraft disappearances. Though he apparently did not mention Kinross by name, one of the cases sounded exactly like it. Immediately following that meeting (in Smith's home), Smith called Comella to tell him Hill was on his way. At Comella's residence Hill repeated the stories. We have only Smith's (or Comella's) word that this conversation occurred. On the other hand, a Sgt. O.D. Hill was indeed part of Blue Book during the time period in question, and he did not disavow the story even after its airing in a national magazine.[28]

Whether or not Hill made the statements Comella and Smith alleged he did is, from one point of view, not important, for the Kinross incident would have been perceived as a threat and hostile action. Hill's alleged remarks, that the true purpose of Blue Book was to prevent another Pearl Harbor, rings true in this context.

While these conventional interventions are significant enough to warrant an investigation and analysis as threats to national security, it is when one turns to consider the far more serious issue of UFOs and nuclear weapons that one begins to perceive the dim outlines of actual covert warfare and operations taking place.

B. UFOs, ICBMs, and Nuclear Weapons

Beyond question, UFO sightings at nuclear weapons storage facilities, manufacturing plants, ICBM bases, and nuclear tests not only occur, but would have been viewed at the highest levels as potential threats. Additionally, since such incidents occurred not only in the U.S.A. but the U.S.S.R. as well, we will review some salient cases extensively here, relying upon the vital and seminal research of Robert Hastings, and his excellent study of this issue, UFOs and Nukes: Extraordinary Encounters at Nuclear Weapons Sites. These sightings are vital to the argument being advanced here, namely, that a breakaway civilization culture does exist, for as we shall discover, the actions of UFOs during some of these incidents cannot be interpreted, from the human point of view, as anything less than potentially hostile. our examination will look at three different types of cases or sightings: those at nuclear missile sites, those at actual nuclear tests, and those at nuclear weapons manufacturing facilities. Considered individually, any one of these cases would have called forth an assessment and possible response; taken together, they are compelling arguments for subtle clashes and maneuverings between human militaries, the potential breakaway civilization technologies, and whoever is behind the UFO phenomena involved. As we shall also discover, close analysis of these cases along two main avenues of interpretation—human origin and non-human origin—will reveal some interesting speculative possibilities about the culture of the breakaway civilization.

Spy Satellites, Nuclear Weapons, and UFOs

1. Sightings near Nuclear Missile Sites and Nuclear-Equipped Military Units

a. The UFO-Haunted Aircraft Carrier, the USS Franklin D. Roosevelt

Commissioned in October 1945 shortly after the end of World War Two, the USS Franklin D. Roosevelt piled up a number of firsts in U.S. naval history, being "the first American aircraft carrier to launch and recover a jet aircraft."[29] She also participated in the first large postwar NATO naval war game, along with warships from Great Britain, Norway, Denmark, France, Belgium, Holland, Portugal and Canada, Operation Mainbrace.

It was here that the Franklin D. Roosevelt's "haunting" by UFOs began, as UFOs began to be reported by Danish ships and British aircraft.[30] On September 20, 1952, some of her crewmen were observed by an attached newspaper photographer observing a spherical object in the sky travelling very quickly. The photographer snapped some photographs, which were quickly examined by the ship's intelligence officers, who decided that "the large spherical object had to be either a weather balloon—or something else."[31] The Franklin D. Roosevelt quickly inquired of the rest of the massive fleet if any of its ships had sent up a weather balloon.

The answer: none had.

But the UFOs were not done with the Franklin D. Roosevelt, for after a refit the following year, the ship anchored near Guantanamo Bay, where again a UFO was observed by the ship's crew, this time at night, glowing brightly, and performing sudden stop-start maneuvers.[32] Three years later, in 1956, while making a goodwill visit to Brazil, the aircraft carrier anchored at Rio de Janeiro, where once again, it was stalked, "this time by two UFOs."[33] The ship's crewmen > saw two large disks. They described them as one above the other, with a glowing light between the two. The objects were estimated at between 75 and 100 feet long.

> They weren't moving, and there were a few hundred feet separating them. The ship's radar fixed them several miles from the carrier and > about half a mile high. Each object had bright counterrotating (sic) lights ringing its middle.

> Suddenly the top disk ejected a fiery object that fell into the lower object. After that, both disappeared at blinding speed…
> Anyone in the ship's crew who witnessed the incident was later questioned by the navy and then told never to talk about it again.[34]

Still the UFOs were not done with the USS Franklin D. Roosevelt.

By autumn of 1958 the aircraft carrier was again anchored off of Guantanamo Bay, when around 9 P.M. a UFO appeared and began to head directly for the carrier. Approximately two dozen crewmen ran to the flight deck, and spotted "a cigar-shaped object with a row of windows running through the middle,"[35] and some of these witnesses claimed to have seen "figures inside looking down at them," while still others stated that they felt heat "coming from the object."[36] Whatever it was, it remained near the aircraft carrier for almost five minutes, when it then "turned reddish orange—and then it was gone, leaving the area at very high speed."[37] Subsequently the CIA sent agents to interview the witnesses to the incident, giving them the customary warning never to talk about it again.[38]

The final incident involving the Franklin D. Roosevelt occurred in 1962 when an object appeared on the carrier's radar, some 500 miles away at 80,000 feet altitude.[39] The ship's radar operators observed the object drop nearly three miles in mere seconds, then completely stop. The carrier was ordered to turn into the wind and "several F-4 Phantom fighter jets were catapulted off the deck with orders to confirm the bogey."[40] Closing on the object, the fighters turned on their radars and immediately the object simply completely disappeared from the carrier's radar. The fighters continued to search but after over twenty minutes were recalled. As soon as the fighters had landed and the ship resumed its previous course, the UFO reappeared on the ship's radar, directly above the carrier, "meaning it had traveled a distance of more than 500 miles in just a few minutes."[41] Under orders from the commanding officer, the crew involved were ordered not to record anything in their logs.

So the question inevitably occurs: why were UFOs targeting the USS Franklin D. Roosevelt, seemingly singling it out of all the carriers in the US Navy?

Maloney's answer is chilling: "There's only one clue: in 1950, the (Franklin D. Roosevelt) was the first U.S. Navy carrier to deploy with nuclear weapons on board."[42]

With this, we arrive at the heart of a very murky, and potentially very dark aspect of UFO activity and interference with military operations and installations: nuclear weapons. As previously noted, Robert Hastings has done yeoman's work on this subject with his magisterial work, Ufos and Nukes: Extraordinary Encounters at Nuclear Weapons Sites. His information will be reviewed carefully here. During the world's brush with thermonuclear war during the 1962 Cuban Missile Crisis, UFOs were "conspicuous by their absence," and in fact, it appears that worldwide, UFO activity was at a low level.[43] According to Hastings, however, there was one attempt at a UFO intercept by American fighters during the crisis.[44] But this is merely the tip of a very large UFO-and-nuclear iceberg.

Almost all U.S. Air Force bases that based ICBMs—Malmstrom in Montana, F.E. Warren in Wyoming, Ellsworth in South Dakota, and Minot and Grand Forks in North Dakota—has had recurring UFO incidents.[45]

b. The Malmstrom A.F.B. Case

Malmstrom Air Force Base near Great Falls, Montana, was the scene in 1966 of one of the most stunning cases of UFO interference in American military affairs and nuclear weapons. First reported by ufologist Raymond Fowler, the incident occurred during a night in the early spring of 1966. A UFO was sighted near the vicinity of the launch control center of a flight of ten Minuteman ICBMs.[46] The UFO, a glowing red saucer shape, shut down the flight and fighters were scrambled.[47] One witness to the event, Captain Robert Salas, informed Hastings that an agent from the base's branch of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI) debriefed the men and had them sign non-disclosure agreements, and informed them that the incident had understandably been "highly classified" and was "not to be discussed with anyone, even amongst themselves."[48] The AFOSI agent then confiscated the missile launch officers' logs.[49] According to captain Salas, despite these strictures, the incident swiftly became a major topic of discussion on the base.[50]

Eventually an engineering report was drawn up officially denying that the UFO had anything to do with the shut-down of the missiles.[51]

However, the Air Force contacted engineers from the Boeing company, designer of the Minuteman missile, and these in turn "investigated several possible causes, including weather conditions and commercial power surges, but ruled out all of them."[52] More importantly, the Boeing engineers successfully duplicated the phenomenon "by directly injecting a certain signal, a 'noise,' into the logic coupler" of the missiles' computerized launch systems, though they were never able to "determine the source of such a signal."[53]

This is an important point, for while it would seem evident that the UFO was responsible for the shutdown, the ability of Boeing engineers to duplicate the phenomenon indicates that the technology employed was not beyond existing human capabilities. But other incidents at Malmstrom A.F.B. indicated more disturbing capabilities, for in 1967, a UFO returned to the base, and again, interfered with the missiles, only this time, with the missiles' guidance and control systems.[54] According to Hastings, his source indicated that whoever was behind the UFO, they "were demonstrating that they could indeed disable the missiles."[55]

Then, in a repeat performance in January 1972, NORAD informed Malmstrom that ground sensors had recorded a sharp rise in ground temperatures to 80 degrees around one of the ICBM silos.

> A security team was rushed to the silo; when they arrived they saw something incredible. A UFO was sitting on the ground, and the cover to the missile silo had been removed. Apparently the UFO's "crew" had broken into the launch facility.
> The security team was close enough that, even though no description was ever recorded, one member claimed he saw the UFO crew inside the silo, examining the missile's circuitry. On being discovered, the UFO occupants hurried back to their craft. The UFO lifted off, shooting straight up at a speed estimated to be 50,000 miles an hour.[56]

In yet another incident at Malmstrom in November 1975, an alarm sounded on the base indicating that security at one of the silos had been violated. The launch officers at the silo requested a security team to investigate. Upon arriving at the silo, the security team reported observing a large orange disk hovering over the area, and technicians were dispatched to the ICBM after the disk departed.[57] "To their horror, they discovered that the targeting info stored in the warhead's guidance system had been changed… nobody could understand how the targeting info had been altered."[58]

There are two crucial considerations here. Firstly, the actions of the UFOs at Malmstrom, whatever their origin, clearly constituted behavior that could be considered hostile, and with the alleged alteration of targeting data, not to mention shutting down an entire flight of ICBM's, constituted serious threats to American national security. Secondly, even though the Boeing engineers were able to duplicate the shutdown of the flight via remote signaling, the remote alteration of sensitive targeting data implies a much more sophisticated technological capability, one that suggests the ability to "scan" targeting circuitry and data, and to enter new targeting information.

c. The Ellsworth A.F.B. Case

Malmstrom A.F.B. was not the only U.S. air base and ICBM launch facility experiencing difficulties with UFOs and its intercontinental missiles. Ellsworth Air Force Base just east of Rapid City, South Dakota, control site for 150 ICBMs spread throughout the wastes of the western part of the state, experienced its fair share as well. Notably, like the Malmstrom incidents, these began in 1966.[59]

In 1966, Staff Sergeant Albert Spodnik and another electro-mechanical technician were ordered to launch facility to correct what appeared to be an electrical malfunction, for both the commercial and emergency back-up power had gone down at a site code-named Juliet-03, making the Minuteman missile there inoperable.[60]

Spodnik and his partner completed the repairs and initiated a start-up procedure "which would return the missile to normal operational status."[61] That was the end of all things normal for that evening, for as they were leaving the silo, their security escort informed them that there was disturbing conversation taking place on their vehicle's radio: a security alarm had gone off at another silo just six miles away, as it too experienced a total loss of all commercial and back-up emergency power, taking the missile off alert status.[62]

Once again a security team was ordered to the silo. Listening in, Spodnik and his team overheard the security team at the other silo describe a round metallic object was resting on the ground inside the security perimeter of the silo.[63] Climbing on top of their vehicle in order to gain a better view of the nearby silo, Spodnik and his team saw "an intense glow that seemed to envelop the entire launch facility, much brighter than the security lights located there."[64] Meanwhile, the security team at the other silo was ordered to approach the object, which the team commander refused to do, and a helicopter was dispatched from Ellsworth to the silo. The helicopter carried the Base Commander, the Wing Commander, the Missile Maintenance Commander, the Civil Engineering Commander, and the Base Hospital Commander. As

Hastings states, "this was extraordinary, to say the least,"[65] for it suggested that the base brass had been quickly assembled in response to the first alert that Spodnik's team had been dispatched to repair. Spodnik eventually jumped from the roof of his vehicle, and heard over the radio that the UFO had departed. When the helicopter with the base commanders arrived, they found the indentations from the object's tripod landing gear, and the power was restored, without anyone having done anything.[66]

This was not to be the last UFO visit to the Ellsworth A.F.B. missile silos, however, for technical Sergeant John W. Mills, assigned to the base's 44th organizational Missile Maintenance Squadron, reported an even more bizarre incident at the base in late December 1978 or early January 1979.[67] Ordered to a silo to perform a routine targeting maintenance procedure on an ICBM, Mills entered the silo, when his team's accompanying guard on the surface began to bang on the ladder down into the facility, demanding that they come to the surface. Mills ascended the ladder, fully intent on reprimanding the guard, but when her arrived on the surface, he noticed a low frequency loud ambient hum, coming from "everywhere". Mills stated that one could feel it on one's skin, inside the body, in one's teeth, "like a microwave except it wasn't heating you up."[68] Even their truck vibrated.[69]

Looking up, they could not see stars directly overhead, while stars were clearly visible to the sides.[70] Walking out of the silo's fenced-in security area, the hum could not be heard.[71] Mills informed Hastings that "we weren't scared. We were just puzzled."[72] While their surface guard was clearly frightened, Hastings observed that this strange fearlessness and calm on the part of others involved in such missile base sightings suggested some sort of "mental-conditioning field was present."[73] And as with the earlier 1966 Ellsworth sighting, all power at the launch facility inexplicably went off, only to return on the object's departure.[74] Nor was this all: two other teams at two different silos reported similar experiences, complete with total losses of power at each silo.[75]

Once back at Ellsworth, Mills and his team reported to the missile maintenance hanger, which was "full of people," many of them colonels and various base commanders.[76] Separating enlisted men from officers, each teams' members were ordered to fill out reports. Mills and his team reported that they did not see anything, but two teams did apparently report the truth, and their members were passed over for promotion, and in one case, its members were reassigned from the base within 24 hours after being made to sign national security and non-disclosure statements.[77] As with the later Malmstrom incidents, it was discovered that the missiles' targeting systems were inoperative during the incident.[78]

d. The Minot A.F.B. Incident

Thus far we have encountered UFOs shutting down ICBM flights, turning off power at silos, and altering targeting and guidance system information. As if all that were not enough, the final and most dangerous step and implication for national security was taken during the UFO incidents at Minot Air Force Base, sometime between July 1965 and July 1967.[79] The story was recounted to Hastings by David Schuur, a Minuteman crewmember at the Minot base from December 1963 to November 1967.[80]

While Schuur was on duty, all of the Minot base's ICBM silos reported a strange object moving over their silos, passing from one flight to the next.[81] What Schuur recounted to Hastings is worth citing in detail, for like Hastings, I find the implications of the Minot incident perhaps the most disturbing of all UFO-nuclear weapons related activity, with clear implications for national security, and, as we shall discover later in our analysis of these incidents, clear implications for the breakaway civilization and its responses to such events.

> However, when the object passed over our flight, we started receiving many spurious indications on our console. The object was apparently sending some kind of signals into each missile. Not every missile got checked (out) by the object, but there were several that did. Maybe six, seven, or eight. Maybe all ten got checked, but I don't think so. As this thing was passing over each missile site, we would start getting erratic indications on that particular missile. After a few seconds, everything reset back to normal. But then the next missile showed spurious indicators, so the object had apparently moved on to that one, and did the same thing to it. Then on to the next one, and so on. It was as if the object was scanning each missile, one by one. The Inner Security and outer Security (alarms were triggered) but we got those all the time, for one reason or another. However, on this particular night, we had to activate the 'Inhibit' switch because we got 'Launch in Progress' indicators! After a few minutes, the UFO passed to the northwest of us and all indicators reset to normal.[82]

Hastings' competence as an astute investigator is revealed by his next question and Schuur's response:

> I wanted to be certain about what I had just been told. I asked Schuur, "So, if you get a Launch in Progress indicator, does that mean the launch sequence has been triggered—that the missile is preparing to launch?" Schuur replied, "That means the missile has received a launch signal. When that happens, we get an indication in the capsule that a launch command has been received by that missile. If that happens, without proper authority, you flip what's called an 'Inhibit' switch, to delay the launch for a given period of time. If an inhibit command comes in from another launch capsule, that shuts down the launch totally. But if that second command doesn't come in, the missile will wait for a specified period of time and then launch automatically at the end of that expired period—theoretically. Of course, that night, we had all kinds of other indicators coming on from each missile, so in that situation the launch probably would have aborted itself. I honestly don't know."[83]

Consider the implications of these statements in the light of the Ellsworth and Malmstrom incidents, for clearly, if targeting information could be remotely altered in the presence of a UFO, and if silos could be completely shut down, then it is equally conceivable that the means existed to "inhibit" the "inhibit switch," thus allowing the missiles to launch automatically at the end of the expired period of time. This constitutes not only a clear threat and hostile action, it would inevitably have called forth certain responses within the secretive bureaucratic power structures, as we shall argue later in this chapter.[84]

But like the incidents at Malmstrom and Ellsworth Air Force Bases, this was not the only such incident at Minot. In the hours before dawn on October 24, 1968, a UFO was being tracked by the base's radar as well as the on-board radar of a B-52 approaching the base to land, while concurrently missile security and maintenance teams were also "reporting UFOs maneuvering near Minuteman missile Launch Facilities 0-6 and N-7."[85] This incident even made the official Project Blue Book file as case 12,548.[86]

At one point, witnesses saw the UFO separate into two separate objects, fly in opposite directions, then "return and pass under each other."[87] While this was transpiring, the base radioed the approaching B-52 bomber and asked for visual or radar confirmation. The B-52's radar tracked the object, and the plane's radar operator activated the radarscope's camera, capturing the radar event on film for later analysis.[88] This analysis revealed that the object was traveling around 3900 miles per hour.[89] As it approached the bomber, the aircraft's radio transmissions were interrupted, and it was only able to receive communications.[90] The aircraft's crew described the object as being orange, oblong, and with what appeared to be windows around it.[91]

The official Air Force explanation?

[84] It is to be noted that when asked by Hastings whether he thought the Launch in Progress warning had been deliberately triggered by the UFO, Schuur responded negatively, offering his opinion that it was merely an accidental by-product of the "scanning" apparently being done by the object. The interrupted transmissions were due to plasma effects like ball lightning, and the crew had seen either the star Sirius or Vega, or a plasma or ball lightning located near the ground.[92]

Well and good, but plasmas do not explain the earlier and much more serious "Launch In Progress" incident at the base, for plasmas do not normally float deliberately from one missile silo to the next, performing scans as they go!

All this is serious enough, but the seriousness is considerably amplified by the fact that one retired Soviet Army Colonel, Vladimir Plantonev, described for ABC News a similar incident at a Soviet ICBM base in the Ukraine on October 4, 1982, an incident lasting several hours. A typical flying saucer was seen near the ICBM base outside the village of Byelokoroviche, when > an unspecified number of nuclear missiles suddenly activated. As the horrified launch crew looked on helplessly, the automated launch sequence was enabled—without proper authorization—and proceeded to count down for 15 terrifying seconds, before aborting and returning to stand-by status.[93]

As with the American command and control arrangements for ICBM launches, this signal and launch sequence could only be begun by the transmission of special codes and commands from Moscow.[94]

But there's more, and it should make any attentive reader shudder. In 2004 the History Channel aired an episode called Soviet UFO Secrets Revealed, in which Dr. Yulii Platov, a member of the Russian Academy of Sciences, attempted to debunk the whole UFO story, stating that the whole incident was simply due to a military flare being seen near the missile silos. "According to Platov, this explanation had been quickly agreed upon by members of Institute 22, a Soviet government-sponsored UFO research group, which was sent to investigate the incident immediately after it had occurred. 'They established within a very short period, literally half-a-day, that a military training exercise took place at a nearby (air base),' he said."[95] For those who have followed the story of 9/11, of the London bombing, or even the more recent Oslo-Breivik bombing and murders, this nesting of real operations and events within drills will sound all too horrifyingly familiar.

In my opinion the Soviet UFO-ICBM incident is real, for it follows the familiar pattern we have seen evidenced in the American cases, a pattern that, moreover, would have called forth similar responses within the bureaucratic bowels of Russian black projects, and unique political responses, as will be argued later in this chapter.

e. The Alleged Big Sur Incident

For the present, no survey of UFO interference with nuclear missiles would be complete without a review of the famous, or, depending on one's lights, infamous Big Sur Incident. As Hastings observers of this much-debated event,

> The Big Sur UFO Incident has been studied and debated for more than two decades. Some researchers, including the author, consider it to be an unparalleled example of UFO interest in—and interference with—our nuclear missile systems. However, other ufologists dismiss the case, either because they believe it to be explainable in prosaic terms, or they view it as a complete fabrication, an absurd hoax perpetrated by two U.S. Air Force officers, former Lt. Bob Jacobs and retired Major Florenze Mansmann.[96]

Given the controversy surrounding this event, no review of it will be undertaken here.[97]

Our focus will remain on the incident itself, as first reported by Dr. Bob Jacobs and summarized as follows by Robert Hastings.[98]

> Early one morning in September 1964, an Atlas D Intercontinental Ballistic Missile (ICBM) was launched from Vandenberg AFB,

> California, carrying aloft an experimental enemy radar-defeating system and dummy nuclear warhead. Shortly after nosecone-separation, as the warhead raced toward a targeted splash-down at Eniwetok Lagoon, in the Pacific Ocean, it was approached by a disc-shaped UFO. As the saucer chased and then circled the warhead, four bright flashes of light emanated from the unknown craft whereupon the warhead began to tumble, eventually falling into the ocean hundreds of miles short of its intended target downrange.[99]

All of this was filmed by then Lieutenant Bob Jacobs of the 1369th Photographic Squadron at Vandenberg Air force Base, via a state-of-the-art telescopic camera system at Big Sur, California, over 100 miles northwest of Vandenberg A.F.B.[100] Jacobs maintains that a 16mm version of the film was "shown to a small, select group at Vandenberg" with Jacobs present. At the conclusion of the viewing, Jacobs was ordered to forget the events and never to discuss them.[101] Subsequently, Jacobs learned that when he had left the viewing area, that telltale frames of the UFO and the destruction of the ICBM were edited out of the film by possible agents of the CIA.[102] Additionally, fellow Air Force officer Mansmann offered that the evaluation of the UFO's origin was that it was extraterrestrial,[103] and Jacobs himself believed that the shoot-down was intended as a warning to humanity and its infatuation with thermonuclear weapons.[104]

As Hastings correctly notes, if Jacobs' story of the Big Sur UFO-ICBM shoot-down incident is true,

> …then it is arguably the most dramatic case on record of apparent UFO interference with one of our nuclear weapons systems. As such, its importance can not (sic) be overstated. While the actual motivation behind the apparent shooting down of the dummy warhead remains unknown… the act itself was nevertheless unmistakably provocative and, from a technological perspective, absolutely astounding.[105]

Indeed, if true, then of all the UFO-nuclear weapons incidents reviewed thus far, it formed the most direct challenge to the emerging culture of "full spectrum dominance" within the American national security structure.

f. Summary Thus Far

At this juncture, it is worth pausing to take note of a remarkable pattern that has emerged, for when all these incidents are considered together, a remarkable range of flexibility has been demonstrated; UFOs appeared to be capable of:

1) knocking out all power at ICBM silos(Malmstrom and Ellsworth);
2) scanning and reconfiguring the guidance system and targeting data of individual missiles, and then returning them to normal;
3) initiating launch sequences in both American and Soviet missiles;
4) and given all these capabilities, one must assume they had the capability to override the "inhibit launch" capabilities in both American and Soviet missiles; and finally,
5) in the case of the Big Sur Incident, shooting down an ICBM in flight with technology best described as directed energy weaponry.

Each of these taken individually would be perceived and interpreted by the national security bureaucracies—both military and intelligence—as potentially threatening national security issues, if not overtly hostile acts. Indeed, we may view these incidents as a kind of covert conflict, covert skirmishes on the edge of credulity, if not outright warfare, a kind of technological brinksmanship or fencing match between two opponents designed to send messages. The analysis of this fencing match and proposed responses to it would have been deeply classified. We shall speculate later in this chapter on what some of those responses may have been. But first, we are not quite done with the subject of UFOs and nuclear weapons.

2. Sightings at Nuclear Tests

a. Pre- and Post-Test UFO "Monitoring"

If UFOs showed such interest in nuclear weapons launch facilities, then what about actual nuclear and thermonuclear tests?

By now it should come as no surprise that UFOs have indeed shown an interest in not only in nuclear weapons facilities, but in actual nuclear and thermonuclear tests. This correlation was first pointed out by the late Frank Edwards, who noted that UFOs seems to show up in major UFO flaps in Scandinavia with the famous “ghost rocket” wave of 1946, and then over the defense installations of the USA in the West and Southwest of the country in 1947. Edwards correlated this to the 1945 Trinity test, and theorized that someone was reconnoitering our nuclear activity, having been alerted to it by the 1945 test, though Edwards did not offer a mechanism or explanation for this. He also noted that the sightings over Scandinavia in 1946 were simply in the wrong place, though Edwards could not have known at that time the growing evidence after German reunification ca 1989-1992 that the Nazis had indeed exploded some sort of nuclear device in the Baltic in 1944, which would fit neatly with Edwards’ two year “travel time”.

Strangely, however, few have followed up on this correlation of UFO activity to nuclear tests, few except Robert Hastings. Here again, however, we see the strongest evidence not only of a correlation, but of something that, taken with the ability of UFOs to interfere with the launch and guidance systems of ICBMs previously reviewed, would have been perceived as deep national security threats.

One source interviewed by Hastings, Chester W. Lytle, Sr., gave support to the Manhattan Project during the Second World War through his engineering company, Lytle Engineering.[106] This support role continued into the era of tests at the Nevada Proving Ground where, Lytle told Hastings, tests were filmed by aircraft, whose pilots “had observed highly maneuverable, disc-shaped craft in the vicinity of the detonations.”[107] Lytle himself was present as radar tracked these objects, which far out-maneuvered any known American aircraft.[108] Another source, David Middleton, informed Hastings that he had helped erect the tower that held one such nuclear device for a test in the late 1950s. The evening prior to the test, two UFOs came down and performed maneuvers near the tower. The Atomic Energy Commission personnel present for the test, seeing this performance, postponed it.[109]

Another source, Walter N. Webb, a retired lecturer from the Charles Hayden Planetarium in Boston, and a consultant on astronomy for the Center for UFO Studies (CUFOS) and the Mutual UFO Network (MUFON),[110] informed Hastings of yet another UFO sighting of 18 rotating silvery discs near the atomic test site at Yucca Flat, Nevada, in October of 1951.[111] During one such event of UFOs monitoring the Plumbbob set of nuclear tests in Nevada, Project Bluebook mentioned a UFO monitoring and tracking the fallout cloud from the test, and even responding to encrypted military transmissions by sending "encrypted responses" of its own.[112] Indeed, as Hastings discovered, another source, Daniel Wilson, was able to correlate UFO sightings, and "fireball" sightings, after nuclear tests as the fallout spread across the country, with "fireball" sightings accompanying it.[113]

b. The Ivy Mike and Castle Bravo Tests

I have written extensively elsewhere about the Ivy-Mike and Castle Bravo hydrogen bomb tests, and about the hypothesis that their anomalous and run-away yields may have been the result of hitherto unrecognized "gating" or "transduction" of the energy of the local structure of the fabric of space-time into the reactions by dint of resonant geometries momentarily established within the nuclear plasmas mere moments after the detonation.[114] Previously in this book I have suggested that part of this mechanism consisted of sending out longitudinal pulses within the physical medium itself, and that this mechanism—if one had the technology to detect such pulses—might be why UFO activity seems so strangely correlated to nuclear tests and facilities.

Two of these tests, in particular, Ivy Mike, and Castle Bravo, have formed the focus of my attention in these speculations, and therefore it should come as no surprise that these two tests also exhibited an unusual amount of UFO activity. No less than the head of the U.S. Air Force's Project Bluebook, Captain Edward J. Ruppelt, whom some believe even coined the term "Unidentified Flying Object" or UFO, wrote the following in his summary of the Air Force project:

[114] See especially my (with Scott D de Hart Grid of the Gods: The Aftermath of the Cosmic War and the Physics of the Pyramid Peoples (Adventures Unlimited Press, 2011), pp. 1-36.

> …(In) November or December[115] the U.S. was going to shoot the first H-bomb during Project Ivy. Although this was Top Secret at the time, it was about the most poorly kept secret in history—everybody seemed to know all about it. Some people in the Pentagon had the idea that there were beings, earthly or otherwise*, who might be interested in our activities in the Pacific, as they seemed to be in Operation Mainbrace.* Consequently Project Blue Book had been directed to get transportation to the test area to set up a reporting net, brief people on how to report, and analyze their reports on the spot. Secondly, Project Blue Book was working on plans for an extensive system to track UFO's by instruments. Brigadier General Garland, who had been General Samford's Deputy Director for Production and who had been riding herd on the UFO project for General Samford, was now chief at ATIC,[116] having replaced C*olonel Dunn, who went to the Air War College. General Garland had long been in favor of trying to get some concrete information, either positive or negative, about the UFO's. This planned tracking system would replace the defraction grid cameras that were still being developed at ATIC.*
> Thirdly, as soon as we could we were planning to gather together a group of scientists and let them spend a full week or two studying the UFO problem.
>
> Our proposed trip to the Pacific to watch for UFO's during the H-bomb test was canceled at the last minute because we couldn't get space on an airplane. But the crews of Navy and Air Force security forces who did go out to the tests were thoroughly briefed to look for UFO's, and they were given the procedures on how to track and report them. Back at Dayton we stood by to make quick analysis of any reports that might come in—none came. Nothing that fell into the UFO category was seen during the entire Project Ivy series of atomic shots.[117]

Observe that what was predicted in the Preface is now, apparently, a reality, as the U.S. Air Force appeared at that time to be putting into place a monitoring and tracking system that would not only monitor nuclear tests, but also UFO activity. Observe also that this was under the direction of the Air Technical Intelligence Command (ATIC), at that time headquartered at Wright-Patterson Air Base in Dayton, Ohio.

[117] Edward J. Ruppelt, The Report on Unidentified Flying Objects (Ace Books, 1956), pp. 258-259, all emphases added.

It is also highly suggestive that one commander of the ATIC—Colonel Dunn—was subsequently moved to the Air War College, implying perhaps that UFO considerations were being gradually and quietly incorporated into the US Air Force's strategic calculations and training.

Most importantly, however, Ruppelt indicates that the UFOs were enough of a concern to military planners, especially during the earliest hydrogen bomb firing, that his own Project Bluebook personnel were ordered to the test area, and Navy and Air Force personnel briefed to be on the watch for, and to report, UFOs. According to Ruppelt, "none came," but in the light of the consistent pattern reviewed thus far, this author finds that hard to believe. It is more likely that such reports were filed, and that Blue Book's difficulty in finding transportation to the test area was a deliberate measure designed to keep it out of the loop. Blue Book was simply too public to allow potential public scrutiny of two sensitive areas—thermonuclear tests and UFOs—at the same time.

That this may be a highly plausible scenario is evidenced by what this author believes to be one of the most significant UFO-nuclear test events of them all: Castle-Koon, of the famous Castle codenamed tests, the most infamous being, of course, Castle Bravo. But why is Castle Koon so significant?

As was outlined in Grid of the Gods, Castle Koon was a test of a thermonuclear device, designed by Edward Teller's team at Lawrence Livermore, that fizzled, not achieving anywhere near its pre-test calculated yield. Here we must pause to recall our remarks about this series of tests, and in particular, the Castle Koon test, from Grid of the Gods:

> Its revised yield was a comfortable 1.5 megatons, but instead, the device "fizzled" and failed to achieve barely any fusion reactions at all, coming in at a mere 110 kilotons.
> We are told that of the fizzled yield, only 10 kilotons was accounted for by fusion reactions, or about 9 percent of the total yield. The other 91 percent of the yield was obtained from the fission reactions of the primary and secondary. The explanation for this "fizzle" (which nonetheless managed to carve out a crater 990 feet wide and 75 feet deep!) was "an unexpectedly long time delay between the primary firing and the secondary ignition. Reportedly this was due to a > simple design flaw – the neutron flux from the primary had preheated the secondary leading to poor compression."[118]

> Of course, in the thermonuclear kettle of these witches' brews, the slightest change of just a few nano-millimeters of the thickness of any solid state item within the device, the slightest change of positioning of various components, can—within the split-seconds' timing of the various stages of the reaction—alter its efficiency significantly, and either enhance, or impede, the overall reaction yield. So from one point of view, this explanation has merit.
> But from another point of view, do any of these explanations really make sense? Are we really to believe that Los Alamos National Laboratory knew absolutely nothing about lithium-7 reactions before the "Castle Bravo" test, that it rolled the thermonuclear dice having missed one whole component of nuclear chemistry? Are we really to believe that those reactions burned so efficiently so as to account—after the fact!— for a runaway bomb? And are we really to believe that Lawrence Livermore Laboratory, under Dr. Edward Teller, the "father of the hydrogen bomb" himself, could not successfully design the very bomb he is credited with inventing?[119]

In other words, whereas the Ivy-Mike and Castle-Bravo tests ran away to beyond their pre-test calculated yields, Castle Koon fell short of its pre-test calculated yield by approximately three orders of magnitude!

This extraordinary miscalculation should cast a dark pall of suspicion over any story that the design or calculations of Castle Koon were that far off. In effect, such a story would imply Edward Teller's design team at Lawrence Livermore was grossly incompetent, an explanation that this author finds to be totally incredible and unbelievable.

So some other mechanism for such a dramatic drop in yield must be found. Interestingly enough, Robert Hastings uncovered dramatic evidence of an entire series of UFO sightings throughout the Castle series of nuclear and thermonuclear tests,[120] including a sighting on April 7, 1954, mere hours after the Castle Koon test.[121]

Consider now what has brought us thus far:

[120] Robert Hastings, UFOs and Nukes: Extraordinary Encounters at Nuclear Weapons Sites, pp. 98-99.

[121] Ibid., pp. 99-100. Hastings also points out the highly significant fact that similar sightings were made after the infamous Castle Bravo test: pp. 104-105.

1) UFOs were seen over both American and Russian ICBM sites during the Cold War;
2) In many instances, total power outages accompanied these sightings as ICBMs were taken off alert status, a clear threat to national security;
3) In some instances, targeting and guidance information on these ICBMs was altered while UFOs were present, only to be returned to normal after their departure;
4) In some instances in both the USA and USSR, actual launch sequences on ICBMs was initiated while UFOs were present; and finally,
5) UFOs appeared to be monitoring actual nuclear tests.

Now let us pause and add two considerations to the mix: if some of these UFOs are the product of an actual technology, and this technology includes a field propulsion capability that is based upon the ability to manipulate or engineer the local fabric of space-time,[122] then it stands to reason that this capability could be deliberately employed to alter the yields of nuclear and thermonuclear devices, either greatly magnifying them, or greatly damping them, as is suggestively the case with the Castle Koon test, which failed to initiate any fusion reaction at all, in spite of the clear knowledge of the engineering principles to do so on the part of Teller and his team, and in spite of the fact that the nuclear "trigger" of Castle Koon did indeed fire effectively, and reached the necessary thermal gradients to initiate fusion.

The presence of UFOs throughout the Castle test series, plus the extraordinary inability of American engineers to calculate yields, would indeed have made the UFO matter a priority of the national security state, if for no other reason than that these capabilities implied the ability to render the whole nuclear weapons enterprise so much useless hardware, or the converse ability to render it vastly more efficient than its designers intended. Small wonder then, that the matter was classified higher than the hydrogen bomb, for it implied a physics of much more flexibility and destructiveness.[123]

[122] In this context, it is worth mentioning that Hastings mentions a UFO incident at Vandenburg Air Force Base, site of many Minuteman ICBM tests. In March 1967 a UFO incident also occurred simultaneously with "gravity anomalies" that were measure during a missile test. See Hastings, UFOs and Nukes, pp. 233-234.

[123] I am of course referring to the Canadian Wilbert Smith, who was informed by U.S. sources that the subject matter of UFOs was classified higher

It is similarly important to observe two things here: it was precisely at this time—the 1954 Castle series of tests and their remarkable UFO sightings—that the western military stepped up its incorporation of Nazis into the investigation of UFOs. One such effort is worth mentioning:

> Around 1953 or 1954, according to Frank Edwards, the West German government hired him to head a commission studying UFOs. As a result of this study, (Dr. Herman Oberth) had made a statement, during the summer of 1954, that UFOs were "conceived and directed by intelligent beings of a very high order. They probably do not originate in our solar system, perhaps not even in our galaxy." Like William Lear, Townsend Brown, and Wilbert Smith, Oberth decided that UFOs were "propelled by distorting the gravitational field, converting gravity into useable energy." [124]

This is precisely the same time frame that anti-gravity discussion disappeared in the open literature, and precisely the same time frame that the Nazi "fusion" scientist in Argentina, Dr. Ronald Richter, was secretly being interviewed by the U.S. Air Force, which was being schooled by Richter in lithium-7 fusion reactions, and his theory that rotating plasmas could transduce what he called "the zero-point energy."[125]

In other words, the Air Force probably came to similar conclusions as we are advancing here: another mechanism of energy production was in evidence in thermonuclear tests, that mechanism was very similar to that behind UFOs, and more importantly, that mechanism appeared to be able to alter or damp the otherwise ineluctable laws of nuclear reactions.

UFOs, nuclear weapons, gravitational or space-time gating or transduction effects, anti-gravity, and Nazis: all these coalesce at the same time, and, let it also be noted, the first Bilderberger meeting also took place in 1954. In my view, none of these things are coincidental, and all of them are deeply related, for what we are seeing is the formation of a structure to deal with, investigate, and to the extent than the hydrogen bomb. See Richard M. Dolan, UFOs and the National Security State, Volume 1: Chronology of a Cover-Up, 1941-1973, Revised Edition, pp. 86-88.

possible, control and emulate the phenomenon, which clearly poses a threat simply by dint of its ability to interfere with these weapons.[126]

3. Sightings at Nuclear Weapons Manufacturing Facilities

No survey such as this would be complete without a brief review of what appears to be UFO monitoring of actual nuclear weapons production facilities. Ruppelt records an incident from 1952 in which US Air Force aircraft sighted an unknown object on their radars over the plutonium production facility at Hanford, Washington,[127] and similar sightings occurred there in 1949, at the Oakridge uranium enrichment plant in 1950, and at the Savannah River plutonium and tritium production facility in South Carolina.[128] UFOs have been sighted at actual a-bomb production and assembly facilities such as Sandia Laboratories, and at storage installations such as Kirtland, Air Force Base, both in Albuquerque, New Mexico,[129] and at the base in Killeen, Texas.[130]

---

[126] It is worth mentioning that Hastings records the fact that prior to the Mike and Castle Bravo shots, the flagship that controlled the countdown to the enormous explosions had its power go out, though according to the witnesses interviewed by Hastings, no mention of UFOs in the vicinity was made. See Hastings, op. cit., pp. 110-11.

[128] See Robert Hastings, UFOs and Nukes, pp. 38-39. See also Ruppelt, op. cit., p. 252, for the Savannah River sighting.

[129] Ibid., pp. 45-47. It is to be noted that one such UFO sighting at Sandia in March of 1950, the sighting included witnesses, who were Military Police, seeing a "vapor trail" from the UFO (Hastings, op. cit., p. 47). I have argued elsewhere that such signatures are more condign to human than to presumed extraterrestrial technology, and that remains my view here as well. Yet, we have covered here sightings that by any standard of estimation would seem to defy human capabilities of the day. Hence, one may have an explanation for the earlier statement that the Pentagon was concerned about UFO monitoring of nuclear tests, as some viewed the technology as originating, as Ruppelt put it, from beings "earthly or otherwise." In other words, the Pentagon had come to the conclusion that perhaps it was dealing not only with surviving Nazi research efforts, but with something else and unearthly as well. Such a conclusion would have compelled, no doubt, a further consideration on the part of the US component of this postwar breakaway structure, namely, was this unearthly component known to their Nazi counterparts? And was there any sort of contact or collusion between the two? Such a question would have inevitably arisen

C. Evaluations and Speculations

So what are we to make of all of this? What implications do these incidents have for the formation of the culture of the breakaway civilization, a culture that, as we have indicated, by the turn of the millennium, is bent on a policy of "full spectrum dominance"? How can one have such a culture and policy if UFOs continue to roam freely and interfere with basic communications, and with the nuclear deterrent itself? What may we conjecture would have been the possible responses to the phenomenon?

I contend that the financial requirements alone of the threat posed by the UFO, as it would have been evaluated ca. 1945-1954 during the era of nuclear and of the first thermonuclear atmospheric testing, would have driven planners to the creation of a vast system of "completely off the books finance" in order to meet the type One or Two civilization potentials that this threat posed. As such, and for this reason alone if not many others—Cold War opposition to Communism for example—these planners would have turned to hidden sources of finance, and that that time there were principally two: the criminal underworld and its activities, and the surviving Axis elites and their treasure not only of plundered loot, but scientific expertise. As was seen in earlier portions of this book, this is exactly what happened.

This would, however, have been an uneasy alliance—elsewhere I have called it merely a detente—in any case, particularly between the Anglo-American and Nazi components, simply for the reason that the latter appeared to have at least some rudimentary technology based on the type of thinking being suggested in this chapter, and the former very much wanted to acquire it.

The UFOs, whatever their origin, were clearly threatening to the American military establishment and to the Russian as well, and we may conjecture that this would have led to the creation within both nations of bureaucracies whose mission brief was to emulate the performance via technological development, and if possible, to surpass it. This would, at one stroke, also give those nations the ability to surpass their principal earthly opposition: the USA in the USSR's case, or conversely, the USSR in the USA's case. It is therefore impossible to disentangle the UFO from the Cold War considerations, or vice versa. But at a deeper simply from the normal process of considering all the potential national security risks associated with the phenomenon.

level, the phenomenon would have very likely become a component of secret protocols between the USA and the USSR, since in both cases it had demonstrated an ability to interfere and even potentially to launch each side's missiles. This would have required both sides put into place procedures for verifying if indeed one or the other party was responsible, or if a third party—the UFO—was doing so under truly cosmic false flag scenarios.

It is important to understand what the result of this one consideration would have been, namely, the creation of an international bureaucracy composed of representatives of the potentially threatened nuclear powers and any additional members that might come along, such as the USA, USSR, France, United Kingdom, China, India, or Pakistan, as well as of any "potential" or "crypto-"nuclear powers such as Japan, Germany, or Israel. This alone would constitute a breakaway group in its own right, moreover, by the requirements of its mission brief, one with the highest access to the most sophisticated monitoring and surveillance equipment both on earth and in space. This access would likely exist within the national security structure of each country, but would, in fact, be a parallel group owing ultimate allegiance to something supranational and international in nature.

By the same token, however, factionalism within such a structure could not and most likely would not be avoided, for the abilities of UFOs to interfere with the nuclear deterrents of these nations would have also presented another scenario, one which would likely also have been pursued simultaneously with the emergence of the international group just referred to, for the UFO represented an unprecedented capacity or potential for false flag emulation technologies, i.e., if such technologies could be duplicated, it would be conceivable to render an opponent's launch capability null and void—recall Boeing's efforts to duplicate the Malmstrom Air Force Base UFO shut down capability—or, conversely, to stage a "UFO event" and launch a given country's missiles, which would then be falsely interpreted by the above international group as a false flag accident, with no retaliation required. Such a potential would fit well with the culture of "full spectrum dominance" and the emulative technologies of "plausible deniability" that we have already encountered in previous pages.

One by now sees the major point: any way one approaches the UFO, it is a geopolitical phenomenon of the highest order, and would have called forth the full spectrum of responses, and the concomitant creation of very secret, and probably very international, bureaucracies to deal with it. By the nature of the case, this response would have also required the development of technologies to emulate the performance, and if possible, to surpass the performance, being observed. This would have required hitherto unprecedented levels of finance, completely off the books, and this would have compelled the agreements with former enemies. We know of one such technology already: satellites, which some have speculated probably did double duty not only watching ICBM launch sites, but also UFO activity.[131]

There is yet another potential scenario that opens up as a result of our speculations on the mechanisms of nuclear weapons, longitudinal pulses, and the apparent UFO interest in nuclear sites and tests, namely, that if, as Hastings suggests, UFOs were not only monitoring sites, demonstrating threatening potentials (including as I have argued here the potential alteration of nuclear bomb yields), and sending messages by these means and by "performing provocative aerial displays at these locations, often in broad daylight, so the powers-that-be in Washington could not possibly ignore their presence near these key atomic weapons-related sites,"[132] then those powers-that-be may have also concluded that nuclear detonations were somehow damaging or at least sending potentially threatening messages of their own to whomever was behind the UFOs, and hence, a secret reason may here be indicated for the continued nuclear tests of various nations, including the USA, France, China, and India. At the minimum, the correlation of UFO activity with nuclear tests reviewed here indicates that such correlation may itself be an ongoing object of study of such testing.

Notably, when we proposed in earlier pages the idea that UFO emulative technologies implied the ability to manipulate the energy of planetary systems, and a commensurately large financial commitment, we were not far off, for as recent articles are now confirming, the idea of a "space warp drive" or "engine" is now actually being tested in proof of concept experiments, and this is in the open literature.[133] The problem of course, as I've mentioned many times, any time one is engineering the fabric of space-time locally, one has the potential for a weapon that would make a hydrogen bomb look like a firecracker. Indeed, we have already presented our speculations on why early thermonuclear tests returned such anomalous yields. And indeed, if producing a practical space warp would require the energy of a planet Jupiter,[134] then weaponizing it could also destroy a planet.[135] This must give one pause, for the late Ben Rich, former head of Lockheed's skunk works, was quoted after his retirement and before his death, as having said that the scientists in black projects had found "an error in the equations," and that we now had the capability "to take ET home." In the context, these are chilling words, for if true, then it means the breakaway civilization has truly broken away, and has access to world altering, or shattering, technologies.

But until such time as these capabilities were actually achieved, what would a budding breakaway civilization do to control the UFO phenomenon?

It would, in my opinion, seek not only to emulate it, but to control the interpretation of the phenomenon… it would seek to control the most powerful force in the cosmos: consciousness, and mind, itself…

Dear John:

Yes, I'm a believer in both categories. I feel everything is possible.

Many of our Man-made UFOs are Un Funded Opportunities.

In both categories, there are a lot of kooks and charlatans — be cautious.

PSYOPS: TERRESTRIAL, CELESTIAL AND OTHERWISE:

A SHORT AND SPECULATIVE POSTSCRIPT ON "EMULATIONAL" AND "ANAMNETIC" TECHNOLOGIES AND THEIR POTENTIAL IMPACT ON THE CULTURE OF THE BREAKAWAY CIVILIZATION

"The September 11 operation modified the course of events in the world in the direction chosen by transnational mafias and international oligarchs; that is, those who hope to control the planet's natural resources, the world information network and the financial flows. This operation also favored the US economic and political elite that also seeks world dominance."
Russian General Leonid Ivashov, Brussels, 2006[1]

One might end this book of speculation on the culture of the breakaway civilization with long and lengthy reviews of how crop circles might be the product of the sorts of broadcast technologies referred to in part two, and how crop circles, with their mathematical formalism and peculiar resemblance to occult and esoteric sigils, might be an attempt to communicate with "them," while at the same time masking as a psyop of "them" trying to communicate with us. One might, similarly, have dissected the whole 9/11 event as one vast ritual, played out on a terrestrial and celestial scale, as a vast invocation of ritual magic and sacrifice on the part of an international breakaway group.[2] One might also point out that many UFO abduction cases are arguably military psychological abductions of some sort, and one might in doing so point out, as did Dr. Jacques Vallee, that some accounts of abduction all-too-eerily parallel medieval accounts of the incubus and succubus. On might similarly argue, as did Dr. Vallee once again, that at least some UFO technology appears to be deliberately designed to be a psychotronic technology, i.e., a technology developed for the express purpose to effect some sort of transformation on the consciousness of its beholders.[3]

[2] For the interpretation of 9/11 as a vast sacrificial ritual, see S.K. Bain, The Most Dangerous Book in the World: 9/11 as Mass Ritual (TrineDay, 2012).

In short, one might argue that there is a consciousness aspect to the UFO phenomenon, as well as a nuts-and-bolts, drill-down technological components aspect of it, and this factor would significantly affect the culture of the breakaway civilization. Indeed, as I have attempted to imply in the previous pages, while such a civilization was busily attempting to construct "emulational" technologies, i.e., technologies that resembled or emulated the performance of UFOs, it might at the same time attempt to control public perception of the phenomenon via emulational technologies of a wholly different sort: those designed to produce an effect in the public consciousness.

It was, once again, Richard M. Dolan who made the connection to the consciousness aspect of the problem of the breakaway civilization's culture, with an extended and detailed series of remarks about an "informal" military, intelligence, and scientific group that came to be known in UFO circles as "the Aviary." Citing a case discovered by researcher Howard Blum of a "fastwalker," i.e., an unknown spatial object being tracked by the U.S. space command inside of the old NORAD headquarters in Cheyenne Mountain, Colorado Springs, Dolan gives the details of this group. We cite Dolan's remarks extensively:

> Blum wrote that a report about the fastwalker ended up on the desk of a "Colonel Harold Phillips" in the DIA's Directorate for Management and Operations. Blum revealed that "Phillips" was also the DIOA's "Associate Coordinator of Space reconnaissance Activities." This was a powerful and sensitive position which helped determine missions for the U.S. spy satellites. Blum then described how Phillips organized an interdisciplinary "UFO Working Group" beginning in 1987. It was comprised of scientists and officers from throughout the defense and intelligence community, and worked deep within a secured "vault" within the Pentagon.
> Certain elements of Blum's narrative were correct. However, the name, time frame, and numerous other details were wrong. Later investigations by at least three researchers (Grant Cameron, Timothy Good, and the author) have corrected and added more detail to what actually occurred, although most of the group's activities remain unknown to the public.

> The identity of "Harold Phillips" is known to be Colonel John B. Alexander. Alexander was a former Green Beret commander who participated in the Phoenix program during the Vietnam era, searched for Atlantis in the Bimini Islands, was an official in the Silva Mind Control organization, and a world expert in the field of non-lethal weapons. He had extensive background and knowledge of remote viewing as well as acoustic weapons which could embed subliminal messages or affect a person's physiology.
> In forming this group, Alexander sought to avoid undue attention, and certainly never called it anything as obvious as a "UFO Working Group." Instead, he selected the more suitably vague title of "Advanced Theoretical Physics Group." According to one group member who confidentially spoke to the author, the group met a total of four times: on May 21-22, 1985, August 6-7, 1985, April 24, 1986, and November 18, 1987. The first three meetings took place at the BDM McLean Secure Facility in Virginia, and the last at the Pentagon. A memo leaked to Grant Cameron included information about the first meeting (according to which occurred from May 20 to 25, 1985), and included a partial list of attendees. Timothy Good later received a complete list of that meeting, which included Robert Wood (McDonnell Douglas), Ronald Blackburn (Air Force and formerly Defense Nuclear Agency), Milt Janzen, Don Keuble (Lockheed Aircraft*), Harold Puthoff (head of SRI's remote viewing program, formerly employed by the NSA),* Ed Speakman (Army Intelligence), Howell McConnell (NSA) and Bill Wilkinson (CIA), and Alexander.[4]

The presence of individuals within this "theoretical physics" group with clear connections to "consciousness sciences", such as Colonel Alexander himself, or the famous theoretical physicist and remote viewing program coordinator Hal Puthoff, strongly suggests that at least some in the military-intelligence-physics complex had come to the conclusion that some aspects of the UFO phenomenon represented a connection to consciousness, and that it should be investigated.

But how might one rationalize or "reverse engineer" a chain of reasoning that might have led to this conclusion, and what would be the implications for the culture of the breakaway civilization?

The answer, I believe, lies in a peculiar technique or approach to a well-known, and very public database. The database would simply consist of all those ancient texts that referred to human interactions—interactions inclusive of "cosmic wars"—with "the gods." Additionally, the database would include all philosophical texts of a cosmological or metaphysical nature, from the Vedic texts of India to the Pythagorean, Platonic, Neoplatonic, Hermetic and Egyptian texts of the earliest days of Western Civilization. This database would also include certain Gnostic and other texts from the earliest period of the history of Christianity, texts like The Hypostasis of the Archons, or the theurgic texts of the Neoplatonic philosopher Iamblichus, which indicated that "higher beings" could certainly be contacted through various theurgic rites and states of consciousness.

---

[4] Richard M. Dolan, UFOs and the National Security State: Volume 2: The Cover-Up Exposed: 1973-1991(Keyhole Publishing Company, 2009), pp. 382-383, emphasis added.

The technique, however, would not be all that clear, but it would have been readily apparent to people such as Hal Puthoff, with his background in higher order topologies. Throughout many of my books, I have referred, obliquely or overtly, to what I have called the Topological Metaphor of the Physical Medium. This metaphor is found throughout many ancient texts, and I have reviewed some of these in terms of this metaphor in previous books.[5]

Through such a topological approach to such texts, what would have been immediately evident to people like Puthoff in the group, was that the language of classical philosophical metaphysics would be easily "translatable", or decodable, as certain conceptions within mathematics. But what do we mean by this? Here I would like to share some of my private notes that have led to the development of this idea over the years. These are difficult conceptions, and to fully appreciate and understand what is being said here, a familiarity with what has been developed previously about this topological metaphor is required. Nonetheless, I present it here for everyone, to show how detailed this method of "seeing" can really be.

The eminent Jesuit philosopher Francis Copleston reproduced the following table in his celebrated history of philosophy concerning the components of the Platonic turn (περιαγωγη) and its doctrine of universals.[6]

Mental State		Objects Known
Scientific Understanding (η επιστημη)	Intellection (η γνωσις)	Sources/Principles (αι αρχαι)	Invisibles (τα αορατα)
Knowledge (η γνωσις)	Discernment (η διαϖοια)	Mathematicals (τα μαθηματικα)	Intelligibles (τα νοητα)
Opinion-glory (η δοξα)	Belief, Faith (η πιστις)	Living Things (ζωα, κ.τ.λ.)	Visibles (τα ορατα)
	Shadows, images (η εικασια)	Icons (εικονες)	Perceivables (δοξαστα)

Of note here is the term “mathematicals” (τα μαθηματικα), for this is the clearest indicator that Plato had in mind not a doctrine of metaphysical universals in the sense so normally taught in academies, i.e., of a universal “chairness” in which all chairs participate and by which they are known as chairs, but rather, that all chairs, and “chairness” itself manifest common mathematical properties unique to the “chair” form or universal itself. Plato is, in a word, describing the idea of topology in the disguised language of formal metaphysics.

This topological conception proves to be an analogical “Rosetta stone”, revealing the formally explicit topological metaphor behind classical metaphysical conceptions and symbols, for from the foregoing considerations, it will be apparent that a kind of analogical calculus reveals that many of the conceptions of classical metaphysical philosophy and the symbolic terms associated with them are but the symbols of the “physics” of the differentiation of the material prima. Such, indeed, was the ancients’ view of the term “metaphysics” itself. They would, perhaps, call “metaphysics” by the term “hyper-dimensional” physics were they alive today. Such an idea of an analogical calculus goes further than this and reveals that such terms and symbols are capable of formally explicit topological definition, implying a degree of original sophistication from which the classical metaphysics may be but a declined legacy.

[6] The following table was reproduced in The Giza Death Star Deployed, p. 91.

Let the terms on this side of the table be defined as…	…the terms on this side of the table
Terms of essence, nature, substance or underlying medium Essence, nature, substance (ουσια, φυσις, υποστασις[7])	$\varnothing$, $\varnothing_E$, $\varnothing_E^o$, etc.
Terms of utter equilibrium or non-composition, simplicity Simplicity, simple, simplification (απλωτης, απλως. απλωσις)	$\varnothing$, $\varnothing_E$, $\varnothing_E^o$, etc.

Now, while this excerpt from my private notes may not have made the least specific sense to some readers, one thing—the important thing—that emerges from it is that such terms as "substance, essence, nature, accident, operation" and so on from classical metaphysical philosophy would have direct analogues in mathematics and more specifically topology, combinatorics, and set theory and so on. This is the fact that would have been immediately evident to anyone of Puthoff's background, examining certain types of ancient texts.

[7] It should be noted that υποστασις is here meant in its philosophical meaning, and not in its meaning in Eastern Orthodox patristic dogmatic theology.

Thus by viewing ancient texts in this way, the "analogical" nature of their doctrines of the physical medium would have immediately become apparent to someone like Puthoff, and this in turn would have implied a direct connection—whose exact laws were albeit unknown—between the physical medium and consciousness.

This would have profound repercussions for the culture of the breakaway civilization*, *for an effort—such as the remote viewing program—would have been mounted to understand this connection.

But there is more.

In the above table of Plato's doctrine, the process of turning from the perceptible world to the "mathematicals" is also a process of remembrance, or anamnesis (αναμνησις), a turning from the lower orders to the higher; we might, if we were to put such conceptions in terms of modern physics, say that such a turning (περιαγωγη) would be from a three-space world to worlds of higher dimensions: four-D, five-D, and so on, a process that can only be modeled mathematically, and, interestingly enough, this higher world Plato calls "the mathematicals."

But for Plato it is important to note that this turning to "the mathematicals" is also a process of remembrance, literally of remembering one's descent from higher realms to the lower, and this gives rise to the highly speculative and radical possibility of what I like to call "anamnetic technologies," technologies that, by their very computational power, could recreate with formal precision the detailed steps of this descent or ascent, and thus, technologies that have the potential to "invoke" or even "incarnate" some of these higher realms or beings.

Such technologies would, similarly, allow a civilization in possession of them to coordinate psychological operations on a truly celestial, cosmic, scale.

Such considerations are, of course, fanciful, indeed, radical. But given the vast survey of a culture whose lust for power of all kinds is virtually boundless, we must conclude that if we can think of it, it can too…

CONCLUDING THOUGHTS

"Within this circle is Jehovah's name,
Forward and backward anagrammatiz'd;
Th' abbreviated names of holy saints,
Figures of every adjunct to the heavens,
And characters of signs and erring stars,
By which the spirits are enforc'd to rise"
Christopher Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, Act I, Scene III

I have presented in this book a rather lengthy thesis, namely, that the phenomena of the UFO were encountered in a hidden culture dominated by two essential defining features: (1) the culture of "full spectrum dominance," and (2) the culture of "plausible deniability." From these two wellsprings I have argued that the approach to the UFO phenomenon would have viewed it, first, as primary and principal threat, in much the same way as the Communist bloc was viewed.

I have also presented the view that while the origins of this group may have been related to the time of the airship mystery of the late nineteenth century, by the time of World War Two, with the appearance of foo fighters, and the dramatic postwar UFO activity over or near nuclear weapons sites, that this would have required a dramatically different approach than the secretive and private corporate funding of exotic research. The scale of what had to be achieved was simply too enormous.

The reasons for this enormous scale of funding are, I have argued, rather simple. Within the culture of plausible deniability and full spectrum dominance, the UFO presented a challenge to both those aspects of the breakaway civilization's culture, simply because it presented capabilities that, if interpreted from the Kardashev measure of civilization types, evidenced abilities of at least a Class One civilization, i.e., a civilization requiring the energy of an entire planet, and thus implying the ability to manipulate systems of a planetary scale.

Such a scale, I have argued, implied that the economic response to the phenomenon be commensurate with the need to develop emulative technologies, and that as the technological capacity of emulation grows, so too does the scale of finance and secrecy.

in short, the UFO phenomenon, viewed from this wide cultural perspective, required that the energy of planet Earth be drafted to the task of emulation, for it was only by emulation that it could be in turn confronted and, with proper technological displays such as the ability to manipulate earthquakes and to send longitudinal pulses in the medium, could it be potentially contained and rolled back.

The technological capability of the UFO presented a direct challenge to the aura of "full spectrum dominance" being evolved by the elite during the postwar period, and hence, the UFO presence could not be openly acknowledged—at least, that is, until some technological parity had been achieved. Much less could this breakaway culture come forward and say that it needed to draft the bulk of the Western world's creativity and financial activity to confront it. Hence financing the development of those responses—both technological and otherwise—had to be dovetailed and made one with the similar goal of the containment and rollback of the Soviet Union; in fact, the UFO phenomenon and the responses to it, had to be veiled and concealed within the same structures put into place to deal with the more earthly threat.

In short, a vast hidden system of finance had to be made available to this elite, and that required by the nature of the case that a deal had to be struck with the surviving Axis elites, elites that had access to a great deal of plunder. It required planetary scale financing to confront both potential threats.

Just what may have been achieved during all this time, from the first murky beginnings of possibilities with the airship mystery, through today, with the vast scale of financing implied by the review undertaken here, we do not know. But it is perhaps worth recollecting at this juncture that United Kingdom subject Gary McKinnon alleges he tapped into secret databases of the United States military and space bureaucracies, and discovered there evidence of a vast, and very secret, space fleet and program, which in the context of Ben Rich's remarks, raise the stakes considerably.

Our focus in this book has therefore been on the necessary cultural background to understand whatever technologies might have been developed. It remains to describe much of that technology in another book, and its possible use in covert operations of a terrestrial and celestial nature. We are thus not done with the subject of covert wars and breakaway civilizations.

For our purposes here, however, we may end on this final note. In the previous chapter I observed that to scientific cognoscenti such as Hal Puthoff, ancient texts and cosmological systems would have made one thing abundantly clear: contact may have been going on for a very long time, and the results, in ancient times, were none too pleasant for humanity. Such realizations, occurring as they did when humanity was emerging from its most bloody and destructive war with the explosions of two atomic bombs, would have impelled this culture and civilization to the task of defending itself against the ancient possibilities.

About the Authors

Preface and Acknowledgments

We ask the reader's indulgence. As you can see, this book has two authors, yet is frequently narrated in the first person singular. As the primary author, I (JRN) am conveying my experiences as a clinical psychologist and university professor. As secondary author (PPN), my wife and collaborator for the past 44 years is not a clinician, but she has worked extensively with survivors, clinicians, law enforcement representatives, investigative journalists, and others, particularly in her former role as executive director of the International Council on Cultism and Ritual Trauma. We have spent several years reviewing the clinical, historical, and anthropological literature related to this topic. This book is the result of our combined research as well as the blending of our individual perspectives.

We are grateful for the support, encouragement, and resources made available to us. Thanks to Alliant International University for granting me (JRN) a sabbatical that facilitated the completion of this project. Thanks also to Alliant International University and the California School of Professional Psychology for their support, including opportunities to teach doctoral courses and present accredited continuing education programs on this and related subjects.

To the many former clients and other survivors who shared their stories, we hope this book contributes to a sense of purpose and closure as your experiences inform the education of current and future readers. Out of respect for your privacy and in order to protect your confidentiality, we have provided pseudonyms and altered the identifying data.

We owe a great deal to those who recognize the ritual abuse narratives of their clients and who have persisted in this work in spite of the climate of adversity. We are especially grateful to Wanda Karriker, Jean Riseman, Valerie Sinason, Adah Sachs, Thorsten Becker, Jeanne Adams, Thomas Ball, Betina Overkamp, Carol Rutz, Michael Salter, Frances Yoeli, Tessa Prattos, Carole Mallard, Sandra Buck, Carl Raschke, Graeme Galton, Ulla Fröhling, David Leevers, Karl Douglas Lehman, Alison Miller, Ellen Lacter, Dale Griffis, Tony Bovis, Alan Scheflin, Eileen Schrader, Martin Katchen, Jane Wakefield, Garry Flint, Helen McGonigle, Judith Peterson, Gary Lefkof, Pamela Monday, Ross E. Cheit, Catherine Gould, Michael Newton, Connie Valentine, E. Sue Blume, Angela Browne-Miller, and Trish Fotheringham. We are particularly grateful to Rabbi Ephraim E. Buckwold who helped us clarify questions about Jewish culture and tradition.

We are especially thankful to Dana Raphael and the late Howard Jacobson. Dana, a medical anthropologist and colleague of Margaret Mead with whom she co-founded the Human Lactation Center, Ltd., has been an unwavering source of encouragement and support. She has facilitated a continuing conversation about ritual abuse, particularly its effects on women and children, by sponsoring such discussions at the United Nations Annual Conference on the Status of Women and at the American Anthropological Association's annual meetings. Howard, Dana's husband and life partner, provided a steady hand and invaluable guidance in support of communicating this message. He is greatly missed.

And finally, thank you to ABC-CLIO Publishing Group and Praeger for your confidence in our work.

Introduction

This is the third edition of Cult and Ritual Abuse: Its History, Anthropology and Recent Discovery in Contemporary America, first published in 1995 and revised in 2000. We've changed the subheading so that it is now Cult and Ritual Abuse: Narratives, Evidence, and Healing Approaches to reflect our focus on the stories these survivors tell, the supporting evidence, and clinical approaches that my clients found helpful. We revisit the two previous editions and bring fresh material to the discussion, reflecting the expanding literature and our evolving understanding of it. And we continue to explore the historical and anthropological evidence of traumatic rituals and possession.

In this third edition, we also discuss the psychological components of ritual trauma and propose a theory of dissociation of identity that accounts for the modern clinical narratives and clinical presentation of ritual abuse survivors. We also address related phenomena that include spirit possession, possession trance,[1] and deep hypnosis, and their hypothesized relationship with ritual trauma. We provide a naturalistic explanation for what has been historically known as sorcery and what Harvard physiologist Walter B. Cannon (1942) called "voodoo death." We appreciate the comments of scholars and other professionals who took the time to write reviews of our first two editions of Cult and Ritual Abuse. We've read them and are using their observations and suggestions to guide us in this third edition.[2]

During the period between the second and third editions, there have been changes in our own careers that broaden our perspectives. As the first author (JRN), I transitioned from clinical practice to teaching clinical psychology to doctoral students. My students have been receptive to the idea that ritual abuse occurs in many guises and cultures and that ritual abuse causes dissociation of identity.[3] A number of ritual abuse survivors have been welcomed as speakers at my university and the students have found these events to be valuable learning opportunities and moving personal experiences.[4] The second author (PPN) is now a Social Security disability claimant's representative advocating for people whose applications for Social Security benefits result in hearings before Administrative Law judges who determine disability. At the time of this writing, she has represented approximately 900 individuals. At least half of these reported psychological problems as their primary disabling condition. Of these numbers, only two have carried the diagnosis of dissociative identity disorder (DID). All the others have been identified as having one or more of the following diagnoses—schizophrenia, schizoaffective disorder, bipolar disorder, posttraumatic stress disorder, and borderline personality disorder—even though the symptoms and histories they report are indistinguishable from those diagnosed with DID.

In 1983 after being honorably discharged from the U.S. Air Force, I established a private practice in a suburb of our hometown of Dallas, Texas. By 1986 my practice had grown, and I found it necessary to employ other psychologists and licensed professional counselors to assist with my growing caseload of highly self-destructive people. We named the practice The Center for Counseling and Psychological Services, PC. Over time, some of our clients began to reveal that they had been abused in cults or in cult-like groups that subjected them to bizarre mind control techniques unlike anything taught in traditional university clinical psychology curricula. These clients described experiences of ritual torture causing amnesia, mental fragmentation, altered states of consciousness, and dissociation of identity. They often met the criteria for the psychiatric diagnosis of DID.[5]

My first response to their allegations was incredulity. Patients should be respectfully heard, but their accounts and recollections are not always historically true. Most mental health professionals are trained to take a neutral position about the literal accuracy of clients' narratives. However, I began hearing similar reports from other patients and observed similar psychiatric signs and symptoms (e.g., powerful trance reactions, multiple inner identities, and psychogenic amnesia) among numbers of inpatients at the several hospitals where I practiced. Consultations with fellow mental health professionals revealed that they too were encountering patients with comparable stories and similar psychiatric symptoms. It soon became apparent that there was good reason to investigate the source of their claims and our research led to some surprising conclusions.

As we examined the historical and anthropological literature, we found accounts of religions, cults, and fraternal organizations that ostensibly used traumatic rituals for the purpose of creating altered states of consciousness. These mental states have sometimes been viewed as sacred—as the magical catalyst for profound visions or possession by gods.[6] In other cases, these methods have allegedly been used to establish a powerful kind of psychological control that, until recently, existed underground in secrecy essentially unknown to the community of mental health professionals.

But the events described by these patients and others are not exclusively about the distant past, nor are they limited to exotic, foreign cultures. These traumatic acts of mind control reportedly occur in modern societies, including the United States and other industrialized as well as developing countries. The stories are often incredible and include descriptions of abuse in sadistic ceremonies, some of which are allegedly associated with satanic, Luciferian, and other ideologies alien to many of us. The psychiatric symptom pattern displayed by these individuals appears similar to those historically and contemporaneously described as “possessed.” In probing these patients’ allegations, we were introduced to a world of occultism and other dark traditions and practices. Being persons without superstitions or any beliefs in the supernatural, we’ve tried to make sense of these accounts in purely rational and scientific terms. Consequently, we also offer some hypotheses about the so-called possession phenomena described over the centuries by theologians, religious leaders, historians, and anthropologists.

Our conclusion is that the diagnosis of DID is a Western version of what has been known historically and anthropologically as possession.[7] Is it possible that some variants of possession in other cultures in other times have also resulted from such abusive practices? As the reader will see, there is historical and anthropological evidence that this may be the case.

Some readers may view these reports as unbelievable just as we did when we first heard them. Such skepticism is natural and to be expected. These accounts go well beyond the pale of conventional human experience.

However, the prevalence and similarity of these reports throughout the United States and in other countries should give us pause. Before dismissing these claims, we should investigate. These outcries deserve a fair hearing.[8]

A controversy has arisen among professionals and within families subsequent to these allegations. At the time the first and second editions of this book were written, the situation was grave for many ritual abuse survivors as well as for those therapists who were willing to treat them. People reporting histories of ritual abuse found it increasingly difficult to obtain psychotherapy for their numerous, and often disabling, psychological problems. This predicament was exacerbated by a trend among managed health care and health insurance companies to curtail coverage for the necessary lengthy psychiatric care that these individuals' complex conditions require. In the past, therapists who treated this patient population were the targets of civil suits and complaints to their licensing boards.[9] Many of these actions were frivolous, but because these therapists were working in a newly identified field and one that attracted controversy, they were more vulnerable to claims against their licenses and malpractice liability insurance. Although the climate has become less hostile due to the recent revelations of sexual abuse within traditional institutions such as the Catholic Church, Boy Scouts of America, and other organizations along with well-publicized scandals involving celebrities, any discussion of ritual abuse continues to attract acrimony. How did this happen? Three factors led to this predicament: the politics of psychotherapy; a generally unsympathetic, and sometimes hostile, media; and a growing contingent of reactionary individuals who are intent on proving that allegations of child abuse are overstated.

But is there any hard evidence that these practices actually happen in modern industrialized societies? In spite of the numerous reports of ritual abuse, some authors and journalists have chosen to interpret these allegations as either signs of mass hysteria or the vulnerability of fragile psychiatric patients victimized by unethical or incompetent psychotherapists. Although these hypotheses are worth considering, our experience has often been that the media tend to distort and suppress disturbing facts that should be made public. Later in the book we will discuss some instances where journalists refused to publish facts (e.g., legal case findings) about this phenomenon when they were inconsistent with more politically correct and comfortable-to-believe interpretations. However, there have been isolated cases where efforts were made to present facts in a balanced and evenhanded manner consistent with the best arguments representing both sides of the controversy.

On December 8, 1993, a program produced by the American Justice series, Satan, Rituals and Abuse, was aired on cable television's Arts and Entertainment (A&E) network. Two cases were cited in which convictions were obtained in response to children's allegations of ritual abuse at two different childcare centers, one in Florida and the other in Texas. Significantly, in each case one of the defendants confessed to some of the specific allegations. I am intimately familiar with the case in Texas, having served as an expert witness for the prosecution.

In September 1993 we attended the National Conference on Crimes against Children in Washington, D.C. One of the major concerns discussed at this conference was ritual abuse. Among the prominent speakers was Senator Newton Russell from California, whose presentation "Ritualized Crimes against Children" clearly showed that some legislators were beginning to address this phenomenon seriously. Several states enacted laws against ritual abuse or added additional penalties to existing crimes listed in the states' penal codes. Former Nebraska state senator John DeCamp (1992, 1996, 2005) discussed ritual abuse uncovered during the investigation of a failed savings and loan institution in his book The Franklin Cover Up. This case was also the basis for Nick Bryant's 2009 book, The Franklin Scandal: A Story of Powerbrokers, Child Abuse and Betrayal.

In her exhaustive review of the research, Professor Kathleen Faller (1994) at the University of Michigan concluded that corroborating evidence exists in some cases where ritual abuse is alleged. More recently, Michael Salter (2012) critically evaluated the research associated with organized abuse, including ritual abuse. Our 2000 edition of Cult and Ritual Abuse included a review of the empirical research as well as evidence from criminal cases. This third edition provides an updated and expanded critical review of the available empirical and forensic findings.

Ritual crimes have been prosecuted internationally with convictions in Argentina, Finland, Germany, Ireland, Russia, Wales, England, the Ukraine, South Africa, Indonesia, Papua New Guinea, Israel, Canada, and the United States, among others.[10] Some convictions have received more publicity, as in the case of former Catholic priest Gerald Robinson. He was convicted on May 11, 2006, for murdering a nun in the chapel of Mercy Hospital in Toledo, Ohio. Sister Margaret Ann Pahl was ritually killed in 1980, but the police were not able to identify Robinson as the killer until a ritual abuse survivor went to the police with the accusation that Robinson had abused her in satanic rituals that included her witnessing ritual murder (Associated Press, 2006).

Currently allegations continue to emerge that the well-known but recently deceased British entertainer Jimmy Savile (Penrose, 2013) was a sexual predator of young children. Among the growing list of abuse allegations is corroborating evidence and an accusation that some abuse was perpetrated in satanic rituals (Fielding, 2013).[11] Savile was not convicted because the allegations were made posthumously. Nevertheless, there are ongoing investigations of others associated with him who may have participated in some of the alleged abuses and liability concerns for his employer, the British Broadcasting Company. Those who argue that there is no evidence for the existence of ritual abuse are simply not accurately representing the facts.[12]

When we wrote the first two editions of Cult and Ritual Abuse, there was already a growing ritual abuse survivor movement underway. This movement continues to expand and mature. Organizations such as Survivorship[13] and SMART[14] provide support for survivors and their advocates, including websites, publications, and annual conferences that feature continuing education programs for mental health professionals.

The International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation (ISSTD) is the largest professional association for mental health professionals and others with an interest in dissociation and the psychological sequelae of trauma. In 2008 the ISSTD founded a ritual abuse/mind control interest group (RA/MC IG). When we last checked, this interest group had the largest membership of all the ISSTD’s interest groups. In the United Kingdom, there are professional organizations that include the Trauma and Abuse Group (TAG) and the Ritual Abuse Information Network and Support (RAINS; Buck, 2008; Coleman, 2011). TAG has a website and publishes the journal Interact.[15]

In addition to the previously mentioned ones, other respected professional associations and institutions have provided professional continuing education on the topic of ritual abuse. Notably, in September 2009 the Bowlby Centre (formerly the Centre for Attachment-based Psychoanalytic Psychotherapy) and the Clinic for Dissociative Studies hosted a two-day conference in London, Ritual Abuse and Mind Control: The Manipulation of Attachment Needs, which was subsequently published as a book of the same name (Epstein, Schwartz, & Schwartz, 2011). In October 2012 Alliant International University sponsored an accredited continuing education program, Ritual Abuse: International Clinical Perspectives. Attendance at this event required pre-registration and the venue was filled weeks prior to the scheduled presentation.

Many cult and ritual abuse survivors say that their perpetrators told them that if they talked about their abuses, no one would believe them. It is our hope that this book will help shed light on their disturbing and confusing allegations. In so doing it may be possible to distinguish the reality of this phenomenon[16] from the illusions, superstitions, and misinformation that obscure what is an already complex question. A more realistic and scientifically based understanding of ritual abuse will best prepare us to ethically respond to the needs of this underserved population.

The Church in Thetford Forest

It is difficult to believe that the precipitating incident resulting in a lifelong challenge would seem so innocuous at the time. But in many life experiences, we do not readily recognize these moments as they occur. Rather, in retrospect they take on significance as important milestones, teaching valuable lessons. This was such an occasion.

In 1979 I had never heard of ritual abuse and was unaware of its possible existence. The subject of such abuse was never broached during the staff and supervision meetings where I was assigned at the second-largest U.S. Air Force (USAF) mental health installation in Europe. Furthermore, like most of the clinic personnel, I had been trained to be skeptical of any allegations of sexual abuse made by patients. The prevailing attitudes among the staff were influenced by Sigmund Freud’s theory that people commonly fantasize about such experiences, particularly during early childhood. As a newly trained psychologist, I was completely unprepared to address the phenomenon of ritual abuse.

A special benefit of this European posting was that outside the day-to-day duties required by the base, hospital, and clinic, it provided numerous recreational diversions. The congenial environment contributed a kind of insulation from the unpleasant stories that the psychiatric patients sometimes told.

It was easy to become immersed in the history and culture of England, unknowingly exposed to the evidence and artifacts of historic British religions and secret brotherhoods. At the time, their significance was not apparent to me. However, England was the birthplace of Aleister Crowley, perhaps the most infamous of modern practitioners of ritual magic.

Similarly, Wicca, or white witchcraft, originated in the United Kingdom, along with several secret, occult fraternal organizations.

I had no interest in occultism but was fascinated by the history and picturesque beauty of the countryside. Our family enjoyed driving and hiking from one ancient ruin to the next. Looking back on that period, I recognize that there were many things there to discover and experience that would be directly relevant to my later work with ritual abuse survivors. For example, we frequently visited a picturesque park on the grounds of the abbey at Bury St. Edmunds, a town not far from the air base. While the children frolicked, chasing after the resident ducks and geese, I explored the ruins and wondered what could have driven the townspeople to rise up against the monks on more than one occasion and destroy the magnificent abbey, one of the most sacred shrines in all of England. According to one of the British locals, the monks were known to escape from the abbey and molest the women of the town. Another curiosity was the twin Stars of David that embellished the massive and beautifully crafted abbey gate. Why, in what had been such an anti-Semitic culture, would a symbol of Judaism[1] decorate the gate of the abbey that was the sacred burial ground of King Edmund and the site where the English barons gathered to confirm their resolve to force King John to sign the Magna Carta? Not far away was an old country church, whose interior displayed a medieval wall painting called The Wheel of Fortune.[2] This pagan subject matter seemed oddly out of character in a Christian house of worship. While curious about these mysteries of history, I did not pursue any systematic study. Instead, these days were pleasantly filled with family, friends, and work.

The assignment to the mental health clinic at RAF Lakenheath, England, was an agreeable job for a young captain and psychologist having just completed an air force internship in clinical psychology. With my career at its beginning, the patients’ stories were new and fresh. It was at Lakenheath that I met “Bill,” my first patient reporting ritual abuse, although at the time I didn’t recognize the significance of his story.

Bill’s intake form identified him as Sergeant “William Hoffer,” but he invited me to call him “Bill.” Dressed in his pale blue air force summer uniform, he looked haggard and anxious. He mumbled that it was embarrassing for him coming to the mental health clinic because as a “private person,” he was not accustomed to discussing his personal problems with anyone. Yet, something had happened that was so disturbing that he felt that he had to talk with a professional about it. While he spoke, Bill frequently paused, wrung his hands, and showed obvious discomfort with the subject that had brought him to my office. He rarely looked me in the eye. Instead, he allowed his gaze to travel around my meagerly furnished office in the mental health clinic. Finally, Bill began to speak.

Bill said that he came to see me because he had been to “a party.” Again he hesitated, and I encouraged him to continue. Suddenly Bill’s eyes filled with tears, and he described what appeared to have been a bizarre sex party during which he was sodomized. Bill claimed that the man who assaulted him wore a black robe and a goat’s head mask. According to Bill, the room was partially lit with candles, and some of the other people there were also dressed in robes.

The party, Bill said, started out simply as an ordinary gathering of people, some British nationals and some U.S. military personnel and dependents. Pockets of individuals and couples conversed and drank. When I asked Bill if drugs were used at the party, he looked away. Bill said that he had been invited to this party by a casual acquaintance with the promise that it was a “really wild group” and that Bill was “sure to get laid.” Indeed as the evening progressed, several of the partygoers appeared to become intoxicated. Eventually, some of those present began to openly engage in sex, and the party degenerated into an orgy. Bill said that some of those present shed their clothes while others clothed themselves in dark, hooded robes and chanted to Satan. It was at that point, Bill alleged, that he was raped. The issue that motivated Bill to seek counseling was not so much his brush with the occult as his fear that because he had not actively resisted his rape, he might be homosexual.

I asked Bill where this party had occurred. He told me that this group met in an abandoned church located in Thetford Forest not far from the air base. With some hesitation, he gave me the directions to the church. Already skeptical of the details of his story, it was at that point I became even more dubious. I was familiar with the road he described but had never seen a church there. Although he seemed sincere in what he was telling me and showed no signs of being psychotic, Bill’s narrative was simply too bizarre to be taken at face value.

Several days later, I happened to drive by the location described by Bill. Thetford Forest is a thickly wooded area, difficult to navigate in many places because of the lush undergrowth of ferns and other vegetation and the abundance of trees. Along the perimeter, the dense green panorama is interrupted by occasional stone and flint cottages and farmhouses. I drove slowly along the road looking off into the forest and saw what appeared to be a small, flint-studded church, partially obscured by trees. There was no footpath or road by which to approach the church by car. For a moment, I considered parking my car at the side of the narrow English road and attempting to walk to the building. I decided against it and drove back to the base.

Bill’s sessions with me focused primarily on his fear that he was a gay male. There was considerable homophobia within the U.S. armed forces at that time. Bill was taking a risk discussing this with me because it could have been used as grounds for his being discharged from the USAF. Eventually, he satisfied himself that he was not gay. I concluded that he had become involved with a group of people who were drawn toward unconventional sexual practices and that they used the occult and demonic trappings in their sex games. I assumed that Bill’s story was something rare. I was unfamiliar with any similar cases in the professional literature of psychology.

I was, however, aware of one precedent to Bill’s story, the notorious Hell Fire Club.[3] This group, led by Sir Francis Dashwood in 18th-century England, allegedly existed for the purpose of providing male aristocrats with opportunities for sexual debauchery. According to one of my undergraduate history professors, these sexual escapades were conducted in a manner that included acts of blasphemy along with the simulation of demon worship. The professor pointed out, however, that these “rituals” were not authentically satanic but merely a decoy for the real purpose of the organization, which he claimed was sexual license.

This group had historic significance because of an association between Benjamin Franklin, who is said to have visited the club in 1758, and certain important English aristocracy and representatives of the British government, who were also members of this club[4] during the time when the American colonies were seeking independence. With so little material published on the subject of occult-inspired sexual practices, I decided that they must not occur often and so I thought that I would probably never again see a patient like Bill.

On the Borderline

Clinically, I had particularly wanted to work with patients with phobias and anxiety disorders, but opportunities to see such individuals were relatively rare in the Air Force. As one of the most junior ranking staff at the mental health clinic, I paradoxically tended to be assigned many of the more seriously disturbed and challenging patients. Such individuals, with their relatively chronic and severe problems, are often frustrating to those who try to help them. Typically, their progress in therapy is slow, and improvement is often only marginal.[1] On the other hand, it can be dangerous to limit or deny treatment to these patients because many of them episodically present a risk of suicide, self-mutilation, or, occasionally, harm toward some other person.[2] Many of the senior mental health providers avoided working with these demanding, and frequently dangerous, patients by referring them to me. Consequently, I began to gather a sizable caseload of them, many of whom met the criteria for the diagnosis of borderline personality disorder.[3]

One such patient was “Annie.” The wife of a young enlisted man, Annie had a complicated psychiatric history consisting of intermittent episodes of agitation and sadness, suicide attempts, and self-mutilation. Much of the time, she was charming, friendly, and talkative. On other occasions, Annie flew into rages, often for no discernable reason. Annie seemed overly dependent on her husband, typically refusing to drive alone or go to places without him. Yet, when they were together, she was usually aloof and emotionally distant. She was extremely critical of herself[4] and felt unloved and unworthy of love. She said she felt “dead” inside in spite of her usually intense, and often lively, outward appearance. Her speech, sometimes poetic, reflected a sense of poignancy about life and the others around her.

She didn’t understand why her life was in constant, uncontrollable turmoil.[5] Annie said that another doctor once told her she had a “chemical imbalance” in her brain and that her emotional problems were a result of faulty neurochemistry. When I asked her what she thought, she responded with an empty and melancholic silence.

Annie was a person with many contrasting moods, ideas, and feelings. Sometimes when I saw her, she appeared to be gregarious, dramatic, and animated. At other times, her face was devoid of expression or stained with tears. Periodically, Annie deliberately cut herself and afterward described feelings of great relief.[6] Sometimes before these incidents, she was observed staring into space chanting, “I’ve got to see blood; I’ve got to see blood.” Those involved with her care tried to prevent her acts of self-mutilation through hospitalization. But even in a protected hospital environment, Annie found ways to inflict self-harm. Once when she was hospitalized, she successfully concealed a sharp object that she used to scratch and superficially cut herself. In the morning, she was discovered with blood smeared on her body and on the walls of her room. I didn’t have an opportunity to continue Annie’s therapy because her husband was reassigned to another station. But there were many others in my caseload who lived in a similar state of mental torment.

At the time when I saw Annie, borderline personality disorder was not an official diagnosis listed in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) of the American Psychiatric Association. This diagnosis was added in the third revision (DSM-III) that was published in 1980. Thirty-three years later, the literature on borderline personality disorder has broadened and is growing. On February 10, 2013, I entered the phrase “borderline personality disorder” into the PsycINFO search engine and got 6,470 hits representing that number of individual professional books and journal articles. It surprised me that so many publications had been generated for a diagnosis that was recognized only in 1980.

Borderline personality disorder is characterized by deeply conflicted emotions, running the gamut from rage to terror, from depressed apathy to turbulent agitation. People with borderline personality disorder often experience self-loathing that alternates and coexists with self-absorption or narcissism. Their frequent acts of self-destructiveness, including self-mutilation and suicide attempts, bewilder and frighten their friends and caregivers. These individuals typically have unsatisfying relationships and appear to alienate those whose support they need, while at the same time expressing fears that they will be abandoned. Patients with this diagnosis often appear uncooperative in therapy and are frequently accused of sabotaging their own treatment. The condition of such patients is considered chronic with intermittent episodes of distress and diminished functioning. In my experience, many of these patients respond in unusual or unpredictable ways to psychiatric medications.[7]

Many of these patients perceive their lives to be unsatisfying and empty. However, in spite of their numerous psychological frailties, there is often a richness of character present. With lives that sometimes parallel those of the antiheroes of the modern cinema, they frequently appear to be rebels or eccentrics. Like Don Quixote’s compulsion to do combat with windmills, their aggressive energies frequently seem diverted toward pointless or unwinnable conflicts, while at the same time their impractical battles often betray their romantic idealism.

Some of these clients are reminiscent of well-known creative personalities who periodically appear in the course of history. Like Vincent van Gogh, Peter Tchaikovsky, and Edgar Allen Poe, they typically live chaotic, turbulent, and eccentric lives.[8] Although they often lack the simplest understanding of many of their own more mundane and routine experiences or enactments, they periodically demonstrate profound and creative insights.[9]

Upon discharge from the Air Force, I went into private practice in Richardson, a suburb of Dallas, Texas. Although I wished to develop a practice specializing in the treatment of phobias and anxiety disorders, my experience and willingness to work with patients with borderline personality disorder soon became known and resulted in a sizable caseload of these individuals. However, the professional community was—and is—divided about the proper approach to treatment for such patients. Then, as now, my review of the professional literature on the subject of borderline personality revealed no clear consensus regarding the appropriate therapy for individuals with this diagnosis. A book by Waldinger and Gunderson (1987) listed six different psychodynamic[10] theoretical approaches to conceptualizing and treating borderline personality disorder. However, even this roster is not comprehensive. Other theories and therapy methods have been used with these patients, and not all of these are classified as psychodynamic.[11] Another category of treatment approaches are the cognitive or cognitive-behavioral therapies that emphasize how habits of thinking affect one's emotional well-being. Psychiatrists Katharine J. Nelson and S. Charles Schulz summarized a broad array of contemporary treatments for borderline personality disorder that include dialectical behavioral therapy, mentalization-based therapy, systems training for emotional predictability and problem solving (STEPPS), transference-focused psychotherapy, and schema-focused therapy with the inclusion of family involvement (Nelson & Schulz, 2012).

One important question addresses the etiology of borderline personality disorder. What are its causes? Some clinicians and theorists question the extent to which punitive or neglectful experiences in childhood could be significant antecedents. The method of neuroimaging has been used in an effort to understand more about the brain functioning associated with borderline personality disorder (New, Perez-Rodriguez, & Ripoll, 2012). Hazlett et al. (2012) found that individuals who were diagnosed with borderline personality disorder had increased brain activity in the area of the amygdala using event-related potential functional magnetic resonance imaging and while being shown pictures with emotional content. Hughes, Crowell, Uyeji, and Coan (2012) proposed a link between developmentally compromised frontolimbic brain function in borderline personality disorder and Coan's social baseline theory (2008) that argued for a neurodevelopmental explanation for the emotionally soothing effects of healthy interpersonal relationships. Some researchers and clinicians have found interpersonal betrayal to be a likely factor (Belford, Kaehler, & Birrell, 2012). In a meta-analysis, Ruocco, Amirthavasagam, and Zakzanis (2012) found evidence of reduced brain volume in the area of the hippocampus and the amygdala.[12] Childhood sexual abuse is often identified as a factor that may cause this disorder.[13] In their study of 106 women with major depressive disorder, Cankaya, Talbot, Ward, and Duberstein (2012) concluded that "parental perpetration of sexual abuse increases the likelihood of multiple suicide attempts among women outpatients" (p. 45).

Dr. Wilfred Abse wrote about the origins of the term borderline:

> In 1891, George M. Beard wrote a series of essays in the New York Medical Record in which he introduced the term border-liners and applied it to "that large class of nervous persons, sometimes hypochondriacal, sometimes neurasthenic, sometimes hysterical, sometimes epileptic, sometimes inebriate, sometimes several of these united who," he wrote further, "are > almost insane at times and yet may never become insane, though sometimes they may cross the borderline." (1983, p. 340)

Abse explained that the current psychiatric diagnostic manual at the time, the DSM-III, stated conservatively: "Child abuse and other forms of severe emotional trauma may be predisposing factors." In citing the DSM-III (American Psychiatric Association, 1980, p. 258), Abse added, "I have never found severe psychic trauma to be absent in such cases" (1983, p. 340). Also writing about borderline patients, Nagel (1989) observed: "Therapists frequently say they do not see many patients who have experienced incest, molestation, or physical brutality. This is not necessarily because their patients have not had these experiences, but rather, because therapists overlook, deny, or ignore the existence of these problems" (p. 402). I have to admit that sometimes I failed to inquire about sexual abuse in the histories of my clients, often because early in the history taking they frequently deny abuse, even though later in therapy some admit that they had experienced such abuses.

Think about it for a moment. Imagine yourself as a client having your first session with a mental health professional. Although he or she is a stranger to you, you are asked to disclose intimate details of your personal life. You feel nervous, embarrassed, and emotionally overexposed. You are unsure about confidentiality. You wonder whether anything that you say about yourself will later be used against you (e.g., if your mental health records are subpoenaed in a divorce or child custody hearing). The question of sexual abuse in your childhood comes up.[14] What would you say?

I cannot blame the patients for their hesitance or inability to identify accurate histories of sexual abuse. I have to confess that I have never liked hearing about childhood sexual abuse. I often simply hoped that my patients would not bring the subject up. I assure you that hearing adults sobbing while recounting a childhood rape by a drunken parent is a painful and demoralizing experience for all concerned, including the therapist. I hoped that the numerous incidents of this horror reported by some of my colleagues were an exaggeration.[15] As I later read in The Challenge of the Borderline Patient:

> Borderlines frequently and increasingly report sexual abuse (as well as physical and emotional abuse) having occurred during their childhood and adolescence. Attempts to explain away this phenomenon by invoking the borderline's hysterical suggestibility stimulated by greater public > awareness and publicity of childhood sexual abuse appear inadequate and even malicious. (Kroll, 1988, p. 41)

The author continues:

> It is more likely that professionals have become more aware of the need to ask the relevant questions and patients have become less reluctant to acknowledge and discuss these usually recurrent childhood and adolescent sexual assaults. Certainly there is much better evidence for the occurrence and centrality of sexual abuse as an important etiological factor in the development of borderline symptoms and style than there is for the mythical “not good enough mothering” of the separation-individuation phase. (Kroll, 1988, p. 42)

Some clinicians have attempted to describe and explain the psychological processes associated with borderline personality disorder. One of these conceptualizations, known as object relations theory, originated, in part, with the work of the Austrian-born British psychoanalyst Melanie Klein. This theory is sometimes used to explain the mental inner landscape of these patients. It is construed as consisting of internal representations of other people and that these internal representations are often themselves considered fragmented. Thus, according to this theory, many of these clients have internalized representations of “people” and fragments of people in their “inner world”[16] as a consequence of normal development.

Today this concept parallels what therapists who work with dissociative identity disorder (DID) (multiple personality disorder [MPD]) sometimes call alter personalities or alter fragments that, in the language of object relations theory, might be labeled internal objects and internal part objects. During my early experience treating borderline personality disorder patients, I could find no connection between the two diagnoses because I had never seen a client whom I recognized as having MPD.

In fact, at that time, I viewed the diagnosis of MPD with suspicion and questioned whether it was a legitimate diagnosis or simply an artifact of sloppy or poorly conducted psychotherapy. I wondered if overzealous and naive psychotherapists inadvertently created the disorder in their patients through suggestion. Never having seen the disorder among my patients, I believed it to be rare. When I was a graduate student, the only reference I heard with regard to MPD occurred when an instructor declared it to be so scarce that we would probably never see a case in the course of our professional careers. It was not until much later that I read reports by other authors who expressed the view that the diagnosis of borderline personality disorder had much in common with MPD[17] and that MPD was not actually rare. According to these authors, MPD was more often unrecognized and, thus, underdiagnosed.[18] In a sample of 207 psychologists, psychiatrists, and social workers, Hayes and Mitchell (1994) found 24% of them to be moderately to extremely skeptical about the MPD diagnosis. Additionally, their data showed that professionals’ skepticism was inversely related to their knowledge about MPD. Finally, Hayes and Mitchell found that MPD was less accurately diagnosed than schizophrenia and that misdiagnosis of MPD was associated with skepticism about MPD. Why would mental health professionals allow bias and lack of knowledge to affect their diagnostic thinking? This question is important and will receive further attention in subsequent chapters of this book. Some argued that MPD is a questionable diagnosis without a scientific basis or that the diagnosis was accepted by few mental health professionals. Over time, research began to accumulate addressing these questions. In a study by Dunn, Paolo, Ryan, and Van Fleet (1994), the authors surveyed 1,120 psychologists and psychiatrists employed by the Veterans Administration. Eighty percent of their respondents endorsed belief in the legitimacy of the DID diagnosis. Another study by Mai (1995) surveyed 180 Canadian psychiatrists and found that 66.1% believed the diagnosis was legitimate, 27.8% did not, and 3.3% were unsure. Pope, Oliva, Hudson, Bodkin, and Gruber (1999) also studied 301 board-certified psychiatrists. The authors found that 15% of the psychiatrists thought that DID should not be included in a future revision of the diagnostic manual, 43% thought it should be included with reservations, and 35% thought it should be included without reservations. In response to a question, “In your opinion, what is the status of the scientific evidence regarding the validity of Dissociative Identity Disorder?” 20% endorsed “little or no evidence of validity,” 51% endorsed “partial evidence of validity,” and 21% endorsed “strong evidence of validity” (p. 322). Surveys of professionals’ beliefs about a diagnosis do not necessarily reflect the actual scientific status of a particular diagnosis. Professionals do at times have biases and may be misinformed. Because psychiatric diagnoses are abstract and based, to a large degree, on subjective reports of patients, it is often difficult to directly or precisely measure specific characteristics of the diagnosis. However, inter-rater reliability is one scientific index of psychiatric diagnoses that has been relatively well researched. Studies of the inter-rater reliability of the DID diagnosis made with structured interview methods show that DID has perhaps the highest inter-rater reliability of any psychiatric diagnosis (Ross, 1997). The courts have also upheld the finding that DID is a scientifically accepted diagnosis. In 1999, the Washington State Supreme Court determined that the diagnosis of DID met the criteria for the Frye rule.[19] This ruling meant that expert testimony about DID was admissible in federal court because the court had determined that the diagnosis was generally accepted in the mental health field.

Entering Uncharted Territory

I continued working with patients with borderline personality disorder and other related diagnoses.[1] Although many of them improved in therapy, the work was often frustrating and exhausting. Some authors began writing about burnout, secondary posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), and compassion fatigue among caregivers.[2] On the other hand, it was gratifying when these clients made progress.

I hoped to identify particular treatment approaches and techniques that would promote quicker and more complete recovery. In the pursuit of this goal, I began to study a variety of different therapy methods in order to differentiate those that would be most effective. During that time, and also since then, a number of psychological approaches evolved that were specifically developed for the treatment of people with this diagnosis. However, the theories varied and often were inconsistent with one another. Many of the theories seemed to rely on unproven assumptions. Others seemed to offer pat answers to intrinsically complex questions. As time went by, I came to believe that many of the books and journal articles were not as instructive as the experience of actually working with these clients who proved to be excellent teachers. I wondered what would happen if mental health professionals gave up or suspended many of their preconceived ideas and spent more time listening to their clients.

Having little confidence in the prevailing psychological theories, my preference was to take a position of humility, acknowledging that there is much uncertainty in the mental health literature and lore. Historically, psychology has lacked a single unifying theory that has been generally accepted. Many of the empirical research findings have been inconsistent with one another and open to alternate interpretations. Thus, there is a need for professionals to proceed with caution, acknowledging that there is little that we know with a high degree of certainty. We should consider multiple potential factors and, whenever possible, generate hypotheses and test them. We need to adopt the simplest explanations for phenomena that fully explain them. This is a generally accepted principle of the logic of science known as parsimony.[3] Unfortunately, therapists sometimes embrace particular theories and then use them to interpret their clients' behaviors and experiences without testing the theories. In my humble opinion, psychologists and other mental health professionals commonly accept explanations for psychological processes that are unparsimonious and unproven.

In an atmosphere of uncertainty, it seemed important to cultivate humility, honesty, and genuineness. It is not the therapist's job to interpret or offer explanations to clients to account for their experiences or their problems in living. I encouraged my clients to honestly explore their own thoughts and feelings, to consider alternate explanations, and to scrutinize their various interpretations, memories, and beliefs.

There were a variety of different approaches that seemed helpful. Many of these clients used individual psychotherapy as their primary pathway toward recovery. However, I found that group therapy was also a productive therapeutic method.[4] There are a variety of different ways to do group therapy. Some groups are highly structured by the facilitator, occasionally addressing a particular theme or introducing particular group exercises. Other groups are more unstructured and the group participants are encouraged to talk about anything meaningful or emotionally significant to them. Many groups alternate from a structured to unstructured style depending on the particular goals at the time.

Group therapy can be an effective treatment modality for people who feel that they are alone in life, misunderstood, and unworthy of kindness or respect. Many groups are emotionally supportive, and in such a nurturing environment, people can learn that others share similar feelings. People also learn to experience social acceptance in terms of their individual diversity, developing a sense that each person has a right to respectful treatment, and that they need not all be the same as one another in order to have worth or acceptance. Thus, participants are often able to improve their social skills and self-esteem,[5] and frequently experience relief interacting with others in an atmosphere of honesty and warmth. In the group setting, people are able to explore their relationships and gain insights about the way their behaviors are perceived by others through methods such as role-playing and role reversal as well as through other group therapy techniques.[6]

For a time, I regularly conducted inpatient group therapy for patients with borderline diagnoses on the psychiatric unit of a local community hospital. On one occasion, I brought a baby doll to the group and asked if the group members would be willing to hug the doll, one at a time, imagining they were holding themselves as children. They were invited to hold the doll individually and describe any feelings that they experienced. The purpose of the exercise was for the group members to explore their capacity for self-nurturing, their attitudes about themselves, their self-perceptions, and their feelings about their childhood experiences.

The outcome of this exercise was dramatic, although not immediately. Early in the exercise, many of the participants felt, not surprisingly, self-conscious and even silly engaging in behaviors so alien to normal adult roles. However, some of their resistance had nothing to do with the apparent absurdity of the therapy task. Some of the patients refused to hold the doll because their self-hatred was so great they could not stand the idea of holding themselves, even symbolically.

As we explored these feelings over several days in group therapy, some of the patients began to report improvement in their feelings about themselves. Eventually, many of them were able to embrace the doll, and some would tearfully talk about breakthroughs in self-acceptance. Many of these group members previously had little insight about the conflict between their feelings of self-revulsion and their emotional neediness. As a result of the exercise, some said that they understood their feelings better, whereas others simply seemed able to integrate these opposing emotions. It was such a moving experience that the head nurse of the unit later purchased a similar doll for me as a personal gift but also one that would be used in future groups.

Some time later, I was asked by a neurologist colleague at the same medical facility to consult with one of his patients, a married woman in her late 30s. “Susie” was hospitalized for intractable headaches, and the neurologist suspected that her pain was at least partly related to psychological factors. When I visited Susie in her hospital room, she showed no outward appearance of distress but described intense, excruciating headaches. While elaborating on these painful sensations, her facial expression was so pleasant and congenial that I wondered if she really was experiencing any discomfort. Because her hospital room was dimly lit, I turned on the overhead light in order to write my case notes as we talked, but simultaneously Susie grimaced painfully.

When I switched the light off, she appeared more comfortable. Her response provided some objective evidence that she was experiencing actual physical pain because it is common for patients with a migraine to experience an exacerbation of pain in bright light. However, her pleasant affect was incongruous. Her outward appearance showed what some clinicians call la belle indifference, or an attitude of mismatched lack of concern with her identified problem. This style of behavior was often associated with the old, and now rarely used, diagnostic term hysteria.

Hysteria was a label that once represented an official diagnostic category, but in more recent practice has been replaced with the diagnostic terms conversion disorder and dissociative disorder.[7] Patients with conversion disorders develop “one or more symptoms of altered voluntary motor or sensory function” (American Psychiatric Association, 2013, p. 318) that cannot be medically explained and that cause significant distress or impairment of functioning. An example would be the case of a woman who developed a psychological (rather than neurological) paralysis that prevented her from attending the funeral of her mother.[8]

Dissociative disorders are a general diagnostic category listed in both in the American Psychiatric Association’s Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) and the World Health Organization’s International Classification of Diseases (ICD). In the fifth edition of the DSM (DSM-5), dissociative disorders include dissociative identity disorder, dissociative amnesia, and depersonalization/derealization disorder, along with two miscellaneous categories (other specified dissociative disorder and unspecified dissociative disorder). According to the DSM-5: “Dissociative disorders are characterized by a disruption of and/or discontinuity in the normal integration of consciousness, memory, identity, emotion, perception, body representation, motor control, and behavior” (American Psychiatric Association, 2013, p. 291).[9] The diagnosis of dissociative identity disorder represents “the disruptive experience of two or more distinct personality states, which may be described in some cultures as an experience of possession” (p. 292) and amnesia or memory gaps for important personal information, traumatic events, or everyday information that cannot be explained as ordinary forgetting. Dissociative amnesia is the inability to remember important personal information not due to a medical condition, drug ingestion, or another psychological diagnosis such as dissociative identity disorder, acute stress disorder, and PTSD. The diagnosis of depersonalization/derealization disorder reflects the "persistent or recurrent experience of depersonalization" (American Psychiatric Association, 2013, p. 302) (a sense of unreality or detachment of the self), derealization (the-experience of one's surroundings as unreal or detached), or both.[10] Prior to 1994, with the publication of the fourth edition of the DSM (DSM-IV), dissociative identity disorder was known as multiple personality disorder (MPD). The ICD continues to use MPD.

Susie and I talked for a while, and I asked her to complete a psychological test, the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (MMPI). After reviewing her test data, I returned to see her the next day. Susie's psychological testing appeared more consistent with the diagnosis of borderline personality disorder than one of the hysteria-related diagnoses. In any case, it was common for people with the diagnosis of borderline personality disorder also to have some of the characteristics of hysteria (i.e., either conversion or dissociative symptoms).

As I became acquainted with Susie, I came to know her as a person who wanted to be seen as well functioning, but who was, in reality, moody, periodically explosive, and at times, desperately needy. When I asked her about her experiences growing up, she told me that her family was wonderful. In later sessions, however, Susie related that her father was an alcoholic who physically and sexually abused her. She described strong feelings of revulsion and self-hatred. Susie reminded me of the patients with whom I worked in the group therapy milieu who were initially unwilling to express acceptance of themselves when imagining themselves as children.

I asked Susie to imagine that she could see herself as she was when she was a child. Then I asked her to picture herself in the present, as an adult comforting and nurturing the child she once was. Susie closed her eyes and was quiet for a while. I waited and, then after a few moments, asked her what she was feeling. Susie's eyes opened and, with a gleeful expression, she responded in a soft, high-pitched, childlike voice, saying, "Hello, Doctor Randy."

In our previous sessions, Susie addressed me as Dr. Noblitt. I was surprised by her different speech and behavior. “Susie,” I asked, “are you okay?”

“Silly, I’m not Susie. Susie went away.”

“You’re not Susie?”

“No-o-o,” she playfully drawled.

“Then who are you?” I asked.

“I’m Little Susie.”

Observing Susie in her hospital bed, I saw a fully grown woman of normal weight and slightly taller than average. Yet, despite the evidence of my eyes, the patient’s voice had the intonation, rhythm, and articulation of a little girl. “Little Susie” told me that she was four years old and that she came out to talk to me because she had watched me talk to “Big Susie,” and she decided that she liked me. She complained that no one would listen to Big Susie and that Big Susie felt alone and scared. Little Susie thanked me for listening to Big Susie and gave me some additional historical information that the patient had not previously revealed.

After this conversation between Little Susie and myself, the patient became quiet again. A few moments later, Susie’s expression and voice returned to their previous adult-like quality. She showed no signs of having any recollection for the conversation between Little Susie and myself, and when I asked her if she knew anyone by the name of Little Susie, she said she didn’t know what I was talking about. She did say that something about the session had made her feel better, but she did not know what it was.

I left her hospital room puzzled and bewildered. What I had just witnessed appeared to be a textbook case of MPD. But how could this be—given that I did not consider MPD to be a legitimate diagnosis?

In proceeding with the evaluation of Susie, I looked for alternative explanations other than the MPD diagnosis but could find none. In fact, she began to show more of these alternate identities as the assessment continued, and some of her alter personalities began to narrate stories of cruel and sadistic abuse in Susie’s childhood. Each of her personalities was different in some way. Some were expressed as children, some enacted the role of teenagers, and some were portrayed as adults. The memories of these alternate identities were also sometimes different and, at times, arguments would ensue among the personalities regarding the veracity of their various accounts. My inability to find an alternate explanation for Susie’s behavior forced me to concede that that her correct diagnosis was MPD.

Some of Susie’s emerging alternate identities reported that the allegations of abuse were just “made up.” I tried to explore both sides of this inner controversy in order to arrive at the truth. For example, a particular alternate identity would take executive control and speak: “I’m Billy. The stories you’re hearing are just made up. In fact we don’t even have MPD.” I asked “Billy” why he used a different name from Susie. Billy had no answer and simply disappeared for the moment. Other alternate identities expressed great relief that someone was willing to listen to “them.” Some expressed fear that there would be retaliation, usually by other internalized identities, because some of the other alter identity states were “telling the secrets.”

Although the theme of secrecy was paramount in Susie’s narratives, she also expressed the need to be able to talk about her strong pent-up feelings. When describing the repeated incidents of abuse, alters would sometimes weep pitifully, and at other times, they would recount these stories wearing the blank and glassy expression characteristic of individuals in a state of shock. Occasionally, child alter identities would playfully emerge just to make friendly conversation.

One of the male alters seemed particularly angry and hostile, making threats toward me and denying the accounts of childhood abuse and that Susie had MPD. Initially, this alternate identity would not identify “himself,” but once when provoked, “he” stood up in front of me and defiantly announced, “I am the ‘Evil One.’ ” When the alter identified “himself ” in this way, I incorrectly assumed that “he” was introducing “himself ” merely as an evil alternate identity. Much later, I came to realize that the “Evil One” was an internal representation of the devil.

This clarification did not become apparent until after approximately two years of therapy with Susie when stories of ritual abuse in a satanic cult began to emerge. As time went by, her stories became more bizarre and incredible. However, the alternative explanations were even more unbelievable. Suffice it to say that at this time, I believed that this patient was demonstrating symptoms consistent with a diagnosis of MPD. The notion of ritual abuse had not even occurred to me. The idea of MPD alone was sufficiently bizarre to stretch my capacity for new ideas to the limit.

Multiple Personalities

It was difficult accepting the concept of multiple personality disorder (MPD) for several reasons. Until the time I consulted with Susie, the idea of this diagnosis ran counter to my education and clinical experience. Furthermore, a publication by Nicholas Spanos and his associates (1986) indicated that alternate identities could be created by hypnosis. I had heard some other professionals claim that all of the cases of MPD that had been reported thus far were found in individuals who had undergone hypnosis. It seemed reasonable to assume that MPD was created in patients who were highly suggestible[1] by practitioners who were using hypnosis. Some authors stated that individuals with MPD appeared to go into spontaneous trances (e.g., Bliss, 1984a).[2]

Although I had not used hypnosis with Susie, she did appear to enter trance states during our sessions. Was she experiencing spontaneous trances? Other authors reported that spontaneous trance states were common among persons with MPD. Was it possible that Susie did not have MPD before she met me? What if Susie was merely an extremely hypnotizable person who sometimes experienced trance states without a formal hypnotic induction? When I asked her to imagine herself as an adult nurturing herself as a child, was it possible that I inadvertently put the idea in her mind that she might be two different people? Might she have responded to this as if it were a suggestion and then developed MPD? What if I were the one who caused her MPD?

An article in the professional literature addressed this question of therapy-induced MPD (Spiegel, 1974). According to Spiegel, there are certain highly hypnotizable individuals whom he called “grade 5s,” corresponding to a test of hypnotizability that he developed known as the Hypnotic Induction Profile. According to Spiegel, these highly hypnotizable individuals are prone to take on the attitudes and beliefs of their therapists and are so suggestible that he warns against the use of introspective psychotherapy with them. Spiegel and Spiegel (1978) further elaborate this theory in their book Trance and Treatment. In these publications, the authors recommend a differing approach to treatment based on the patient's measured hypnotizability, but no data are cited that demonstrate that highly hypnotizable patients improve more with the treatment they recommend. Furthermore, according to Cohen (1984), tests of hypnotizability, including Spiegel's, have not been readily accepted by clinicians: "The data lead to the conclusion that none of the tests of hypnotizability have yet proved their efficacy to even significant minority of clinicians" (p. 79).[3]

I worked further with Susie in an attempt to learn more about her experiential world. I especially wanted to evaluate whether it was our therapy that contributed to her mental fragmentation and the various alter identities that were appearing. As each alternate identity emerged, I attempted to get an individual history of that particular identity by asking questions such as, "When did you first come into existence?" and "How old were you?" or "How old was the body?" or "What was happening then?" Although the various alternate identities were different, some being helpful and cooperative while others were hostile and adversarial, most were willing to give an individualized history and claimed they had been created by Susie's mind when some overwhelming or traumatic event occurred. For example, "Little Susie" told me that she had first come into existence when Susie's father forced her to stand on the hot metal grating over a gas floor furnace that burned the soles of her feet. The notion that trauma was related to the creation of these alter identities was not suggested to the patient by me in our previous conversations. At that time, I was unaware of the relationship between trauma and dissociation. Furthermore, in all cases, when I obtained a history of a particular alternate identity's experiences and memories, the alternate present told me that "he" or "she" had come into being at some time long before I worked with the patient.

A few years later, I read Frank Putnam's (1989) Diagnosis and Treatment of Multiple Personality Disorder, which especially addressed the question of whether MPD could be created by the interventions of a therapist using hypnosis or whether other therapeutic interactions might create this disorder. Putnam seemed to be describing the same phenomena I was observing. His book explained that many of the alternate identities have histories associated with experiences that occurred long before therapy commenced. Putnam noted that the pseudo-personalities supposedly created by hypnosis have markedly different characteristics than genuine alternate identities seen in patients with MPD.[4]

This has also been my experience. In attempting to help clients stabilize, I sometimes suggested to them that they would be able to create more "helper" alternates, but this strategy was never successful. Although it is possible to change an already-existing alter's name, habits, sense of identity, and job, I have never been able to use hypnotic suggestion to create alter identities who have any enduring reality or significance to the patient. Additionally, the task of modifying the characteristics of alters already in existence is not easily accomplished (e.g., in a few sessions of hypnosis) but normally engages the client and therapist in lengthy, difficult, and labor-intensive work. The suggestibility of the patient does not seem to be an effective conduit for promoting meaningful or lasting change. Otherwise, multiples could simply be encouraged to say to themselves, "Every day, in every way, I am getting better and better." Experience has taught me that such an approach does not work.

Frequently Susie, the host personality,[5] denied any knowledge of the other identities' existence, and the alters sometimes expressed resentment that she didn't acknowledge them. Occasionally, the alternates would do things to prove to Susie that they were real. They sometimes took executive control of her body and engaged in behaviors that Susie neither appreciated nor approved. In some cases, Susie remembered engaging in the harmful or undesirable behaviors, but in other cases, she had amnesia for the events that occurred. Sometimes the alter identities wrote notes to Susie, and occasionally to me, for which Susie often denied memory of having written. On other occasions, they described traumatic events for which Susie was previously amnestic. When confronted with such reports of abuse made by her inner "personalities," Susie sometimes recognized the veracity of what the alters reported to her, but on other occasions she was unsure. Because these alter identities described an existence and a history that antedated my interactions with the patient, and because I was unable to enact any significant changes in them simply by suggestion, I have concluded that it would be extremely unlikely that they were produced by therapy.

Nevertheless, this is a most curious phenomenon. Why do some individuals seem to dissociate into separate selves in the presence of trauma?

This question was not readily solvable, and there was an endless stream of these trauma survivors seeking immediate attention. Many of them initially had no conscious awareness of the cause of their distress. Instead, they came to my office with a long list of psychiatric and health-related problems.

One such patient was “Pat.” She was in her 40s, small and emaciated, and she looked much older than her actual age. Her hair was styled in a short pixie cut, and her eyes appeared sunken, empty, and deeply sad. She told me that she had panic attacks and agoraphobia for which she had been unsuccessfully treated by a nationally known phobia specialist. She was fearful of leaving her house, driving a car, or being in crowded places such as shopping malls. She was anorexic and had a hand-washing compulsion that was so severe that her hands sometimes bled from the self-inflicted dryness and excessive wear from her compulsive scrubbing. She claimed to be chronically fatigued at least in part because she had an exhaustive and time-consuming house-cleaning ritual that occupied so much of her time and energy. However, her low caloric food intake also may have been a factor. Furthermore, Pat’s cleaning compulsion left her without any free time to enjoy recreational activities or other pleasures of life. She was depressed and felt hopeless that her life would never be anything more than joyless drudgery at best.

Pat’s long history of treatment, including a lengthy psychiatric hospitalization, left her feeling frustrated and without hope. Together, we developed a treatment plan to gradually reduce her compulsions and phobic behavior and increase her intake of food. Although she made slow but steady progress toward her treatment goals, she also appeared to be experiencing a kind of persistent, passive resistance. When we talked about the prospect of her improving her life, she expressed a strong motivation to do so, and yet her actual behavior seemed to consistently sabotage her progress. We discussed this idea and she agreed that there was significant resistance[6] within her, but she didn’t understand it or why it was there. I proposed that we could explore this question further using the psychotherapy technique of role-playing.

I asked Pat to consider the idea that part of her mind wanted to get well, and it was for that reason that she sought therapy in the first place. I also offered the possibility that part of her mind might not want to get well, and so as a result she might experience some resistance to her therapy. I asked her to imagine that she was no longer speaking only for herself, but that she could act out and verbalize the thoughts and feelings of the part of her mind that might not want to get well. I told her that together we could discuss the possible reasons she might have for not making progress in this role-playing exercise. She was familiar with role-playing, and so we were able to proceed without any difficulty.

I addressed Pat as “Part,” which was short for “part of your mind that might not want to get well.” I said, “Part, why don’t you want to make more progress in therapy?” She paused for a moment and then began to detail her own feelings of self-revulsion and her belief that she was unworthy of enjoying a normal life. As she continued to elaborate on this theme, her speech subtly changed to a slower tempo and, after a while, she was silent and stared down at the floor with a blank expression on her face. Her silence prompted me to ask, “Part, could you tell me more about. . . . ” She interrupted me with a hostile glare and, in a harsh voice, snapped, “Don’t call me that.” I asked her, “What do you want me to call you?” In slow, angry, strident tone of voice, she responded, “The Evil One.”

At that moment, I was at a loss for words. After regaining composure, I simply tried to keep her talking. I remembered Susie’s alter identity, the “Evil One,” and saw similarities in Pat’s persona by the same name. Both interacted in a strikingly similar manner. Both glared at me menacingly and spoke in a low-pitched, raspy voice. Both referred to the self [7] in extremely critical, pejorative terms and in the third person (e.g., “she”). I encouraged her to continue talking, and she did.

Eventually Pat paused, again with her eyes lowered toward the floor and an empty expression on her face. I asked her to tell me more about what she was thinking and feeling. She began to speak, but her voice was different. It was soft, higher-pitched, and childlike. I was reluctant to ask her to tell me her name in the event that such a question might suggest that a different “person” was expected. Yet, she seemed like a different person. In order to get around this dilemma, I simply asked her to spell her name for me.

“B-A-B-Y,” she responded with an impish grin.[8]

“Baby” initially began talking to me in a friendly, cheerful manner, but her mood became increasingly somber as she began to describe sexual abuse by her brother with whom she was forced to sleep in childhood.

Again I was at a loss for words. After a while, she looked at me with a curious and somewhat disoriented expression. It appeared as if she did not know what we had been talking about.

"How do you feel?" I asked her.

"Fine," she responded.

"Tell me what you remember about our session today," I inquired.

Pat was able to describe what had transpired during our appointment until she came to the part of our session where she had talked to me using the names of Evil One and Baby. I pressed her for more detailed information, but she was unable to recall that portion of our therapy hour.

As I continued seeing more individuals like Susie and Pat, I began to consider that MPD and dissociation of identity were not as rare as I had been led to believe. I obviously needed more information, and I began reading more books and journal articles. I also joined a local MPD study group facilitated by Gary Lefkof, MD,[9] a Dallas psychiatrist skilled and knowledgeable in this field. In my discussions with other therapists, I learned that some of them were developing experience with MPD and were becoming acquainted with a related topic that some of my patients had just begun to speak of—ritual abuse.

I recognized my need for further education in the area of dissociation and MPD. I joined the International Society for the Study of Multiple Personality and Dissociation (ISSMP&D), which is now the International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation (ISSTD).[10] The ISSMP&D's monthly newsletters and its quarterly journal, Dissociation,[11] became a helpful source of information. In one of its articles, Bennett Braun (1988a, 1988b) described what he called the "BASK" model of dissociation. According to Braun, patients with MPD were capable of dissociating along several psychological dimensions, specifically, behavior, affect, sensation, and knowledge.

But what exactly is dissociation? Why would some people be unable to remember things that they had actually done? Why would mental functions that normally worked in concert seem disconnected? Different authors offered different interpretations.[12]

The topic of dissociation has an intriguing history and extensive related literature.[13] Henri Ellenberger's book The Discovery of the Unconscious (1970) is one of the classic histories of psychodynamic psychiatry's early beginnings and provides chapters on the contributions of Pierre Janet, Sigmund Freud, Alfred Adler, and Carl Jung. Ellenberger traced the ancestry of dynamic psychiatry beginning with the magical world of shamans and witchdoctors through the historic accounts of demon possession in Europe. He wrote, “Possession eventually disappeared, but it was replaced by multiple personality” (Ellenberger, 1970, p. 111). Adam Crabtree’s book From Mesmer to Freud: Magnetic Sleep and the Roots of Psychological Healing (1993) built on Ellenberger’s thesis adding details about the continued evolving thinking about dissociative phenomena that eventually led to Freud’s psychoanalytic theory.

One interpretation of dissociation is that it is a defense mechanism. Although this was not part of Janet’s original formulation,[14] Josef Breuer and Freud wrote:

> The more we occupied ourselves with these phenomena the more certain became our convictions that the splitting of consciousness, so striking in the familiar classical cases of double consciousness, exists rudimentarily in every hysteria, and that the tendency to this dissociation, and with it the tendency towards the appearance of abnormal states of consciousness which we comprehend as “hypnoid states,” is the chief phenomenon of this neurosis. In this view we agree with Binet and with both the Janets. (1893/2011, pp. 230–231)[15]

The psychoanalytic notion of psychological defense mechanisms was first articulated in a paper written in 1894 by Freud, “The Neuro-Psychoses of Defense” (1894/1962), and later elaborated by his daughter, Anna Freud (1946), and other psychoanalysts (e.g., Laughlin, 1970). Essentially, the theory of defense mechanisms proposed that people protect themselves from emotional discomfort, pain, or even trauma through a variety of unconscious mental maneuvers. Dissociation is sometimes conceptualized as such a defense mechanism.[16] Although theories about defense mechanisms have been widely and popularly accepted by many mental health professionals, they are also difficult to test scientifically because they postulate hypothetical entities and functions not directly measurable by an outside observer.[17] But then this is one of the central problems in psychology. Internal mental and emotional processes are not normally observable in a purely objective way. Psychology is, at its best, the attempt to objectively study subjectively experienced phenomena.[18]

As my caseload of clients with dissociative disorders continued to grow, I was struck by the high incidence of poverty among these individuals. Prior to working with this population, my practice largely consisted of affluent residents of prosperous areas of North Dallas. However, it was soon evident that a large proportion of dissociative clients were only marginally functioning in the workplace, and many were unemployed or underemployed. Quite a few of these individuals had been in therapy for years before a diagnosis of MPD had been made and by then they often had exhausted any mental health insurance benefits they may have had.[19] Other therapists in the MPD study group also commented about the financial hardships endured by many of these patients and the fact that most of the therapists were doing increasingly more work on a pro bono basis. Unfortunately, this arrangement was also creating a financial hardship for many of the therapists, and some questioned whether they could afford to continue to work with this population.

Nevertheless, I continued to provide services to these clients. As they revealed their abusive histories like the layers of an onion, years of pent-up rage were released, sometimes resulting in temporarily increased self-destructive thoughts and behaviors. At the same time, their financial limitations restricted their ability to pay for necessary treatment. County and state facilities were not adequately responsive to their needs, and I found myself providing more and more services on a sliding scale or pro bono basis and working longer hours.

One of the most important lessons I learned was that many of these clients were excellent teachers. It occurred to me that the professional community could learn much from them. Unfortunately, rigid thinking is often difficult to overcome, and many clinicians have been resistant to reconsider their treatment philosophies or modify their professional views in the light of this newly growing body of knowledge.

I consulted with “Sharon,” a tall, attractive woman in her late 30s for almost two years. Sharon had originally come to my office because of violent discord in her home. Her husband accompanied her, along with two of their three daughters. Apparently, the older of the two daughters, “Patricia,” had, the week earlier, stabbed her younger sister in the hand with a fork at the dinner table. As a part of my evaluation of this family, I psychologically tested and interviewed each person who was involved in the family conflict. As it turned out, Sharon’s psychological testing showed the most serious problems. Her testing results indicated that she met the criteria for a diagnosis of borderline personality disorder. It is not an unusual situation in family evaluations when a child is brought in for treatment that another family member is found to be in greater distress and more psychologically disturbed than the child. I recommended that both the family conflicts and the individual problems of the family members be addressed in therapy. Sharon agreed to see me for individual psychotherapy.

Sharon told me that she thought she needed psychotherapy since her childhood but had also feared the prospect of actually doing it. She said that her parents had discouraged her from discussing personal family matters outside the home. When I asked her about her early family life, Sharon, like Susie and Pat, initially said that she had enjoyed a pleasant but uneventful childhood. However, as she continued talking in therapy, she began to relate abusive incidents inconsistent with her initial account of her family of origin.

Sharon recounted occurrences of physical and emotional abuse in her childhood primarily perpetrated by her father. She described him as a cruel, sadistic man with a violent temper who was physically and emotionally abusive to both her mother and herself. Sharon described her mother as a passive woman who frequently looked the other way, ignoring Sharon’s plight. Sharon denied any history of sexual abuse.

As we continued our sessions, Sharon began to narrate a history of repeated self-destructive acts, including two suicide attempts. She later amended her earlier report that she had not been sexually abused and described an incident with an older man who was apparently a family friend. Sharon said that this older man had lured both her and another young girl into his barn where he offered them both candy. It was there that the two girls were showered with the attention and affection that neither of them was receiving at home. Eventually, he fondled them sexually and required that they do the same with him. Sharon told me that her girlfriend divulged what was happening in the man’s barn to her own parents but that they did not believe their daughter and accused her of lying. Sharon said that she felt guilty for not corroborating her friend’s complaint but she feared getting into trouble herself. I asked if she continued to keep contact with this childhood friend, and she said no. Her friend committed suicide before completing high school.

On one occasion, Sharon telephoned from her home to say that she was feeling particularly depressed and self-destructive. It was a Sunday and my office was closed, but I agreed to meet her there. When I drove into the parking lot, I saw Sharon was already there waiting. She was seated in front of the office building that was locked for the weekend. Next to her were several empty beer bottles. I knew from her history that she frequently consumed alcohol before her acts of self-injury. I led her into the building, and we walked down the hall to my office.

Once there, Sharon became quiet. She stared at the floor; her eyes were glazed with a distant expression on her face. She began to murmur under her breath: “I want to see blood. I have to see blood.” It was obvious that she was experiencing an impulse to cut herself. Although I had heard this from her before, her words still provoked a strong sense of apprehension. I tried to convince her to find some more appropriate alternative to her self-destructive feelings.

“I don’t think you understand how bad I feel. Well, I’ll show you how bad I feel.” With that she reached into her purse and took out a razor blade and before I could react, she sliced open the inside surface of her left arm from her elbow to her wrist. I expected her to wince with pain, but instead, her response to the injury was an expression of ecstasy. Sharon’s eyes rolled upward for a moment and her eyelids fluttered. “Oh, that feels good,” she moaned.

I tried to wrestle the razor blade out of Sharon’s hand, fearing that she might injure herself further, but I couldn’t get it safely out of her grasp. Her expression of elation was gone now, and she looked at me threateningly and in a masculine, low-pitched voice barked, “Back off!” I told her I would let go if she would let the razor drop to the floor. She glared at me for a few moments. Finally, I felt her hand relaxing, and the blade fell to the carpet.

Sharon’s demeanor then changed. She was apologetic. She spoke to me in a gentle, childlike manner, apologizing for bleeding on my office furniture and carpet. Blood was now running down her arm, and I could see that the cut was deep. I asked her to come with me to the emergency department of the hospital next door. She followed me obediently with her head slightly bowed.

My office was adjacent to a community medical-surgical hospital, and we walked to the emergency department, and despite my efforts to stop the bleeding, Sharon dripped blood along the way. Once we arrived in the emergency room, I explained what had happened to the physician on duty. Quickly and efficiently the emergency room staff strapped Sharon to a gurney and effectively immobilized her. I stayed with her in a quiet corridor while she awaited further medical attention. She appeared subdued and drowsy for a time. Suddenly, Sharon glared at me, her face drawn in anger as she rhythmically repeated in a deep-pitched, hoarse voice, “Kill the bitch. Kill the bitch.” I asked her who she was talking about, but she only continued to repeat, “Kill the bitch.”

After Sharon’s wound was stitched, she was admitted to the psychiatric unit of the hospital. Some of those on her treatment team concluded that she had experienced a psychotic episode. Nevertheless, she was an enigma to the staff, and many of the nurses said they didn’t know what to do with her.

While hospitalized, Sharon and I met individually and she appeared to engage in dissociative switching with the appearance of distinctly different personality states. These inner identities had their own individual names and demonstrated characteristics consistent with her developmental history at different stages of her life. Other alter identities enacted behaviors that appeared to be totally alien to what was typical of Sharon at any age. When I addressed this phenomenon in her staff meeting, none of the other professionals involved in her care acknowledged seeing any of the dissociative symptoms that I was describing. So, with Sharon’s permission, I began videotaping some of our sessions. While some of the nursing staff reviewed these videotapes, Sharon’s busy psychiatrist showed no inclination to do so himself. The nursing staff seemed surprised to see Sharon’s alter identities revealing themselves in our videotaped sessions. Indeed, this was unlike anything they observed in the time they spent with Sharon on the unit. I asked Sharon why her behavior was so different in our sessions in comparison with her interactions with other staff members. In response to my question, her demeanor suddenly became childlike and she whispered, “People inside aren’t s’posed to be out.” I asked her why, and she took on a serious expression, “Sharon’s father said so.”

“When did he say so?”

“When the body was little.”

“Then why do you talk to me?”

“You won’t hurt us.”

In Sharon’s sessions with me, she not only dissociated but also began describing bizarre, sadistic, sexual abuse by her father. When her psychiatrist prescribed antipsychotic medication, Sharon became more passive and less overtly self-destructive, and she was discharged from the hospital.

I continued to follow Sharon on an outpatient basis, but her course in therapy was inconsistent with numerous episodes of marginal functioning. She began to show the presence of more alter identities that would identify themselves by name and talk to me in our therapy sessions. Her psychiatrist increased Sharon’s antipsychotic medication until she appeared to be showing toxic symptoms, including poor concentration, chronic drowsiness, slurred speech, and decreased short-term memory. In spite of, or perhaps because of being on, exceptionally high doses of medication, Sharon’s progress in therapy was quite limited. In fact, her functioning deteriorated intermittently and frequently, and she was rehospitalized on several occasions.

Eventually, Sharon’s psychiatrist referred her for electroconvulsive shock therapy (ECT). This is a psychiatric treatment method in which electricity is passed through a portion of the patient’s brain causing a convulsion often along with temporary memory loss and disorientation. ECT is a controversial treatment sometimes used with patients whose severe depression does not respond favorably to more conservative treatment.[20] Some psychiatrists recommend ECT because there is a literature that some patients later show signs of improved mood. Some also prescribe ECT out of desperation when psychopharmacology is ineffective. And certainly the fact that insurers, including Medicare, cover ECT gives psychiatrists an additional option in their limited arsenal of treatment strategies.

Sharon consented to ECT treatments because she was feeling a sense of desperation and hopelessness. She admitted being quite fearful of undergoing the procedure. Although her mood seemed temporarily improved after each ECT session, she reverted to the same level of poor functioning she had previously shown. I was concerned that the extremely high doses of antipsychotic medication and ECT were harming her and impeding her recovery. When I protested about the use of ECT and communicated my concerns regarding the high doses of medication to Sharon’s psychiatrist, I received an icy response.

Because Sharon was so unstable, her psychiatrist again admitted her to the hospital where he practiced. I continued to express my worries about her high levels of medication and questioned the fruitfulness of subjecting her to continued ECT treatments. The psychiatrist eventually acknowledged that she was showing signs of medication toxicity, and he agreed to begin to gradually reduce her dosage levels. Sharon continued to dissociate with alternate identities, and her obsession with blood, and other morbid themes persisted.

In order to better understand and monitor the progress of my dissociative clients, I ask each of them to keep a journal where they log their various feelings and experiences during the day. One of the curious things about these patients is that their handwriting style often changes depending on which particular alternate identity appears to be in executive control. Such changes in handwriting have commonly been observed by other professionals who work with dissociative clients (Armstrong & Loewenstein, 1990; Lewis, Yeager, Swica, Pincus, & Lewis, 1997; Yank, 1991). I also noticed that many of my dissociative patients would scribble and draw geometric shapes in their journals and elsewhere. Sometimes in art therapy, I observed patients with dissociative identity disorder entering an apparent trance state after looking at another patient's artwork. Surprisingly, this seemed to be especially true when the artwork[21] contained some of the stereotypical geometric designs that many of them were prone to draw. Periodically, I asked patients to describe their feelings or to free associate to their drawings or to the drawings of others. In the process, they often verbalized important information relevant to their recovery. In some cases, they said that they remember seeing the geometric designs or symbols as part of bizarre cult rituals in which they had allegedly been present.[22]

Once during one of Sharon's hospitalizations, she seemed unusually mentally unfocused and zombielike and complained that she felt "shut down." She said that she emotionally felt depressed but that her mind was blank.[23] Although her mental functioning was already deteriorated, it effectively came to a halt as we began our scheduled psychotherapy appointment. I asked her if she wanted to reschedule for another time but she was adamant that we continue. She requested help in becoming more focused, and I responded by asking her to free-associate with some geometric shapes. This procedure had been productive with other highly dissociative patients.

I drew some simple shapes on separate sheets of paper: a circle, a triangle, a square, and a five-pointed star. Sharon looked at them one at a time and described the first thoughts and feelings that came into her mind. Her responses were unremarkable until she came to the drawing of the star.

When I asked her what she associated with the drawing of the star, she responded, “sex.”

In free association, a person normally responds with a variety of different statements but the association of “sex” to the picture of the star was an unusual one, and I asked Sharon to tell me more about it.

“You know,” she said.

“No, I don’t know. Please tell me,” I responded.

“You know—it’s what it means.”

“It’s what what means?” I asked.

Sharon was hesitant to talk further and appeared frightened. “My Daddy said to never tell,” she whispered in a childlike voice with tears in her eyes. She appeared to want to communicate something but was extremely fearful of doing so. With my encouragement, she eventually explained that the figure of the star was something she often saw before her father raped her. I asked her how she was able to see a star under those circumstances, and she described a ritual whereby her father used to draw the star in blood on her abdomen. Sharon appeared to switch to a different child alter. Her voice was high-pitched and fearful.

“Who are you?” she asked me. “How did you get me here? I’m not supposed to be here. They will hurt me.” Suddenly, her behavior and speech were different. She appeared to be even more apprehensive than before and was initially reluctant to talk to me at all.

Finally, Sharon told me that her name was “Sacrifice” and that she had been given that name because her job was to be the sexual sacrifice at the rituals that occurred in her family’s home, usually on Friday evenings and typically with both of her parents present. I asked her what had made her decide to talk to me, and she said that she trusted me; she knew I would not hurt her. She said that I had a bright white “aura” or circular-shaped light around my head and that meant that I would not harm her.

I asked Sharon more about her “aura” experience. For some reason, these patients sometimes reported “psychic” abilities, including a belief that they could see auras. People with such beliefs sometimes think that there are some “gifted” individuals who can see lights around others’ bodies and from the color and other properties of the light they can make interpretations or judgments about the other person. Being that I am a skeptic, this was particularly curious to me. Although not an expert on researching the paranormal, what little I had read in the scientific literature consistently seemed to confirm that there was no scientific evidence in support of the reality of such purported phenomena. As I inquired further of this alter, she explained that she was supposed to have the ability to see auras as a result of some of the rituals in which she had been forced to participate. Her father had warned her that these experiences were to remain strictly secret.

I interpreted this “gift” as a probable hallucination[24] or illusion that the alternate personality state Sacrifice experienced because she believed that she had been in a ritual that was supposed to produce this ability. Later I encountered other patients whose alters also reported this ability. What I discovered was that the reported shape of the auras was exceedingly similar. Auras were described as being circular or oval shapes around the head of a person, similar to a halo.[25]

This came as a surprise to me because I thought that auras were supposed to be perceived as light around a person’s entire body. However, when I asked patients about their perception of the color of the aura they saw around me, the colors they reported seeing varied markedly, although most of them saw me as having some kind of light or luminous aura that they interpreted as meaning that I was kind and caring. The patients described color schemes with varying hues associated with differing personality characteristics. For example, one patient gave me an interpretation of the colors as follows: White represented goodness and purity; gold indicated saintliness or godliness; red designated passion, anger, and past suffering; purple meant power, authority; and black, not surprisingly, symbolized evil. Other patients reporting this experience sometimes interpreted the colors as having a slightly different meaning, but many were essentially in agreement.

Because my patients perceived my “aura” in colors that were not consistent, I concluded that these perceptions could not be interpreted as truly “psychic” experiences. However, the similarity of shape and associated interpretive beliefs described made me wonder if these individuals had been trained to see these “lights” in a particular manner. Curiously, Harner (1990), an expert on shamanism,[26] described how shamans or witch doctors are trained to “see” visions and have other “psychic” experiences.

One of my patients reporting a history of ritual abuse said that she was also raised Roman Catholic. Once in my office, while in a dissociated state, she took a picture of Jesus out of her purse and, while talking about it, called his halo an “aura.” I wondered then if the halos that are seen in some religious art works, especially in earlier times in history, might be related to this perception of auras that some people may have been ritually taught to experience.

As therapy with Sharon proceeded, she continued to evidence dissociated states, different voices, and different names for her different “selves.” Finally, one day when she spoke to me, she announced that her name was “Susan.” Because Susan was a newly identified inner person, I inquired about her own personal history. She was the first alter identity with whom I had ever communicated who said she came into existence during the time I was working with the patient. She said that she had come out the weekend before when the nursing staff had placed Sharon in protective restraints because Sharon was banging her head against the walls of her room. Susan said that Sharon didn’t have MPD and that the stories about the rituals and the sexual abuse “were all made up.” As in the example of Susie, described earlier, I noted the discrepancy of the patient’s denial of having MPD while using a different name for herself but I chose to not to point this out. Instead, I tried to keep her talking, and she did. She went to great lengths to say that Sharon was going to be okay and that Sharon was ready to be discharged from the hospital. I encouraged her to continue talking. The more she talked, the more difficulty she had maintaining her façade. Eventually she looked at me sadly as Sharon often did. I asked her what her job was.

“To say that the stories are all made up.”

“Why do you want to do that?” I asked.

“Because Sharon can’t take it if she was hurt that way.”

“Well, was she hurt that way or not?” I asked.

“Yes, it’s true,” she sobbed.

I continued to protest that Sharon was being overmedicated and that her ECT treatments were not helping and might even be harmful to her. The response of her psychiatrist, who was also her attending physician, was to remove me from her care.

In contrast, a different outcome was achieved in the case of “Mary,” whom I began to see in therapy at about the same time I was working with Sharon. She came to see me at the insistence of her husband. Mary had reportedly been depressed for as long as she could remember, but recently, at the age of 41, her mood had deteriorated dramatically. She felt anxious, nervous, and increasingly emotionally isolated from her husband and children. Neither her personal nor her professional life provided her with any sense of pleasure or satisfaction. Sex, never a particularly strong drive for her, had become an anathema. Her life simply was not working. Mary had never before sought therapy. She had briefly attended a free codependency group but recognized that the solutions to her problems would require a more intensive and individualized approach.

My first impression of Mary was of a woman caught up in what some call a mid-life crisis. She appeared to be very intelligent, highly articulate, and insightful in many respects. She seemed to recognize the nature of her problems but felt helpless to do anything about them. As with all of my patients, I administered psychological testing including a Minnesota Multiple Personality Inventory (MMPI) and Dissociative Experiences Scale. Mary's testing showed high levels of depression and anxiety, and the scales that measure posttraumatic stress were also highly elevated. As I engaged her in the therapeutic process, Mary began to relax and was able to communicate with greater openness and candor. However, after a few sessions, Mary began to dissociate with altered personality states appearing and reporting the now sadly familiar childhood history of chronic, sadistic, sexual abuse. Mary described her father's incestuous behaviors and recalled his threats that no one would believe her. Child alters wept when they recounted how Mary had hoped in vain for her mother's intervention.

Because of strong self-destructive threats from some of Mary's alternate identities, she entered a psychiatric hospital for a brief stay. However, during that time it was possible not only to stabilize her but also to work intensively toward full integration.[27] In a 10-day period, during which no medications were administered, Mary fused her alters. I had never participated in such a rapid process of integration and questioned whether it would be lasting or final. Shortly afterward, several newly identified alternate identities presented to describe experiences of ritual abuse. These alter identities recounted their experiences along with the powerful emotions that accompanied them and then reintegrated with the patient. In order to more objectively assess her progress, I readministered the MMPI, and the results showed a dramatic change for the better.

At this point in Mary's therapy, there was a remarkable physical difference in her, from her posture to her facial expression. As we continued to work in the postintegration phase of her therapy, Mary blossomed. Her self-destructive thoughts and depression vanished. She began taking better care of herself and taking pride in her appearance. She bought a new wardrobe and appeared more relaxed and self-accepting. She took a greater interest in her family, and her marriage reawakened, stronger and happier than ever before. Mary enrolled in graduate school, and four years later she earned a master's degree in counseling. From diagnosis to integration, Mary had been in therapy for four months. I terminated with Mary following a year of tapering aftercare, but I continued to receive periodic phone calls and visits during which she apprised me of her continued progress. Before moving away from Texas, I spoke with her, and she spontaneously described herself as a "survivor" of ritual abuse and reiterated that she was coping well and was basically happy with her life and feeling productive in her work and relationships. I wondered whether, over time, she would come to think of her memories of abuse as being merely fantasies, but apparently that has not been the case. We remain periodically in contact, and despite the passage of time and the various pressures and strains that are part of life, she continues to thrive. Now more than 20 years after her therapy and integration, she also continues to acknowledge that she was ritually abused in childhood.

To what can one attribute Mary's swift recovery? In spite of the terror she experienced, Mary also had a number of assets that may have significantly helped her. She was fortunate to have been very bright with a long history of relatively healthy functioning. Her life seemed focused toward realistic goals, and her MPD did not appear to have significantly distracted her from her personal or professional roles. Another advantage was that Mary did not become trapped in the mental health system where she might have suffered the same fate as so many other similar patients who spent years being inappropriately diagnosed, medicated, and hospitalized: in short, continually subjected to useless, if not overtly harmful, procedures. Her favorable outcome might have partly been the result of her father's death while she was still a young child, freeing her from a life of continued abuse. Additionally, she was fortunate to have a husband who was emotionally stable, healthy, and supportive.

Mary's case is atypical. Most survivors of ritual abuse require many years of psychotherapy. Unfortunately, many of them are never correctly diagnosed, and they go from one therapist to another, trying every possible remedy without any appreciable relief. For these individuals, the process of undergoing a repeated series of misdirected and fruitless efforts at therapy can be a form of revictimization that further damages the prospects of realistic hope and effective recovery.

Possession, Ritual Abuse, and Dissociation

Two recent polls showed that most people in the United States believe that the devil is real.[1] We are among the remainder who do not. However, as researchers, we try to keep our personal beliefs separate from those of our clients and independent from our professional work generally. The same principle applies to psychotherapy. It is not the role of psychologists to convince clients to accept their personal worldview. Instead, psychologists are expected to help clients achieve improved functioning and a greater sense of satisfaction with their lives. On the other hand, there are legitimate mental health professionals who incorporate their religious and spiritual views into their treatment approach. This is not unethical as long as these therapists do not impose their own personal values and beliefs on clients without their consent. Some clients specifically seek psychotherapy with a particular religious or spiritual orientation.

Concerns have been expressed over the recent idealized portrayals of satanism and other occult practices that have surfaced in popular culture. These themes can be seen in movies, books, and music. Some have addressed the possible adverse effects of these influences on vulnerable and impressionable young people.[2] Psychiatrist and Professor Gunther Klosinski (2004) explained this problem in an article on adolescent satanism in the periodical Scientific American Mind. Dr. Klosinski, who is the medical director of the child and adolescent psychiatry and psychotherapy department at the University of Tübingen, Germany, notes: “Adolescents are naturally drawn to occult ideas, but parents and therapists should know the signs that indicate when this fascination has become deeper and more dangerous" (p. 84). Adolescent experimentation does not necessarily lead to participation in ritual crimes, although in some cases young people may engage in such practices as a reenactment of their own previous victimization.

In December 2001 we met Ulla Fröhling, the author of Vater Unser in der Hölle: Ein Tatsachenbericht (Our Father Who Art in Hell: A Factual Report) (1996). Fröhling is a sociologist and freelance journalist who authored the story of Angela Lenz (pseudonym), a satanic cult survivor in Germany. Mrs. Lenz's abuse experiences parallel the stories of U.S., Canadian, and British survivors with their themes of bizarre rituals, terror, dissociation of identity, and forced prostitution.

In our previous editions of Cult and Ritual Abuse, we discussed the historical and anthropological evidence of ritual abuse internationally, and we wanted to further explore the worldwide contemporary accounts of ritual abuse. This prompted us to publish Ritual Abuse in the Twenty-first Century (Noblitt & Noblitt, 2008) with 20 chapters by authors from the United States, Canada, England, Scotland, Germany, Greece, Israel, and South Africa. Chapters were written by mental health practitioners, physicians, law enforcement professionals, ritual abuse survivors, and university faculty. After the publication of Ritual Abuse in the Twenty-first Century, we were invited to speak at the Fifteenth Annual Northern California Child Sexual Abuse Awareness Conference in April 2009. It was there that we met Anne Johnson Davis, the author of Hell Minus One (2008). Anne's book told her story of childhood ritual abuse. The book included a foreword by Lieutenant Detective Matt Jacobson, an investigator for the Utah Attorney General's Office. Jacobson's foreword confirmed Anne's allegations indicating that he personally met and questioned the accused perpetrators who confessed in his presence. Earlier Anne had received written statements from these individuals also admitting to their abuses.

Other survivors have published their stories. In an article that appeared in Ms. magazine, a woman using the pseudonym Elizabeth S. Rose described her ordeals in a multigenerational satanic cult in which the "leader did not believe in the existence of Satan and told me that I needn't either" (Rose, 1993, pp. 44–45). According to the author: "Belief in Satan is cultivated in order to instill fear and the use of rituals as an emotional straitjacket designed to keep cult members under control" (Rose, 1993, p. 45).

Another survivor, using the pseudonym Margaret Smith (1993), wrote the book Ritual Abuse: What It Is, Why It Happens, How to Help. She was a researcher and the founder of an organization and newsletter Reaching Out, which provided information, emotional support, and advocacy for other survivors. Smith described in some detail her own experiences of ritual abuse as well as reports she obtained from other survivors. In addition to having read her book, I spoke with her by telephone and met her in person. Her descriptions of ritual abuse were remarkably similar to the accounts I heard from my own clients. Barbara Jackson (1993), a ritual abuse survivor and Harvard-educated biochemist, spoke eloquently regarding her experience of ritual abuse at the National Conference on Crimes against Children in September 1993 in Washington, D.C. She addressed the potential for survivors living meaningful and productive lives and the urgent need for our society to recognize and address this problem.

Other survivor stories have been published as books (Adams, 1999; LaBriere, 1997, 2009; Shurter, 2012), as chapters in edited books (Fotheringham, 2008), and as articles in periodicals. Survivors have also served in leadership roles as advocates (Adams, 2008) and researchers (Riseman, 2008; Smith, 1993). There is a movement of survivors that is growing and supported by organizations such as Survivorship and Stop Mind Control and Ritual Abuse Today in the United States and Adults Surviving Child Abuse (ASCA) in Australia.

Some health care providers are by their own reports ritual abuse survivors. For example, Dr. Cathy Kezelman, a physician in Australia, described her own past ritual abuse experience and recovery in her book Innocence Revisited: A Tale in Parts (Kezelman, 2010). In the ritual abuse survivor autobiography Silent No More: The Lamb Speaks, the author, Dr. Margaret Lamb Johnson Hayes, wrote, “If I, as a board-certified psychiatrist and a former officer of the U.S. Air Force and the Foreign Service, am not credible, who is?” (2013, p. 214). The results of the Extreme Abuse Survey for Helping Professionals (P-EAS) showed that among the 248 professionals who responded, 18% indicated that they were ritual abuse/mind control survivors (Becker, Karriker, Rutz, & Overkamp, 2013).

The first published description of the psychiatric treatment of a ritual abuse survivor appeared in the book Michelle Remembers, co-authored by patient Michelle Smith and her psychiatrist, Lawrence Pazder (1980). The book represented a Roman Catholic perspective and included a comment by the bishop of the diocese of Victoria, British Columbia, who cautiously refrained from validating Michelle's story, per se, but recommended that people be open to what she had to say, stating that this was a subject worthy of further study and investigation.

The books Breaking the Circle of Satanic Ritual Abuse (1992) and Cover-Up of the Century (1994), by Daniel Ryder, were written by an individual who is reportedly both a survivor and therapist (certified chemical dependency counselor and licensed social worker). Among other things, he advocates a 12-step approach for the treatment of ritual abuse,[3] including those elements of spirituality formulated by the original Alcoholics Anonymous groups and expressed in the Big Book. Having also come to know Ryder personally, we found him to be an articulate, well-informed, and sincere person.

Other Christian therapists have addressed the issue of ritual abuse from both clinical and spiritual perspectives. Holly Hector authored Satanic Ritual Abuse and Multiple Personality Disorder (1991). In her book, Hector outlines the relationship between dissociative identity disorder (DID) and what she believes to be a major cause of DID, satanic ritual abuse (SRA). Hector's message is positive and emphasizes the reality of psychological and spiritual recovery, noting that many individuals who have been abused in such cults erroneously feel unsalvageable. She encourages her readers not to be discouraged and argues that alternate identities who view themselves as loyal to their respective cults are not demons.[4]

Another Christian therapist who has published on the subject of ritual abuse is psychologist and pastor James Friesen.[5] Some of his views appeared in "Treatment for Dissociative Identity Disorder: Integrating Alter Personalities and Casting out Evil Spirits" (1989). In his book Uncovering the Mystery of MPD (1991), Friesen provided greater detail in describing SRA as a cause of DID and cites examples of patients' stories of abuse along with his observations of his clients in therapy. In a later book, More Than Survivors (1992), Friesen discussed case studies of seven clients with this disorder who came from a variety of geographical locations across the United States. More recently, he proposed what he calls The Life Model for clients with DID that addresses the client's environment, psychological and spiritual factors, and programming (Friesen, 2000). Friesen's ideas have generated some controversy because of his strong Christian approach to the problem (that some may view as a kind of bias) and more specifically his concept of demonic possession,[6] something that he thinks may occur in some cases of DID. Friesen believes that individuals with DID may experience both alternate identities as well as possession by demonic spirits and that both kinds of entities are distinguishable.[7] Some other Christian therapists agree. The author and physician M. Scott Peck (1983) wrote about patients in his own clinical practice who showed signs of what he believed to be possession by demonic entities.

The idea that people can be possessed by demons has been discussed by a number of authors in recent times. Representing the point of view of the Roman Catholic Church was Malachi Martin (1921–1999), a former Jesuit professor who taught at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome. Martin's book Hostage to the Devil (1976) described the author's research into the reported modern phenomena of demonic possession and exorcism[8] in the Roman Catholic Church, citing specific case examples. Father Jeffrey Steffon (1992) also wrote about this subject in a book that bears the doctrinal approval of the Catholic Church, the nihil obstat and imprimatur. In his book, Father Steffon articulated the official position of the Catholic Church regarding the reality of Satan, evil spirits, and demonic possession. How might a person come to be possessed? Father Steffon answered this question with the following reference to Father Richard McAlear and Betty Brennan whom he cited as experts on the topic of demonic possession: First, a demonic spirit can attach itself to someone through a wound or trauma. Fr. McAlear calls this a ministering spirit. Secondly, a spirit can attach itself to a person through a repeated sinful action or sinful tendencies. This is a cardinal spirit. One way to remember some cardinal spirits is to remember the capital sins—that is, lust, pride, gluttony, sloth, envy, covetousness, and anger. These sins are against the cardinal virtues of prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude. These virtues are the hinges of other virtues. Just as other virtues are in some way tied to the four cardinal virtues, so some spirits are tied to, or hinge upon, the cardinal spirits. A third way is through a person's generational heritage. People inherit their make-up from their parents—their physical attributes, mental abilities, psychological makeup, and spiritual characteristics. If parents have been involved in the occult, generational openness for the oppression will be passed along to their children. Exodus 20:5–6 states that a father's wickedness is passed on to his children for four generations, but blessings for a thousand generations upon the faithful. Finally, a demonic spirit can attach itself to a person through involvement in the occult. (Steffon, 1992, p. 169) Father Steffon’s book related cases of ritual abuse and crime associated with reported cult practices. More recently, the Reverend Thomas J. Euteneuer (2010) identified “seven degrees of demonic persecution” (p. 37), and of these seven, he found that the most difficult to recover from is SRA. According to Father Euteneuer (2010): Children born into witchcraft covens or Satanic cult families are initiated into their respective groups through Satanic rituals and consecrations. They are the most difficult to heal. The physical and emotional trauma of the rituals, inflicted from the earliest childhood, even from the womb, is so extreme that it fractures the personality and deliberately hands the child over to complete possession and ownership by the demons of the cult. Such seriously wounded individuals undoubtedly need the compassionate pastoral care of the Church, but they cannot be healed by exorcism alone. In fact, they need several elements working together for a full healing to take place. First, they need to make a total separation from all occult activity and persons actively involved in their abuse. Second, they need a skilled therapist who is knowledgeable in treating Dissociative Identity Disorder (formerly known as Multiple Personality Disorder). Third, they need a skilled exorcist and support team willing to hold regular prayer sessions in order to apply the full range of the Church’s spiritual resources to their case. Finally, they need a support team to reinitiate them into a healthy community of strong, loving relationships and true Christian fraternity. They have a long healing journey ahead of them and need as much support and affirmation as possible. As with all demonic afflictions, healing is only possible with God’s grace and is based upon the active cooperation of the individual. Full healing can take years of hard work by all involved, but it is truly possible. (p. 39) Other authors with different Christian backgrounds have also articulated their belief that demonic possession can and does occur (Koch & Lechler, 1970; Lasalandra & Merenda, 1990; Montgomery, 1976; Olson, 1992; Unger, 1971).[9] The late Tom Hawkins was an associate pastor of the Community Bible Church in Altoona, Pennsylvania, and later the founder and director of Restoration in Christ Ministries. He not only believed in the existence of demonic possession[10] but also provided pastoral counseling to individuals with DID. His wife, Diane, publicly revealed her own history of ritual abuse and has openly acknowledged her experience of dissociation of identity (2009). She continues the work of their ministry.

John Nevius's (1894/1964) Demon Possession is a book of historic interest. From 1854 to 1893, Nevius was a Christian missionary in China where he observed what he believed to be demon possession among some Chinese people. He also described cases of demon possession from India, Japan, Ceylon (now Sri Lanka), and Western cultures. He portrayed the victims of demon possession in terms that are similar to modern descriptions of dissociative disorders. In fact, Nevius admitted that there were a variety of different interpretations that might be made of his observations. However, he seemed unaware that trauma might be a causal factor and did not discuss this possibility.

Some Christians may directly or indirectly believe in forms of possession other than demonic possession. According to Robert Baker (1992), "Many Christians regard glossolalia[11] (i.e., speaking in tongues) as a sign of possession by the Holy Spirit" (p. 206). However, there are a variety of different possession-like religious experiences that are said to occur in a Christian context that have been documented by Garrett (1987) in his book Spirit Possession and Popular Religion.[12] The concept of possession, demonic or otherwise, is not unique to Christianity. Many religions and cultures throughout history have incorporated or propounded this belief.[13]

In addition to the notion of possession by an evil entity or the spirit of a deity is the concept of possession by the soul of another person (living or dead) or an animal's spirit. Perhaps the most exhaustive and scholarly work to date on the general subject of possession is T. K. Oesterreich's Possession (1966), first published in 1921 when Oesterreich was the head of the philosophy department at the University of Tübingen. Oesterreich's book was praised for "containing one of the finest collections of case histories of multiple personality and the phenomena of so-called possession this work has, so far as I know, never been superseded" (Gregory, 1966, p. vii). In his work Oesterreich thoroughly traced the various accounts of possession around the world from antiquity through his contemporary time.

Among the numerous contributions made by Oesterreich's book is his differentiation between voluntary and involuntary possession and the distinction between lucid and somnambulistic possession. In lucid possession, the individual is conscious for the experience and can remember it later. Somnambulistic possession occurs when the person is unable to recall his or her behavior or other events while in the possession state. Individuals with DID describe dissociative episodes that can be distinguished along the same lines that Oesterreich outlined for possession states. Some use the term co-consciousness to designate the experience of “being present” during the episode and the ability to remember it later. Without co-consciousness, DID clients are simply amnestic when other alternate identities take executive control and many of them describe the experience of “losing time.”

One of the remarkable things about the reports of DID and possession phenomena is their similarity to one another. We have argued this point since the first edition of Cult and Ritual Abuse (Noblitt & Perskin, 1995). The DSM-5 now acknowledges this relationship in its new definition of DID that includes: “Disruption of identity by two or more distinct personality states, which may be described in some cultures as an experience of possession” (American Psychiatric Association, 2013, p. 292). A list of the features shared by DID and possession is as follows:

1. Both possession[14] and DID[15] are more frequently identified among females than males.
2. Both possession[16] and DID[17] reportedly may occur sometime after traumatic experiences, rituals, or ordeals.
3. Both possession[18] and DID[19] have been associated with cults, primitive or preindustrial on the firsthand, or modern Western on the secondhand.
4. A sense of secrecy is often a factor in possession[20] and DID.[21]
5. In both possession[22] and DID,[23] the individual may have experiences for which he or she is later amnestic.
6. In both possession and DID, the experience of trance states are common.[24]
7. In both possession and DID,[25] the individual may, at times, experience co-consciousness or a shared awareness with the alternate or possessing entity.
8. One characteristic of both possession[26] and DID[27] is that the afflicted or affected individual frequently acts out behaviors that are uncharacteristic of him or herself.

9. In both possession[28] and DID,[29] there may be strong factors of social control present that some hypothesize to be related to the creation and expression of the inner identities.
10. In both possession[30] and DID,[31] the usually present identity is often called the host.
11. In the DSM-IV-TR (American Psychiatric Association, 2000), both possession and DID were listed as dissociative disorders.[32]
12. In both possession[33] and DID,[34] the inner entities that take control of the body may be characterized as animals, spirits, demons, and deities.
13. In both possession[35] and DID,[36] there are accounts of individuals engaging in behaviors that defy "the recognized physical limits that define normal embodied existence, particularly with respect to the perception of pain" (Mulhern, 1991a, p. 773).
14. Reports have appeared that a disproportionate number of individuals affected by possession[37] and DID[38] believe they have psychic or paranormal abilities.
15. Mulhern (1991a) also argued that both individuals experiencing possession and DID shared a lengthy list of concurrent problems that included psychosomatic and other health complaints, family and marital problems, and explicitly psychological symptoms.

Sherrill Mulhern observed that the poverty seen in individuals with possession was not present in DID patients; however, economic privation is actually prevalent among both.[39] Perhaps this dilemma is not widely known to the public or to those therapists whose clinical practices consist of fully funded clients. Therapists who are unwilling to do pro bono work or to accept Medicare or Medicaid[40] health insurance are unlikely to see many DID patients because so many of them are impoverished due to inability to sustain employment (Noblitt & Noblitt, 2009; Rutz, Becker, Overkamp & Karriker, 2008).

What then is the relationship between possession and DID? We attempt to answer this question by first clarifying what we mean by dissociation. We previously wrote about dissociation as a process with four functional categories (Noblitt & Noblitt, 2012b), but we recently added a fifth one, volition. Thus, we now break dissociation into five functional categories:

(1) dissociation of consciousness, (2) dissociation of memory, (3) dissociation of identity, (4) dissociation of perception, and (5) dissociation of volition. Dissociation of consciousness occurs in instances of trance states. Such states may vary in intensity from light trance to profound states such as stupor. Dissociation of memory is evident when people have more extensive memory loss than would be expected, for example, psychogenic amnesia that is not better explained by physical injury or neurochemical effects (e.g., drugs). Dissociation of identity where individuals suddenly experience themselves as another person or entity is the cardinal feature of both possession and DID. Dissociation of perception may be a way of understanding the auditory, visual, and tactile hallucinations that may be experienced by people who appear to be either spiritually possessed or who meet the criteria for DID. Dissociation of perception may also include a disrupted sense of reality regarding one's self, including one's body or the physical environment. Many of these individuals have problems with the performance of voluntary behavior. This last category also includes automatisms, other automatic behaviors, and dissociative cataplexy (the inability to voluntarily move or exert muscle tone). As mentioned earlier, trance states, amnesia, hearing voices, and automatic behaviors are frequently seen in possession and DID.

Trance states are also associated with hypnosis. As previously stated, possession may be voluntary or involuntary. Our theory is that involuntary possession consists of intrusive hypnotic states where individuals have learned to take on the role of another entity, a person, a god, or a demon during repeated ritualistic scenarios. On the other hand, it should be noted that in some cultural contexts possession may be welcomed by the possessed person and may be considered a way of encountering that which is sacred. Such voluntary possession may occur without ritual abuse, but it does require that the possessed person be able to enter trance states, and the possessed person must have been taught the possessing spirit's characteristic behaviors so that these behaviors could be enacted during possession. However, in other cases, possession is involuntary; it occurs intrusively without the possessed person's intent or consent. This is accomplished in traumatic rituals where the survivor is taught to respond with deep trance and enact the characteristics of the possessing spirit. Thus, involuntary possession is often considered to be a malevolent experience.

This is also true of DID, although one can substitute the word pathological for malevolent when the experience is viewed as unhealthy or maladaptive.

Our theory is that involuntary possession and DID are caused by ritual abuse.[41] Ritual abuse consists of circumscribed traumatizing procedures that cause involuntary deep trance states, and dissociation of consciousness, identity, memory, perception, and volition. In ritual abuse, the survivor is taught to enact the role of a different person, spirit, or animal during the abusive rituals. Once the survivor has been trained to experience and enact the ritualized dissociation of identity, additional alters can be created in other ritual venues. Eventually, survivors may be able to create new alters without such specific ritual training.

Thus, our theory is fundamentally different from other theories that postulate that dissociation of identity is caused by the cumulative effects of severe traumas. We hypothesize that dissociation of identity is the result of traumatic training. Such training produces psychological shock in its victims. This training may occur in demonic rituals, circumscribed and repeated incestuous abuse where training and grooming are a central component to the abuses, ritualized prostitution and sexual slavery, and other kinds of torture where instruction in dissociative experience and behavior is part of the abuse. Survivors are taught to suffer severe pain and terror followed by emotional and somatosensory numbness and dissociation of consciousness (trance). During these trance states, the individual may be further taught that he or she is a different person for ritual purposes or for other assigned "jobs." The newly created alters may be given names or other identifiers such as numbers or codes. The survivor is also trained to respond to particular cues that become triggers and have the capacity to elicit specific dissociative responses without the survivor's awareness. Thus, the alters and their characteristic behaviors can be summoned by particular triggers for which the survivors have no conscious awareness, similar to the effects of posthypnotic suggestion. However, unlike normal posthypnotic suggestion where the effects may rapidly decay with the passage of time (Calandrino, Kurtz, & Strube, 2001), this traumatic training in trance is more likely have persisting effects.

Survivors sometimes described traumatic rituals that were designed to restore some semblance of psychological organization after they had been dissociated through the infliction of disorganizing traumas. During these organizing phases of abuse, the cult-created alternate identities may be given further definition and instruction. As a result, one of the kinds of control that such destructive cults have over an individual is the threat of madness (i.e., extreme mental disorganization) if an attempt is made to leave the abusive group. The cult leader may attempt to prove that he or she alone has the power to effect a “cure” over the raging emotionality present in the cult follower.[42] The net effect is the training of a person with dissociation of identity, memory, consciousness, perception, and volition with dependency on the abusers.[43] Thus, we have come to define ritual abuse as deliberately inflicted trauma that occurs in a ceremonial or circumscribed manner for the purpose of creating or manipulating already created alter mental states.

On one occasion when one of my patients felt a strong desire to harm herself, she was hospitalized. Shortly after her hospitalization, she gave me her journal to read. The first page was neatly printed with the following: I am being tormented.

I am crying out all of the time.
I miss my Daddy.
I miss my Queen mother.
I hate myself.
I am confused.
I hear demons.
I see the demons.
I am breaking.
We are all breaking.
The demons are watching us all the time.
There is not time for anything, not time for love or friends or relationships.
There is not even time to breathe.
The demons are demanding us to return to their orchards.
There is protection in their orchards.
They are carefully orchestrating our sentencing if we do not return.

Later in her journal, there was a page written in a childlike scrawl: We are the children and we are afraid. Can anybody help us. [sic]

Are we going to die?
We think that they are going to jump through the glass and kill us all.
They say the numbers [deleted] all the time.

We don’t know what they mean.

Following this, I found a page that was neatly written in script: This is ideal [sic] there is so much glass here to break.

Just remember these people really don’t care at all about you.
If anyone tries to interfere with our plan I will make sure that they are taken care of and remember the first opportunity you get to leave this place do it.
Please try to understand that I must impose a strict penalty upon you for bringing us here.
I should have stopped it but I’ve been busy with other things.
Is your head starting to hurt? The disorientation will become more predominant.
You will sleep but feel unrested.
You will wash but feel unclean.
And remember they will probably poison your food and drink.
They all want to bring us down but we won’t let them.
And if they try to [deleted] with us there is only one answer.
We must die.
You know that we would like to go on living in the manner that we used to, but we can’t.
Then death is the only way out.
Don’t worry it will all be peaceful.

Later in her journal, I found this entry:

Just woke up I guess for the second time.
I’m not sure where I am but I am in a hospital room, because there are hospital beds, but I am dressed.
Looked out the door and I saw all different kinds of people.
There is no phone in here.
I can’t call anyone. Oh God I’m scared.
I think I’ve been drugged.
I told one of the nurses I was “Sheila” and she said OK yea right—Get out of here. But it sounded like she was joking or something.
So I came back here maybe somebody will come in soon and tell me what’s going on . . . Sheila[44]

The ritually abused person often feels a need to continue at least some of the components of ritual practice in order to stave off mental disintegration. If the survivor doesn't participate in actual rituals, then the cult-abused individual may resort to bloodletting or other self-inflicted injury in an effort to prevent internal disintegration.[45] This explanation by my patients appears to be consistent with the anthropological literature describing possession cults that conduct rituals, sometimes traumatic, sometimes not traumatic, for the purpose of effecting a cure or improvement in the individual's functioning.[46]

For survivors trying to escape the influence of such destructive cults, this prospect may be discouraging. However, as many survivors have demonstrated through their progress in therapy, it is possible to leave these cults and find other more appropriate ways to engage in self-healing and establish a sense of self-directed inner control. This is a point emphasized by survivors Margaret Smith (1993), Chrystine Oksana (1994, 2001), Alexandra Rogers (1994), and others. Survivors can learn to resist tendencies toward self-destructiveness and self-sabotage. But to do so effectively, it is usually helpful to understand the underlying dissociative processes, how they came to be dissociated (most "host personalities" are initially amnestic for this information), and how to develop habits of effective internal dialogue with dissociated alternate identities. When the internal communication improves, the various dissociated inner identities can work in concert rather than in unproductive conflict.

In my experience, survivors of ritual abuse benefit from a healthy and respectful therapeutic relationship, a nurturing social support system, the opportunity to explore their experiences of abuse in therapy, including the details of any abusive training, and the opportunity to desensitize the various triggers and disturbing recollections. Many benefit from learning more effective coping strategies and relational skills. Survivors who can develop these personal assets and desensitize the effects of triggers appear to make the most complete and enduring recovery. They report feeling less vulnerable, more fully integrated, highly functioning, and stable over time (Noblitt & Perskin, 2000; Noblitt & Noblitt, 2008; Rutz, Becker, Overkamp, & Karriker, 2008).

Perhaps most helpful of all is the process of learning that many of the perpetrators' messages are simply not true: "You will always be alone." "No one will ever love you (if they know what is inside you)," and so on.

Survivors who begin to learn to experience reciprocal trust and a capacity to relate to others effectively often report a genuine inner transformation along with improved functioning, self-esteem, autonomy, and satisfaction with their lives.

CHAPTER 6

Empirical and Forensic Evidence of Ritual Abuse[1]

In this chapter, we review the empirical literature on ritual abuse (RA), including research involving interviews of multiple individuals, the results of psychological testing, and surveys of RA survivors and helping professionals. The studies of children have typically relied on information obtained from their caretakers. In addition to the topic of ritual abuse, we also review the related research on organized abuse and mind control when it is clear that ritual abuse was a component theme of those studies. We begin with a brief discussion of previous literature reviews.

One of the earliest reviews was published in Valerie Sinason's book Treating Survivors of Satanist Abuse (1994). In her chapter "A Personal Review of the Literature," Sue Burrell summarized the accounts of books, single case descriptions, and multiple case studies as well as the literature related to interviewing and advocacy for RA survivors. Burrell noted that the material was difficult and disturbing and further complicated by the topic's controversy. Published the same year, Kathleen Faller's article "Ritual Abuse: A Review of the Research" (1994) provided a detailed critical analysis of the empirical studies, noting that there is corroborating evidence for some RA allegations.[2] A section on ritual abuse in the tome, Memory, Trauma, Treatment and the Law by Daniel Brown, Alan Scheflin, and Cory Hammond (1998) discussed selective but representative studies also concluded that some of the evidence supports RA claims. In our previous edition of Cult and Ritual Abuse (Noblitt & Perskin, 2000), we reviewed the related empirical literature and forensic outcomes. Reviews of organized abuse that include the topic of ritual abuse were published by Gough, Kelly, and Scott (1993) and more recently in Michael Salter's scholarly paper, "Organised Abuse: A Neglected Category of Sexual Abuse with Significant Lifetime Mental Healthcare Sequelae" (Salter, 2012; Sidebotham & Appleton, 2012). These reviews made it clear that there is empirical evidence for some RA allegations. In this chapter, we provide an updated and expanded review of the empirical research.

The empirical studies of ritual abuse can be organized into four categories: (1) the frequency and credibility of ritual abuse disclosures to helping professionals; (2) suggestibility, rumor, and iatrogenesis as possible explanations for ritual abuse allegations; (3) children who have made RA allegations; and (4) adults who have made RA allegations. In addition to this overview of the empirical literature, we will discuss representative forensic cases.

In their national investigation of 270 cases of substantiated sexual abuse of 1,639 children in day care, Finkelhor, Williams, and Burns (1988) found 13% of the cases involved allegations of ritual abuse. Another of the early studies of the incidence of ritual abuse was Deborah Cole's doctoral dissertation, The Incidence of Ritual Abuse: A Preliminary Survey (1992). She sent surveys to 1,250 mental health professionals in California in Los Angeles and Orange counties, receiving back 250 responses. Of those, 46% indicated that they had seen RA patients or patients who met at least one of the criteria that Cole listed. Given her low rate of response, it is difficult to generalize about the incidence of RA from her sample to other populations, but her contribution is primarily in asking the question and setting in motion efforts to empirically study it.

In a national survey of 2,709 clinical psychologists who were members of the American Psychological Association, the authors investigated the frequency of RA allegations made to psychologists. This study showed that within their sample of psychologists, 70% denied and 30% acknowledged seeing at least one case of "ritualistic or religion-related abuse since January 1, 1980" (Bottoms, Shaver, & Goodman, 1991, p. 6). The authors also found that among the psychologists who had worked with at least one individual with allegations of ritual abuse, 93% believed that the harm had actually occurred. This report was part of a series of five studies later published by Goodman, Qin, Bottoms, and Shaver (1994). The first study involved a survey of a stratified random sample of clinical members of the American Psychological Association, American Psychiatric Association, and National Association of Social Workers. The second study was a survey of district attorneys' offices, social service agencies, and law enforcement agencies. The third study investigated the question of "repressed" and later "recovered" memory based on 490 cases, from which 43 were described as "repressed memory" cases and 447 were "no repressed memory" cases. The fourth study examined children's knowledge of satanic abuse. The fifth study investigated three types of religion-related child abuse: abusive acts intended to rid the child of demons, clergy abuse, and medical neglect for religious reasons.

From the data collected in their first study, these researchers concluded that 31% of the combined sample of psychologists, psychiatrists, and social workers had seen at least one case of ritual or religion-related abuse. There were 387 child RA cases, 674 adult RA survivor cases, 171 child religion-related cases, and 234 adult survivors of religion-related cases reported. The authors stated that the adult ritual abuse cases "were consistently the most extreme" (Goodman et al., 1994, p. 4). Of the adult ritual abuse cases, 33% reported cannibalism and 28% baby breeding for purposes of ritual sacrifice. Among the adult ritual abuse cases, they found that the victims were likely to be diagnosed with dissociative identity disorder (DID). They also found that child cases were "far more likely to be disclosed to authorities or professionals, to family members or neighbors, and to be linked to corroborative evidence, but were less likely to be disclosed in therapy than adult cases" (p. 4). The authors determined that the psychologists, psychiatrists, and social workers who responded to their survey "overwhelmingly believed both the allegations of abuse and the allegations of ritual or religious elements of the abuse" (p. 6).

Their second study of district attorneys, social services, and law enforcement agencies revealed that 23% had identified at least one case of ritual or religion-related abuse. "In general, the ritual cases with the most convincing evidence were unlike the Satanic ritual abuse stereotype" (p. 6). The authors expressed surprise that the rate of convictions in "ritual cases was almost as high as in religion-related cases" (p. 7). In their third study investigating the question of "repressed" and later "recovered" memory, they found that the "repressed memory" cases were more likely to be "ritual cases" in comparison with the "no repressed memory cases." However, when they excluded what they called "outlier" cases, the repressed versus not repressed memory effects disappeared.

The fourth study of children’s knowledge of ritual abuse showed that “children have relatively little knowledge of Satanic child abuse” (p. 10). Their fifth study considered 271 cases of religion-related abuse. They found that in 94% of the clergy abuse, 48% of the evil ridding cases, and 23% of medical neglect included allegations of sexual abuse. They found that DID and other dissociative disorders were diagnosed in over 20% of the evil ridding and medical neglect cases.[3]

Bucky and Dalenberg (1992) also surveyed 433 mental health professionals in San Diego County, California, using a 50-item questionnaire. They found that mental health professionals who reported high-frequency work with RA survivors were “professionals with many years’ experience and an apparent specialization (an inference based on cases seen) in sexual abuse” (p. 237). They also found that professionals with greater training in dissociative disorders and RA were more likely to see clients that they identified with those problems.

Another survey investigated reports of sexual and ritual abuse made to British psychologists (Andrews, Morton, Bekerian, Brewin, Davies, & Mollon, 1995). The researchers collected data from 810 British Psychological Society practitioners who had seen sexually abused clients. Regarding these psychologists’ “belief in essential accuracy of reports of SRA,” 3% reported never, 54% sometimes, 38% usually, and 5% always. Fifteen percent reported that they had worked with clients reporting satanic ritual abuse (SRA). Eighty percent of the psychologists who had seen one or more individuals with a stated history of SRA believed the allegations. In a more recent British study Ost, Wright, Easton, Hope, and French (2013) collected responses to an online survey of 183 chartered clinical psychologists and 119 hypnotherapists. Among the chartered clinical psychologists, 37.9% indicated that they had seen one or more cases of individuals with satanic or ritualistic abuse. The researchers found that 24.5% of the hypnotherapists had seen one or more satanic/ritual abuse cases. Along the lines of the Andrews et al. (1995) study they asked, “Are reports of Satanic/ritualistic abuse essentially accurate?” Among the chartered clinical psychologists, 1.6% responded never, 11.5% rarely, 27.3% sometimes, 29.5% usually, and 2.7% always. The hypnotherapists answered 10.1% never, 15.1% rarely, 21.0% sometimes, 12.6% usually, and 5.0% always.

Schmuttermaier and Veno (1999) obtained survey responses from a group of counselors consisting of 74 Center Against Sexual Assault (CASA) workers, 48 psychologists, and 27 psychiatrists in the state of Victoria, Australia. They found that 70% of their respondents accepted their definition of ritual abuse and that 153 cases of ritual abuse had been identified by 26 of the counselors between 1985 and 1995. Eighty-five percent endorsed the belief that ritual abuse is "an indication of genuine trauma" (Schmuttermaier & Veno, 1999, p. 55). The researchers found no relationship between the religious beliefs of the counselors and the number of RA cases they identified. They determined that the amount of professional training on the topic of child sexual assault was significantly related to counselors' identification of RA cases. Schmuttermaier and Veno (1999) also concluded that "Australian counselors are similar to their United States and United Kingdom counterparts in their identification and diagnosis of ritual abuse" (p. 61).

According to Jonker and Jonker-Bakker (1997), "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in Britain reported in its 1989 Annual Report that seven out of 66 Child Protection Teams in England and Wales were currently working with children victimized by ritualistic abuse" (p. 542). In a survey of the membership of the International Society for the Study of Multiple Personality and Dissociation, Perry (1992) concluded that 88% of 1185 "respondents reported belief in ritual abuse, involving mind control and programming" (p. 4).

An international study of helping professionals was conducted by Becker, Karriker, Overkamp, and Rutz (2008) and Becker, Karriker, Rutz, and Overkamp (2013) and is part of their Extreme Abuse Survey (EAS) research series (http://extreme-abuse-survey.net/http://extreme-abuse-survey.net/). The Professional Extreme Abuse Survey (P-EAS) is an online questionnaire with 215 questions (and 53 optional ones) that was available from April 1 to June 30, 2007. Four hundred fifty-one (451) helping professionals from 20 different countries responded to at least one of the questions. This survey shows that 86% of helping professionals who have worked with at least one extreme abuse survivor report having in their caseload at least one survivor of SRA. Some of their other findings are as follows: 61% saw clients who reported ritual abuse by clergy, 85% said the majority of adult ritual abuse/mind control (RA/MC) survivors with whom they worked were diagnosed with DID, 63% said that they always take a neutral stance regarding the truth of an adult survivor's memories of RA/MC, 65% said that some of their clients' reports of RA/MC were based on continuous, rather than dissociated, memories. Regarding belief in their clients' stories, 3% of the helpers do not believe any of their clients who report RA/MC experienced ritual abuse, the rest reported belief in varying degrees concordant with the previous findings of Andrews et al. (1995) and Ost et al. (2013). There was a similar pattern where 5% did not believe any of their clients who report RA/MC experienced MC and the rest of the respondents indicated belief in varying degrees. However, because the EAS is the first survey to have explored reports of mind control, there is no comparable research to with which to compare it. Further, these findings indicated that 52% endorsed the belief that improbable events involving RA/MC might possibly have been "staged" to make victims believe they happened.

The previous study reported by Bottoms et al. (1991), and Goodman et al. (1994) criticized the psychotherapists who overwhelmingly believed the narratives of their RA client arguing that this belief was not based on any corroborated evidence. However, it is not clear that these authors asked questions or accepted answers unless they were consistent with the conservative standard of evidence used in criminal convictions that is "beyond a reasonable doubt." Most clinicians consider clinical evidence from a perspective that is closer to "the preponderance of evidence" legal standard.

The P-EAS went into more detail examining the helping professionals' reasons for believing their clients. These reasons included the following: significant memories of RA/MC fit logically into other aspects of the individual's life history forming a coherent narrative (89%), the types of dissociated identities observed were reflective of RA/MC (86%), the content of creative productions (such as art, sandtray stories, music, poetry) was consistent with RA/MC (79%), certain physical and medical sequelae could be explained as having been a result of RA/MC (75%), some reports of RA/MC were based on continuous memories rather than dissociated memories (65%), significant memories were corroborated by the testimony of other individuals (47%), and the individuals presented material objects consistent with reports of RA/MC (31%). Further, 18% of the helping professionals reported that they were RA/MC survivors themselves and all of them endorsed the statement, "The individual's memories were consistent with my own personal memories of RA/MC" (Becker et al., 2013).

These studies show that the overwhelming majority of surveyed professionals either believe RA narratives or they are open to the potential credibility of ritual abuse allegations. What would account for such a high degree of consensus? If RA claims are essentially false, then these therapists are at best misguided. Some have argued that false RA "memories" are implanted or created by inept or unethical therapists. If the patients' allegations are essentially true, then this high degree of concurrence may simply reflect the professionals' accurate assessment of their clients as abuse survivors.

As Becker et al. (2008, 2013) and Rutz et al. (2008) have noted, clients who make RA allegations appear to be genuinely traumatized in a manner that is consistent with their narratives, their specific psychological problems, and, we would add, their psychological testing results. In a study comparing 34 adult psychiatric patients making RA allegations with 31 patients making no such allegations, it was found that the group making RA allegations had significantly higher posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) scores on the MMPI-2 (Noblitt, 1995). In their study of preschool ritualistic and non-ritualistic sexual abuse, Waterman, Kelly, Olivieri, and McCord (1993) demonstrated that PTSD criteria were met for 80% of their sample of ritualistically sexually abused children as compared with 35.7% of the non-ritualistically sexually abused children. Other studies finding PTSD to be a significant component of the clinical picture of individuals reporting ritual abuse will be discussed further in this empirical literature review.

The notion that RA allegations are essentially false and the result of suggestibility and social influence has been proposed by a number of individuals (Frankfurter, 2006; Mulhern, 1991, 1994; Ofshe & Waters, 1994; Spanos, 1996). However, this hypothesis appears to reflect the authors' subjective opinions and speculations rather than any empirical research findings. In the literature, there are no empirically proven cases of individuals falsely claiming RA allegations due to their suggestibility and exposure to social influence.[4] Empirical studies by Leavitt (1997, 1999) showed that patients with recovered memories of childhood sexual trauma were less suggestible than psychiatric patients without such recovered memories of child abuse. Furthermore, in other studies Leavitt and Labott (1998, 2000) found that exposure to media accounts of ritual abuse and inpatient hospital treatment with other individuals reporting sexual abuse histories did not account for the “satanic” word associations and Rorschach responses among patients alleging histories of ritual abuse compared to controls. In fact, Leavitt and Labott (1998) found that among patients with RA histories, those with lower reported media exposure made significantly more “satanic” word associations and Rorschach responses in comparison to similar patients reporting a higher degree of media exposure. This finding is consistent with our own personal observations that many survivors tend to become “shut down” and more disconnected from their abuse narratives when overexposed to this material. Like other kinds of trauma survivors, they tend to be avoidant regarding traumatic themes similar to their own lived experiences. Nevertheless, Mul-hern argued that therapists who treat these patients develop their own personal beliefs about the reality of ritual abuse by attending conferences on the subject and then pass these beliefs on to their suggestible patients. However, the only study that has attempted to investigate the therapists’ beliefs about their patients’ allegations about ritual abuse longitudinally through the course of therapy shows that the therapists were initially skeptical and only later came to believe their patients’ allegations (Waterman, Kelly, Olivieri, & McCord, 1993).

In spite of the contrary research findings, some authors have speculated that RA allegations are more an artifact of suggestibility and social influence than real abuse. Jeffrey Victor (1993, 1998) described what he called satanic rumor panics. Victor argued that satanism is frightening and provocative to the general public and has been the source of numerous rumors for which he cited examples from the popular press. According to Sara Scott (2001), “much of the literature describing ritual abuse as a moral panic itself reads like a moral panic” (p. 48). This point is reiterated in Martin Katchen’s (2008) chapter, “Interrelated Moral Panics and Counter-panics: The Cult Brainwashing Panic and the False Memory/Ritual Abuse Moral Panic.” Even Philip Coons (1997), who has authored skeptical views regarding RA allegations, commented critically on Victor’s reinterpretation of RA outcries: “Unfortunately, it is impossible to tell from Victor’s cursory review of the evidence what really did happen at these 61 locations” (p. 108). Ross Cheit (2014), professor of public policy and political science at Brown University, has argued that assertions of a moral panic resulting from the allegations of child sexual abuse in day care venues is neither empirically based nor consistent with the evidence.

However, Coons (1994) contributed a study of his own on this question. He retrospectively reviewed the psychiatric records of 29 patients who had made allegations of SRA. He concluded that 76% of the patients had either dissociative identity disorder or dissociative disorder not otherwise specified but that he was unable to find any external corroboration of the SRA allegations. Three cases he labeled delusional and four were categorized as factitious. He concluded that in all but two cases “questionable” therapeutic methods were used. Weir and Wheatcroft (1995) reviewed 20 cases where ritual sexual abuse was alleged. Based on their evaluative findings, they concluded that false allegations of ritual abuse occurred in 75% of the cases and true allegations in only 25%. The primary weakness of these three studies is that they rely entirely on the subjective interpretations of the authors. The validity of the last two studies would depend on the ability of their authors to accurately diagnose ritual abuse and/or find corroborating evidence and the extent to which the data they needed to confirm any true ritual abuse was available. With no measure of inter-rater reliability, there is no way to know how reliably or accurately these investigators interpreted these data, and there is no way of knowing whether sufficient data were available to interpret.

Two other case studies merit attention, although they suffer the same methodological problems. Coons and Grier (1990) described a single case where an individual with RA allegations was instead diagnosed with factitious disorder, and Yeager and Lewis (1997) briefly presented a single case of a recanter. In the former example, one must ask whether the patient’s inaccurate reporting of particular events means that ritual abuse did or did not occur. In my opinion, the characteristic features of ritual abuse include abuse by ruse and deception. In the latter example, it should be obvious that recantation is not more intrinsically credible than an original allegation. It has been found that individuals with well-documented evidence of sexual abuse will sometimes later recant and that many recanters, particularly with RA allegations, later redisclose abuse (Waterman, Kelly, Olivieri, & McCord, 1993). Recent research on recantation among victims of violence has shown that recanting is prompted and controlled by the powerful demand characteristics that are communicated by the perpetrators of interpersonal violence (Bonomi, Gangamma, Locke, Katafiasz, & Martin, 2011).

Stafford and Lynn (2002) compared three groups of university student research volunteers who were role-playing that they had DID (n = 33), depression (n = 33), and normal adjustment problems (n = 33). These role-played enactments proceeded over a series of trials, including role-played hypnosis. They found that more individuals in the DID simulating group reported more sexual and ritual abuse allegations as part of the role-played enactments. Stratford and Lynn (2002) interpreted this as evidence that there is “a fairly cohesive cultural script linking DID to a patient’s history and the use of suggestive procedures such as hypnosis” (p. 70). Although this study does give evidence that university student volunteers know about the association between ritual abuse and DID, it does not make it clear to what degree this is known by the general public. It was also not clear to what extent the volunteers role-played narratives and enactments that would have persuaded experienced clinicians to give the students psychiatric diagnoses. In fact, that did not happen in this study.

Nadja Schreiber (2000) compared 20 transcribed interviews of children from the Kelly Michaels day care case with 20 interviews from a Child Protective Services (CPS) unit in New Mexico. She concluded that the interviews of children in the Kelly Michaels case were more repetitive and leading than the CPS case. Garven, Wood, Malpass, and Shaw (1998) found that a group of 36 children interviewed with overt social influence made 58% false accusations in comparison with a group of 30 children who were interviewed with suggestive questions only.

A related contention is that some therapists and caseworkers are overly credulous about the widespread existence of ritual abuse and that they mismanage therapeutic and legal components influencing their clients with their own false beliefs. In an effort to test this hypothesis in the United Kingdom, Bernard Gallagher (2001) conducted a review of cases of suspected child ritual abuse that were identified through searches of records relating to “all referrals to police child protection units (CPUs) and social services child protection coordinators (CPCs) in eight local authority areas in England and Wales between January 1988 and December 1991” (p. 229). This investigation yielded the records of six child cases (involving more than eight children), and it assisted in identifying eight adults who alleged that they were adult survivors of child ritual abuse when claims appeared as part of the review of six child cases. Gallagher’s intent was to find out whether the agency personnel had done appropriate investigations. Gallagher (2001) concluded that:

> These results indicate that agency workers raised concerns of ritual abuse very rarely, and then only following assessments which showed the cases in question to possess a number of quite ‘troubling’ features. Even after raising these concerns, agency workers tended to be circumspect, if not sceptical, as to whether ritual abuse had taken place. Furthermore, the interventions they chose to employ in respect of these cases appeared to be appropriate in terms of both method and application. (p. 238)

Another study, “Discredited Psychological Treatments and Tests: A Delphi Poll,” by Norcross, Koocher, and Garofalo (2006), did find evidence of professional skepticism about ritual abuse. The authors designated a panel of 101 “expert” psychologists who were charged with evaluating a list of 59 treatments and 30 assessment methods. One of the 89 items that they rated was “Treatments for Mental Disorders Resulting from Satanic Ritual Abuse.” The ratings consisted of a 0 to 5 Likert scale, where 1 meant “not at all discredited,” 2 was “unlikely discredited,” 3 was “possibly discredited,” 4 was “probably discredited,” and 5 was “certainly discredited.” Because the study was intended to identify discredited methods, there was a likely bias inherent in its methodology. There were two rounds of ratings. After the first round, all the members of the panel were given the results of the first round, and then they rated the methods again. The mean rating for the SRA item was 3.98 during the first round, and 4.28 after the second round. The results of Norcross et al. are inconsistent with the studies of mental health professionals cited earlier who actually interviewed RA survivors and those with expertise or experience in childhood sexual abuse. Those groups of professionals found the survivors to be credible. It is not clear how many of the experts in Norcross et al. had expertise in child sexual or ritual abuse as that was not one of the criteria for their selection in this particular study. Nor is it clear that anyone involved in the Norcross et al. panel had any familiarity with the empirical literature addressing ritual abuse as none of it was cited. The Norcross et al. findings are also inconsistent with the research of Becker et al. (2008, 2013) and Rutz et al. (2008), where psychotherapy was reported to be the most effective recovery method for RA survivors as reported by survivors, helping professionals, and the caretakers of child RA survivors.

As mentioned earlier, RA allegations are sometimes categorized regarding whether the alleged victims are children or adults at the time the allegations are made. Reports of the ritual abuse of children sometimes occur while they are still children. In such instances, it may be easier to obtain corroborating material evidence. This is especially more likely than the second case, where adults report that they were abused in childhood. Both categories have been studied empirically. Another category of ritual abuse consists of alleged abuse of adults while they are adults without any report of prior child abuse. Such reports do occasionally appear, but we don't know of any studies of them in the literature. On the rare occasions when I have evaluated such individuals clinically, there was sometimes corroborating evidence of earlier childhood abuse for which the survivor initially was amnestic.

Those studies of allegations of the ritual abuse of children then may be further subdivided into three categories: (1) cases where ritual abuse was alleged in day care or preschool settings, (2) cases where the abuse allegedly occurred in community-based cults, and (3) cases of multigenerational ritual abuse.

Pamela Hudson (1991) assessed 24 children[5] in a case of alleged ritual abuse at a Fort Bragg day care center in California. Hudson found five symptoms to be present among many of the children:

1. acting out the sexual abuse (n = 13),
2. sudden extreme fear of the bathroom, bathing, washing hair (n = 10),
3. nightmares, night terrors (n = 12),
4. high anxiety disorder, separation anxiety (n = 16), and
5. temper tantrums, oppositional behavior (n = 12). (p. 8)

She also noted that among the children's allegations were their being molested by other children (n = 11), being molested by strangers, day care workers, or a parent (n = 11). Hudson identified 16 forms of abuse: (1) being locked in a cage or "jail"; (2) being told that their parents, pets, or younger siblings would be killed if they told anyone of the abuse; (3) being buried in the ground in coffins which they called "boxes"; (4) being held underwater; (5) being threatened with guns and knives; (6) being injected with needles, bled, drugged; (7) being photographed during the abuse; (8) being tied upside down over a “star,” hung from a pole or hook, burned with candles; (9) perpetrators wearing black robes, masks; (10) having participated in a mock marriage; (11) being defecated and urinated upon; (12) having observed animals killed; (13) having observed torture or molestation of other children; (14) having seen children and babies killed; (15) having blood poured on their heads; and (16) being taken to churches, other day care settings, people’s homes, and graveyards for the ritual abuse. Of these, 13 children acknowledged experiencing at least one of the listed abuses, not counting the 14th. Four children reported number 14, seeing children and babies killed.

Hudson performed a second study. In order to control for the possible contagion effects that might have occurred in her Fort Bragg case, she conducted a telephone interview of 10 other families in different locations in the United States where ritual abuse had been reported. All but two were day care cases. She collected data from these interviews, which she combined with her Fort Bragg data. Thus, she had a total of 11 cases. The following abuses and corroboration were reported:

1. confinement in cage (n = 10);
2. threats (n = 11);
3. live burial in caskets, coffins, boxes (n = 6);
4. water torture (n = 7);
5. threats with guns or knives (n = 10);
6. drug injections (n = 10);
7. filming and still photography (n = 11);
8. bondage, locked in closets, hung by feet or wrists, spread-eagled over pentagrams;
9. tied onto upside-down crosses (n = 7);
10. abusers wearing masks and robes, carrying candles (n = 11);
11. mock marriages (n = 6);
12. defecation, urination, forcible ingestion of human wastes (n = 10);
13. witnessing animals tortured and killed (n = 10);
14. fake operations (n = 6);
15. children’s descriptions of the torture and sexual assault of themselves or others (n = 10);

16. evidential medical examinations: findings commensurate with sexual assault (n = 11);
17. babies, small children killed, carved up, and parts eaten (n = 9);
18. transportation elsewhere for abuse; various methods of transport (n = 10); and
19. sexual assault and terrorizing in churches, graveyards, other day care centers (n = 10).[6]

Susan Kelley (1992b) compared three groups of children in day care: 35 allegedly ritualistically abused children, 32 children reportedly sexually abused, not ritualistically, and 67 children without any claims of sexual abuse. She collected data from the abused children’s parents and compared the results of children with non-ritualistic sexual abuse with ritualistic sexual abuse. She found that ritualistically abused children were more likely to report more incidents, types, and severity of abuse relative to the non-ritual sexual abuse victims. She also found that ritualistic abuse was more often associated with multiple victim, multiple perpetrator encounters. On the Child Behavior Checklist (CBCL), there were more reported behavior problems and tendency toward internalizing symptoms among both groups of abused children in comparison with non-abused children, but the ritualistically abused children scored worse.

Jill Waterman, Robert Kelley, Mary Kay Olivieri, and Jane McCord (1993) did a six-year longitudinal study of 82 children who had made allegations of ritualistic sexual abuse (RSA) in the Manhattan Beach, California, area in comparison with 37 non-abused (NA) children and 15 non-ritualistically sexually abused (SA) children. A variety of standardized and non-standardized questionnaires and interview instruments were employed. They found that both the RSA and SA group reported intrusive and highly intrusive sexual abuse. Additionally, the RSA group, but not the SA group, reported “terrorizing acts that included killing of animals, death threats to the children or their families, sadistic acts and physical abuse, and ritualistic acts that included Satanic activities” (p. 64). Recantations occurred in 25% of the RSA and 23% of the SA children. This was the case, even though the perpetrator in the SA group had given a detailed confession. However, 88% of the RSA group that recanted later redisclosed abuse. The children alleging RSA had more severe symptoms than SA children with significantly more PTSD, depression, and aggressive behaviors. The RSA group showed less improvement over time in comparison with the SA group.

A case involving 172 children who made disclosures in day care in southwest Michigan was investigated (Bybee & Mowbray, 1993; Faller, 1994). Kathleen Faller gathered data from her clinical interviews with 18 of the children, and Bybee and Mowbray reviewed the cases of 106 children, including interviews by state police and records from community mental health professionals, and the Department of Social Services. Bybee and Mowbray identified 62 (58%) children who disclosed that they had been victimized and 53 (50%) children who reportedly observed others being abused, with 92% of the children who were observed being abused also disclosing that they had been abused. They found that children reported experiencing and observing acts of fondling, penetration, oral sex, sex with children, penetration of an adult, threats of harm, being hit or hurt, being given medicine or bad food, bestiality, and ritual acts. Among her sample of 18 children, Faller found “sadistic acts (100%), threats of harm and death to children and their family members (100%), use of drugs (56%), confinement (44.4%) and animal killings or injury (22%)” (p. 22). Faller wrote that when she compared the 18 children she interviewed with children who were abused by a single perpetrator in a day care center or day care home, she found that significantly “higher percentages of ritually abused children were reported to have sexual acting out problems, sleep problems, emotional problems, behavior problems and phobias” (p. 22). Faller also cited an unpublished report by Valliere, Bybee, & Mowbray (1988) of scores on the CBCL comparing the abused children with a comparable sample of non-abused children from the community with clinical and non-clinical norms. “The sexually abused children’s scores were generally comparable to those of clinical norms, and significantly higher than non-clinical norms. Sexually abused girls demonstrated improvement on the CBCL between times one and two, but the boys did not” (p. 22).

Not all child ritual abuse research is associated with day care cases. Within the literature on child abuse, there are two reports of what Faller called “community-based ritual abuse” (p. 23). She defined community-based cults as “those whose membership is contemporary and often made up of persons of various ages—children, adolescents, and adults in a particular community” (p. 24).

Snow and Sorenson (1990) wrote about 39 children who were abused in five neighbor-based cults in Utah. In four of the five cults, there were incidents of intrafamilial incest, perpetration by adolescents, and features of an adult sex ring. No adolescent perpetration was found in the fifth group. Also reported was forced sexual behavior, threats of violence, and multiple perpetrators and victims. At least two-thirds of the children described, multiple locations of abuse, pornography, ingestion or other use of excrement, the espousal of satanic beliefs, magical spells and use of occult paraphernalia, animal mutilation or killing, and the use of drugs. The abusers were generally viewed as respected members of the community, and many were religious leaders. Two of the accused adult perpetrators were convicted, and two adolescents pled guilty.

Jonker and Jonker-Bakker (1991, 1997) reported a case of the ritual abuse of children in the Netherlands. The authors described the allegations and their observations regarding this case in Oude Pekela, a small town of 8,000 inhabitants in northeastern Netherlands near the German border. Jonker and Jonker-Bakker initially surveyed the families of 90 involved children six to eight weeks after the initial disclosures. They gathered additional data from the families of 87 of these children at 2-1/2- and 7-year intervals after the first outcries had been made. They compared their later findings with clinical information that antedated the abuse and with initial survey results. They found that 20% of the children made spontaneous disclosures. The list of reported abuses included the following elements: sexual abuse, warnings to be silent, taking photographs, making videotapes, tying up children, keeping children in extreme darkness, being scratched, kicked, beaten, drugged, animals being present, animals being tortured and killed, babies being involved, babies being killed, adults being killed, chanting, forced eating of excrement or semen, and supernatural powers being claimed. “Almost one-third of the parents reported in 1989–1990 profound changes, as if they were dealing with a different child” (p. 550). The symptomatic behaviors of the children included the following: a poor sleep pattern, nightmares, night awakenings, bedwetting, genital shame, masturbation, inappropriate sexual behavior, swearing, aggressiveness, destructiveness, self-isolation, anxiety, tongue kissing, torturing of animals, fear of being locked up, interest in fire, fear of spiders, interest in devils, ghosts, the experience of words turning around, and interest in death. The three most common symptoms among the boys were the following: “poor sleep pattern (79%), waking during the night (79%), and aggressiveness toward the surroundings (83%)" (p. 550). Among the girls, "the most exhibited behaviors were poor sleep pattern (67%), anxiety, nervousness (77%), and aggressiveness towards the surroundings (87%)" (p. 550). The authors also noted, "If the Oude Pekela case had been a result of adult community hysteria rather than real children's experiences, then the behavioral changes would be expected to escalate as a function of disclosures to adults. Instead, there was a decrease in the number of changes in behavior following disclosure" (p. 551). In this case, two arrests were made but there were no convictions. However, Jonker and Jonker-Bakker noted that the chief of the police investigation team believed that 50% of the 64 children investigated by the police "were certainly involved" (p. 545). A statement by the district attorney on January 21, 1988, is cited:

> A total number of 98 children, 3 to 11 years old were interviewed. The statements of 62 children were used in the further investigation. Finally 48 statements of children remained, speaking of clear sexual abuse, where they had either submitted to or been forced to perform on themselves or others. Many of the children told about strong lights, lamps on poles, and seeing each other on TV. The justice ministry concluded that it was nearly sure that photographs were taken of the children. Against 18 children violence was used. The child abuse took place over a period of several months. The justice Ministry thinks that four people, two men and two women, were involved in the sexual abuse. (quoted by Myers, 1994, and cited by Jonker & Jonker-Bakker, 1997, p. 541)

Faller (1994) cited a study of intergenerational ritual abuse of children by Susan Kelley (1992a). This paper, Ritualistic Abuse: Recognition, Impact, and Current Controversy, was presented by Kelley at the San Diego Conference on Responding to Child Maltreatment in January 1992. Kelley investigated reports of 26 children from 14 families. The accused abusers were parents, grandparents, great-grandparents, uncles, aunts, cousins, and siblings. Similar to other reports, a significant number of abusers were female (45%). "Sixty-one percent of children were abused by two generations of older relatives, and 57% of cases involved extrafamilial as well as intrafamilial offenders" (Faller, 1994, p. 25). Reported abuses included "terrorizing threats and acts (89%), including having spiders or other insects placed on them, death threats (77%), making pornography (81%), threats with supernatural powers (89%), satanic reference (92%), animal killings (54%), being made to ingest drugs (92%), songs and chants (69%), and being made to ingest or touch excrement (85%)" (p. 25). Scores on the CBCL were in the clinical range for 73% of the children on total problems, 81% on internalizing, and 50% on externalizing scales.

A series of studies of reported child abuse that included ritualistic abuse were conducted among older adolescents and young adults in South Africa. In the first of these studies Madu and Peltzer (1998, 1999) gathered questionnaire data from 414 South African high school students. The students were asked retrospectively about different experiences of abuse that had occurred before age 17, including ritualistic abuse. Eight percent reported experiences of ritualistic abuse. In another study of 559 high school students in three high schools in the Mpumalanga Province of South Africa, Madu (2001) found that 10% of the participants reported that they were ritualistically abused before the age of 17. In a sample of 722 University of the North undergraduate students 6% indicated that they had experienced ritualistic abuse before age 17 (Madu, 2002).

One of the more recent studies of the ritual abuse of children is reported by Becker, Karriker, Overkamp, and Rutz (2008) and Becker, Karriker, Rutz, and Overkamp (2013). These researchers developed an online questionnaire, the EAS that we will discuss in more detail later in this chapter. One of the three versions of the EAS was the Child-Extreme Abuse Survey (C-EAS). It was designed to gather information about abused children from their caregivers. The survey was available to take online in English and German from July 8 through October 8, 2007, and 264 caregivers from 19 different countries responded to at least one question. With 260 questions asked, the collected data were complex and extensive, and we are only able to summarize a few of the many salient outcomes here. For a more detailed presentation of their findings, see Becker, Karriker, Rutz, and Overkamp (2013).

Becker et al. (2013) asked detailed questions about the children's' disclosures of abuse and other physical signs of abuse. Fifty-one percent of the caregivers who responded indicated that they were RA/MC survivors themselves. The authors queried caregivers about corroboration for the RA/MC crimes, including legal responses to the disclosure. Thirty-one percent indicated affirmative legal outcomes for one or more perpetrators. One important component of the EAS questionnaires is ratings about what interventions were helpful for survivors. The researchers asked if any of a list of 33 healing methods had been used, and if they were used, to what degree were the methods helpful. Individual psychotherapy (70% indicating it was either much help or a great help), supportive friends (68% indicating it was either much help or a great help), and supportive family members (63% indicating it was either much help or a great help) were the top three most helpful healing methods. The three least helpful methods were electroshock therapy (91% indicating it was not helpful), therapeutic camps (65% indicating they was not helpful), and exorcism (64% indicating it was not helpful).

The studies of ritually abused children consistently has shown commonalities in terms of the specific kinds of abuse that were alleged, the severity of the resulting psychological problems, and the specific kinds of psychological problems seen in these children (sexualized behaviors, posttraumatic symptoms, dissociative functioning, and phobias).

Now we will turn our attention to empirical studies of adult survivors of ritual abuse. We found 10 publications describing the empirical studies of adult RA survivors and their treatment (Becker, Karriker, Overkamp, & Rutz, 2008; Becker, Karriker, Rutz, & Overkamp, 2013; Driscoll & Wright, 1991; Friesen, 2000; Sarson & McDonald, 2008; Scott, 2001; Shaffer & Cozolino, 1992; Rutz, Becker, Overkamp, & Karriker, 2008; Smith, 1993; Young, Sachs, Braun, & Watkins, 1991) and five studies more specifically about psychological testing results (Leavitt, 1994; Leavitt & Labott, 1998, 2000; Noblitt, 1995) and a report on the use of a structured interview method, the Adult Attachment Interview with adult RA survivors (Steele, 2003).

Lynda Driscoll and Cheryl Wright (1991) investigated the experiences of 37 adult psychotherapy patients, who were allegedly survivors of ritual abuse. Eighty-one percent had no memory of ritual abuse before beginning therapy, and of the remaining 13%, their memories were incomplete. Dissociation was a commonly reported problem in this sample with 63% being diagnosed with DID, 34% diagnosed dissociative and 17% with “strong ego states” (p. 6). Eighty-three percent reported involvement in rituals by a relative with their fathers (63%), uncles (41%), mothers (38%), grandfathers (35%) and grandmothers (22%). Other abusers included “doctors (54%), neighbors (41%), friends of relatives (49%), church members (35%), police (27%), teachers (22%), and morticians (19%)” (p. 6). Eighty percent stated that the ritual abuse began before age six. The mean age was six. The reported physical and psychological abuses included being “forced to drink blood (84%), tied up (84%), drugged (78%), deprived of food (61%), forced to eat flesh (57%), forced to eat or drink body waste (57%), deprived of sleep (54%), and given electric shock" (p. 8). Ninety percent reported being exposed to confusing and degrading experiences. Seventy-five percent reported being "isolated, 61% ejaculated on, 54% urinated on, 38% defecated on, 50% put in coffins (46% with corpses), 44% buried alive, and 39% put in graves" (p. 8). They were allegedly coerced into silence "by threats of harm (84%), of abandonment (76%), death or mutilation of themselves (73%), death of parent or relative (57%)." Most victims reported they were threatened with supernatural powers (62%), and they were told they had been magically altered (51%) in a way that would end their lives if they 'talked' or disobeyed" (p. 8). Seventy-four percent said that they were forced to perpetrate.

Ninety-three percent were allegedly sexually victimized, including oral sex (89%), vaginal (84%), object penetration (81%), anal (78%). They reported sex with adults (89%), group sex 84%), with animals (62%), other children (54%), and corpses (38%). Eighty-four percent reported human sacrifice; 14 % claimed they were breeders for sacrifices.

The alleged effects of ritual abuse included problems with trust (100%) and emotional intimacy (97%). "Eighty percent (80%) mistrust family members, peers, males, and authority figures in general . . . . Over ninety percent (90%) reported chronic depression, anxiety attacks, obsessions and suicidal behavior" (p. 9). Over 80% described feelings of "worthlessness, inferiority, lack of assertiveness, and dirtiness" (p. 10). Roughly 70% state they feel "helplessness, difficulties making decisions, embarrassment about themselves, humiliation and hopelessness" (p. 10). Reported physical symptoms include headaches (90%), insomnia and chronic back and abdominal pain (75%), acute unexplained weakness (76%), catatonic spells (33%), episodic paralysis (37%), and blackouts (50%). Eating disorders included anorexia (30%), bulimia (30%), and consistently over 20 pounds overweight (70%).

Walter Young, Roberta Sachs, Bennett Braun, and Ruth Watkins (1991) studied the allegations of a sample of 37 patients reporting transgenerational childhood ritual abuse. They found that all reported sexual abuse, witnessing and receiving physical abuse or torture, witnessing animal mutilation or killings and experiencing death threats. Ninety-seven percent indicated forced drug use. Other abuses included witnessing and forced participation in human adult and infant sacrifice (83%), forced cannibalism (81%), marriage to Satan (78%), being buried alive in coffins or graves (72%), and forced impregnation and sacrifice of own child (60%). All of the patients had severe PTSD and experienced dissociative states with satanic characteristics. Other psychiatric sequelae included survivor guilt (97%), indoctrinated beliefs (94%), unusual fears (94%), sexualization of sadistic impulses (86%), bizarre self-abuse (83%), and substance abuse (62%). The authors also described corroborating evidence.

Ruth Shaffer and Louis Cozolino (1992) published another of the early studies of RA survivors. The authors interviewed 20 outpatients, 19 of whom were women and one who was male. Seventy-five percent reported abuse beginning at or before age five. All subjects reported witnessing the sacrificial murder of animals, infants, children, and/or adults. Corpses were often subjected to sexual violations and cannibalistic feasting. The majority of subjects in this study reported severe and sadistic forms of sexual abuse by multiple perpetrators (p. 188). Shaffer and Cozolino noted the similarity of psychological problems found in these outpatients and the patients described in the Young et al. (1991) study, including severe amnesia, generally poor adaptive functioning, and anxiety or depression. Intrusive recollections of ritual abuse emerged, mostly during the course of therapy that revealed a coherent narrative of a tortured childhood.

Sara Scott is a practicing psychotherapist in London who provided additional empirical findings about ritual abuse. In her article “Beyond Belief: Beyond Help?” (1993), she wrote about a television program, Beyond Belief, that aired in the United Kingdom that addressed the topic of ritual abuse. A helpline was established to deal with potential telephone calls regarding the program, and it was overwhelmed with calls. “British Telecom recorded 595 attempted calls in the first five minutes after the helpline appeared on the screen and 4500 attempted calls in the first hour of operation” (Scott, 1993, p. 245). The helpline staff were able to answer 191 of the attempted calls. Of these, almost half were related to ritual abuse. “Thirty-nine percent of all calls were from current victims or survivors of ritual abuse calling on their own behalf ” (p. 246).

Scott also published a book, The Politics and Experience of Ritual Abuse: Beyond Disbelief (2001), where she described her data gathering by questionnaire of 36 RA survivors, interviews of 14, and more detailed life-history interviews with 12. In her interviews, she was careful to select individuals from different locations who did not know one another in order to reduce the risk of information contagion. Scott contributed a new idea to the discussion of ritual abuse that she calls the discourse of disbelief to characterize the various arguments that have been used to discredit survivor stories, including the moral panic and false memory constructs. She pointed out the damaging effects that such a discourse of disbelief can have on survivors whose stories are arbitrarily discredited this way. Scott combined the findings from her survey and interviews to develop a “thick” description of these survivors’ experiences. She showed how ritual abuse typically consists of multilayered traumatic experiences, including abuse by family members and individuals from outside the family in a variety of different contexts, commonly including prostitution and pornography. Another layer of the abuse consists of abhorrent practices performed in ceremonies with various demonic, mythical, or magical themes. She discussed the complex way that beliefs were expressed and enacted in the ritual groups along a continuum ranging from true believer to cynic, but also how the demands for various beliefs varied by context. A child might be expected to behave as a satanist in the nighttime rituals, but be a good Christian at other times when that behavior was required. Scott discussed the notion that the ritual participants experienced varying half beliefs and contextual beliefs, but that elements of magical thinking were often pervasively present. Other important findings included the notion of embodiment—that for participants their bodies were not their own. The repeated infliction of extreme trauma resulted in periodic loss of agency, amnesia, and a stable sense of identity. Scott discussed the relationships among ritual participants, including the sadistic use of punishment sometimes followed by rescue scenario roles. Both the punishers and the rescuers wielded great power. Scott ended her book with:

> I have aimed to honour the suffering and the survival of those who entrusted their life-stories to my care, and to enable their accounts to speak directly to the arguments which have sought to disparage and ignore them. I believe that in doing so I have unsealed the closure of the debate on ritual abuse and made possible both further understanding and future interventions. (p. 194)

Margaret Smith (1993) is another researcher in the United States who presented data on 52 adults who reported being survivors of childhood ritual abuse. Ninety-seven percent reported that “at some point in their lives, they were amnestic of their ritual abuse experience” (p. 20). Smith found that perpetrators were reportedly fathers (67%), mothers (42%), grandfathers (31%), grandmothers (23%), aunts (21%), uncles (27%), nonfamily member physicians (33%), nonfamily member clergy (17%), and nonfamily member teachers (17%). In her study of the occupations of the family and nonfamily alleged perpetrators, there were physicians (35%), teachers (25%), clergy (22%), and police (15%). Sixty-five percent reported that the abuse began before age of four. The following abuses were allegedly perpetrated against the respondents: molestation or intercourse (100%), forced participation in group sex with adults (96%), being tortured (94%), witnessing or forced participation in animal sacrifice (90%), witnessing or forced participation in human sacrifice (88%), sodomy (88%), being drugged during the abuse (88%), witnessing or forced participation in cannibalism (82%), being forced to torture others (75%), child prostitution (52%), child pornography (52%), and being forced to breed children who were later sacrificed (36%). Smith also listed "other forms of abuse mentioned by RA survivors": mental programming (21%), bestiality (17%), torture by electric shock (13%), witnessing or forced participation in dismemberment or mutilation of bodies (12%), being hung upside down (10%), being forced to kidnap children from playgrounds (8%), hypnotism (8%), having pets killed (4%), having psychic surgery (4%), and being lent to other cults (4%).

Jean Sarson and Linda MacDonald (2008) summarized their case studies of five women who described histories of ritual abuse, although Sarson and MacDonald used the term ritual abuse-torture (RAT) in describing this phenomenon. These authors emphasized the fact that survivors of RAT are not merely abuse survivors: It is more accurate to say that they have been tortured. Sarson and MacDonald identified 10 violent themes associated with these families and groups:

> (a) neglect and abuse of many forms (e.g., verbal, emotional, physical, sexual, financial); (b) being terrorized by acts of violence, such as the killing of a pet and being threatened with death if she disclosed the violence and abuse; (c) human-animal violence, including bestiality and/or being "trained" to harm animals; (d) torture (e.g., physical, sexual, and mind-spirit); (e) rampageous pedophilia; (f) necrophilic and pseudonecrophilic acts, such as drugging or choking her into unconsciousness and raping her dead-like body; (g) forced self-harming behaviors; (h) enduring horrifying acts, such as being forced to watch another child tortured and gang raped; (i) human trafficking victimization and exploitation (e.g., pedophilic and adult pornography; being used as a drug mule); and (j) forced participation in violent organized pedophilic family/group gatherings coded as "rituals and ceremonies." (p. 420)

Some other authors, including survivors (Kadi, 1997) and mental health professionals (Schwecke, 2009), have adopted Sarson and MacDonald's

RAT terminology.

Becker et al. (2008, 2013) and Rutz et al. (2008) conducted an ambitious online international study of adult extreme abuse survivors using their questionnaire, the EAS. The survey was available in English and German from January 1 through March 31, 2007. One thousand four hundred seventy-one (1,471) people answered at least one of the 187 (and 53 optional) questions. The respondents identified themselves as residents of 31 different countries. In addition to recording demographic information, the EAS asks about recollections of abuse, the aftereffects of abuse, the personal experiences of the abuse survivors, and the healing methods that the survivors used and the extent to which these were helpful. Fifty-two percent indicated that they had been victimized by both ritual abuse (RA) and mind control (MC). Nineteen percent identified themselves as RA and 7% as MC survivors. The abuses perpetrated on these individuals were much like those reported in other studies, including sexual abuse by multiple perpetrators (79%), being caged (53%), starvation (48%), forced cannibalism (44%), bestiality (52%), being buried alive (45%), electroshock (50%), sensory deprivation (61%), sleep deprivation (69%), incest (70%), child pornography (52%), and child prostitution (46%). Among the aftereffects of extreme abuse were sleep problems (90%), PTSD (89%), survivor guilt (73%), substance abuse (48%), self-mutilation (65%), dissociative flashbacks with satanic themes (68%), and eating disorders (70%). One of the particularly useful components of this research is the data about helpful recovery methods. Among the methods that were rated as providing much help or great help were individual psychotherapy (75%), supportive friends (66%), creative writing (64%), and personal prayer/meditation (62%). The idea of prayer as a component treatment strategy is echoed in another publication that addressed spiritual approaches to recovery. James Friesen (2000) described two studies that he conducted: The first was a survey of 66 Christian therapists regarding spiritual methods they used, and the second was a survey of 102 respondents regarding the extent to which the spiritual interventions were perceived as helpful.

The literature also includes studies of the data from psychological testing administered to individuals who reported they were RA survivors (Leavitt, 1994, 1998; Leavitt & Labott, 1998, 2000; Noblitt, 1995). Leavitt (1994) found that with the exception of the paranoia scale, there were no significant differences between MMPI scores for a group of adults claiming to be RA survivors and a group of adults reporting childhood sexual, but not ritual, abuse. However, Leavitt noted that adults claiming to be RA survivors scored significantly higher on the Dissociative Experiences Scale (DES) in comparison with the sexually, but not ritually, abused control group. Leavitt (1998) compared the Word Association Test (WAT) responses of “43 patients who alleged SA in the context of Satanic cults” and 43 patients “who reported SA without allegations of SRA.” The group of RA survivors produced more responses with satanic content, and this finding was not due to exposure to this material in the hospital. In a related study by Leavitt and Labott (1998), WAT responses were compared for 60 adult inpatients who alleged they were survivors of SRA, 60 who reported sexual, but not ritual, abuse, and 150 admitted inpatients. Again, it was found that individuals reporting that they were ritually abused produced characteristically “satanic” associations to the WAT. What was more surprising was that, in spite of making significantly more overall responses, the SRA group produced significantly fewer normal or “normative” responses than either of a group of non-ritual sexually abused individuals and a non-abused group. In another study, Leavitt and Labott (2000) compared 131 participants who alleged past ritual abuse experiences, 92 individuals with sexual, but not ritual, abuse histories, and 92 non-abused women on their Rorschach inkblot responses. They found good inter-rater reliability identifying 16 responses that distinguished the SRA patients from the others. They found moderate convergence among these responses and the findings published by Young et al. (1991) regarding SRA survivors. They also studied the relationship between Rorschach satanic content, media exposure, and hospital exposure to satanic themes. They found no effect resulting from hospital exposure. Paradoxically, participants with low media exposure had the highest number of satanic Rorschach responses.

In another retrospective study, the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (MMPI-2) posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) scales (PS and PK) were compared between a group of 34 adult outpatients who reported being RA survivors, and a group of 31 adult outpatients who made no such RA allegations. The results showed significantly higher PTSD scores for the alleged RA survivors on both scales (Noblitt, 1995).

Howard Steele (2003) wrote about his use of the Adult Attachment Interview with RA survivors also noting that these clients met the criteria for DID. He discussed the attachment coding and classification and its relevance to these survivors.

Legal cases involving RA allegations have been litigated in civil and criminal venues. It is important to recognize that civil and criminal laws use different standards of evidence in the United States. Civil cases rely on the preponderance of evidence in making determinations, whereas criminal cases require that the evidence be beyond a reasonable doubt. Thus, criminal cases demand more stringent evidence. Civil cases involving RA allegations have included child custody disputes, lawsuits by survivors claiming damages from their alleged abusers, and malpractice lawsuits brought against therapists for purportedly implanting false memories of abuse and at least one third-party claim against a psychiatrist alleging alienation of affection between an alleged survivor and her parents. To my knowledge, there is no comprehensive published review of these cases regarding outcomes.

Because some of these cases involve children and matters of family privacy, some of the cases are sealed by the court. Some malpractice claims settle out of court with an agreement that the terms of settlement may not be disclosed by any of the parties. Criminal cases have been easier to study empirically, but even these cases are not without difficulties in interpretation. The fact that a crime involves ritual practices may never be disclosed in the testimony or by the media. Most states do not have laws specifically prohibiting ritual crime, and therefore, the offense is typically prosecuted as some other defined crime (e.g., murder or child abuse). We discovered that the oft-repeated report that the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been studying ritual abuse is untrue when we communicated directly with the FBI about this question (see Appendix B). In spite of these limitations, some data have been collected, particularly in criminal cases of ritual abuse of children.

Faller (1994), previously cited, included data on convictions associated with the various studies of ritual abuse she reviewed. In 1997, author Michael Newton accumulated data on the sentencing of 145 defendants for criminal activities in which the ritual abuse of children was alleged. He found that at that time only 17 (11.7%) were reversed on appeal. Sixty-four or 44% of the 145 defendants pled guilty or nolo contendere (no contest). Newton argued that these reversals do not necessarily mean that the defendants were innocent. Newton found that in most instances the reversals were based on legal technicalities rather than factual indicators of innocence. Since the time Newton collected this data, more of these convicted individuals have been released from prison (de Young, 2007).

In addition to quantitative studies about ritual crime, the descriptive accounts by Carl Raschke (1990), Nick Kahaner (1988), Maury Terry (1987), and David McGowan (2004) provide further details about such cases. Nick Pisa (2007) reported on the rising satanic crime statistics in Italy, including church desecrations and murders. He cited the murder conviction of "Andrea Volpe, the Beasts of Satan ringleader, [who] was given a life sentence, while his girlfriend, Elisabetta Ballarin, 19, was sentenced to 24 years."[7] Two recent cases involving ritualistic rapes by satanic cults resulted in convictions in Wales (Turner, 2011) and England (Cohen, 2012).

Another contentious topic concerns the question of whether there is an "international satanic conspiracy" that is engaging in these alleged abusive practices. Two research efforts have addressed this particular question: (1) the studies conducted by Bottoms et al. (1991) and Goodman et al. (1994) in the United States and (2) the research of J. S. La Fontaine (1994, 1998) in England.[8] Neither found any evidence of such a satanic conspiracy. Should one then conclude that there is no satanic conspiracy? Unfortunately, neither study disproved this hypothesis; they merely did not find evidence that met their criteria.

A serious problem in studying alleged conspiracies is that the usual methods of investigation may not be sufficiently sensitive to identify one when it is present. A case in point is the study of organized crime in the United States. The terms Mafia and La Cosa Nostra were commonly used to describe one such alleged Italian American criminal conspiracy. However, for decades the FBI denied the existence of the Mafia or La Cosa Nostra. Although the FBI recognized that organized crime existed, they had accumulated no evidence that linked any crime to any group that called itself the Mafia or La Cosa Nostra. As far as the FBI was concerned, the talk on the street about the Mafia and La Cosa Nostra was simply the reflection of contemporary legend.

Curiously, an advocacy group even arose calling itself the Italian American Civil Rights League. This group claimed that the rumors about the Mafia and La Cosa Nostra were really efforts to defame Italian American people by spreading these supposedly spurious rumors about Italian American organized crime. The primary organizer of the Italian-American Civil Rights League was Joseph Colombo, who ironically was the head of one of the "five families" of New York.

Finally in 1989, the FBI surreptitiously tape-recorded a Mafia initiation ceremony in which the words Mafia and La Cosa Nostra were used during the ceremony. Later when the participants were arrested, not one admitted that there was such an organization as the Mafia, although some admitted to other accusations of serious crimes, including murder (Pistone, 1992). This example of the investigation of organized crime in the United States illustrates how difficult it may be to demonstrate evidence of a genuine criminal conspiracy.

In my opinion, neither of the two earlier cited research efforts was sufficiently sensitive to adequately test that particular question. To say that there is no evidence of an international satanic conspiracy misrepresents the facts. There are many people who allege that they have been eyewitnesses to elements of such a conspiracy. Eyewitness reports do constitute evidence. The question is not whether evidence exists; it does exist. The question is to what extent are these alleged eyewitness reports true or credible. This question requires further study and corroboration. It is more accurate to say that the question of the existence of a satanic conspiracy has not yet been settled in the scientific and legal community and that further investigation and research is needed.

Breaking the Code

“Leslie” was one of the first clients who sought treatment at my private practice in Richardson, Texas. She was grief-stricken following the death of one of her family members. She arrived at my office in a zombie-like state, barely able to converse. Shortly afterward, as our therapeutic relationship progressed, I learned that she experienced strong mood swings, self-destructive impulses, and bouts of rage. She made gradual progress learning to cope with this loss but continued to have episodic experiences of explosive anger and strong self-destructive urges. After a while, Leslie began to dissociate in therapy with alternate identities who talked with me during our individual therapy sessions. At first, these occurrences were not obvious to me. Initially, Leslie’s alternate identities did not announce their names when speaking. However, her tone of voice and facial expression changed, and she frequently complained that she was unable to remember what happened in our sessions. On one occasion when I said that our session was over, Leslie looked at me incredulously exclaiming, “I just got here.” I motioned toward the clock, and when she looked at it, she expressed amazement that her entire therapy time had elapsed. I asked Leslie’s permission to video record our next session and she agreed.

During our next meeting, Leslie again “lost time.” While the video camera recorded the session, she became overtly dissociated and identified herself as “Carol.” Leslie responded with shock as she later reviewed the recording of our session. She observed a child alter, Carol, talk about Leslie’s collection of teddy bears. Leslie and I had never before discussed her having teddy bears, but as she watched her video, she admitted having a rather extensive collection. Leslie watched the tape with a stunned expression, hardly able to believe what she was seeing. As she viewed her image and heard herself speaking in a child’s voice and using a childlike vocabulary, she finally had external evidence of her elusive, tumultuous, but dissociated inner world. Leslie said that prior to this session she did not understand why she felt compelled to invest so much money and energy in collecting teddy bears. However, Carol provided the explanation. There were several child alters within Leslie’s system of alters who were very attached to them.[1]

Eventually during the course of therapy, other alternate identities emerged. I made it a practice to videotape Leslie’s sessions so that she could view them later. This procedure assisted her in recalling the events that had transpired while she was in a dissociated state. Each time Leslie reviewed the taped sessions, she seemed surprised at what she saw on the television screen. Eventually, her alters described a history of cruel childhood abuse. Some of these memories she acknowledged as real because she could remember them herself, but others sounded unrecognizable, like events that had possibly happened to some other person. She wondered about these reports of abuse for which she had no memories and watched herself in a state of bewilderment as she saw her own videotaped image describing abuses for which she had no recollections or any memory of having told me in therapy.

Leslie sustained an injury at work that required surgery, extensive medical treatment, and physical therapy. She again felt hopeless coping with these repeated painful circumstances. She was also feeling increasingly self-destructive. At my recommendation, Leslie agreed to enter a psychiatric hospital where, at the time, I was providing intensive psychotherapy for patients with dissociative disorders. Arrangements were also made for Leslie to continue to receive physical therapy and biofeedback-assisted therapy[2] for pain reduction as ordered by her surgeon.

Because Leslie’s multiplicity had just recently emerged in therapy, I directed one of my staff, with Leslie’s permission, to contact the biofeedback therapist to explain the nature of Leslie’s psychiatric diagnosis and to relay my request that care be exercised to prevent Leslie from going into trance states while in biofeedback therapy. As my staff explained, some of Leslie’s alters could be violent, and the biofeedback therapy environment was an inappropriate place for them to present themselves. The biofeedback therapist exhibited some understanding of multiple personality disorder and agreed to comply with my request.

Leslie, after returning from her first session of biofeedback, described an awkward meeting in which the biofeedback therapist expressed disbelief in the dissociative identity disorder (DID) diagnosis. Leslie thought this was unprofessional because the biofeedback therapist had never examined her psychologically, nor was she qualified to do so. After Leslie's next biofeedback session, she reported that the appointment had gone strangely. Leslie told me that her biofeedback therapist took considerable time to discuss Native American Indian religions and inquired about Leslie's own spiritual beliefs.

After Leslie's third session of biofeedback therapy, she reported that she had been "out" for at least 15 minutes while undergoing biofeedback. Leslie said that she entered a trance so deeply that her biofeedback therapist told her that it had taken an unexpectedly long time to return her to normal waking consciousness. I was dismayed at this news. This was precisely what the biofeedback therapist had been asked to avoid. Leslie and I spent our individual therapy time trying to explore what had occurred and to discover what had caused her to go into such a deep trance. Leslie told me that the last thing she could remember was that her biofeedback therapist said something, but Leslie could not remember what it was.

Immediately following our session, Leslie and I went to the scheduled therapy group. I was conducting this group for DID patients who were hospitalized on the adult psychiatric unit. The four patients who arrived for group therapy on this particular day were also all under my care for individual therapy. Leslie was somewhat reluctant to talk about her biofeedback experiences in the group, but I encouraged her to do so. She began to remember some of what the biofeedback therapist said to her before she went "out." Leslie recalled: "She kept saying 'feel the feelings,' and 'deeper and deeper,' and 'you will soon be cured.' "

One of the patients in the group, "Karen," expressed anger toward me for my continued questions of Leslie about what had happened. Karen said to me, "Don't say that. Don't say that."

I didn't understand her. "Don't say what, Karen?"

"Those words!" she said angrily.

I was still confused, "What words?"

"Deeper and deeper."

But by now, Karen was no longer visibly angry. She was, in fact, in a trance. I looked around the room. Everyone present was in a trance, everyone but myself. The room was completely quiet. The four group members stared, glassy-eyed, with their gazes directed downward toward the floor. I was amazed. In my 11 years of conducting group therapy, I had never witnessed anything like this.

I decided that if the group therapy were to continue, the participants would have to come out of this trance. It should have been easy to accomplish because, even though I rarely used hypnosis with DID patients, I was an experienced hypnotherapist and had never failed to bring a patient out of a trance that I had induced. Although I tried a variety of standard methods, I was unable to bring even one of the group members out of trance. The group session was discontinued. Two of the four patients were so dazed that they couldn't sit upright, and I had to call nursing staff to assist them to their beds. The other two patients were able to walk and went to sit in the unit's day room, but they were too mentally foggy to make sensible conversation.

Several hours later, all four patients appeared to have returned to a relatively normal state of consciousness. I went to each of them individually and privately to inquire about what had happened in the group. None of them seemed to know what had caused the group trance experience. Two of them could not even remember much of what had happened shortly before or after the trance took effect. Only one of them, Karen, appeared able to recount the events with some accuracy. She reiterated her anger toward me because of what she interpreted as my interrogation of Leslie. The words that Karen said bothered her were "deeper and deeper." She also indicated that she felt very sleepy when she heard those words repeated.

I wanted to test what Karen was saying to me, so I asked permission to use those words. She was initially reluctant but eventually agreed. I told her that I would use the words, but that she would not go into a trance. I would simply use the words in conversation, not in a hypnotic induction. I talked to her about her concerns about her financial condition and how she was getting deeper in debt. I inserted the word deeper into the conversation this way several times. Before I knew it, she was out.

What caused this reaction? I had clearly given her the suggestion that she would not be hypnotized, yet when she heard the words in question, she entered a trance state. I wondered if she had previous experience in hypnotherapy where a therapist had trained her to respond to those words with a trance. I asked her if she had ever participated in hypnotherapy. She groggily replied, “No.”

“Why are you in a trance now?” I asked.

Karen was silent for a while. Her eyes rolled upward and her eyelids fluttered for a while. I repeated my question. She spoke in a different voice identifying herself as four-year-old “Kathy.” Kathy said she could see people inside a house. The house was very dark. There were other people there who were wearing black robes with hoods covering their heads. She saw herself on a table, tied down. She was wearing a flimsy white cotton robe without a hood. She said that someone was cutting on her arm with a razor blade saying the words “deeper, and deeper, and deeper” with each painful stroke of the blade across her skin. She expressed an unmistakable feeling of terror. She said that she could see herself passing out not so much from the pain but mostly as a result of her overwhelming fear. Kathy told me that this had happened on several different occasions. She also reported experiences of sexual abuse in which her tormentors spoke the words “deeper, and deeper, and deeper” as she was sexually penetrated. She indicated that whenever Karen heard the words repeated, she would automatically enter a trance as a reaction to this repeated traumatic experience, something that she called “training.”

What Kathy described was not hypnosis as it is normally conceptualized as a result of repetitive suggestion to produce a trance. Instead, she revealed what appeared to be the results of classical conditioning[3] in which a trance response produced by trauma was paired with the words “deeper, and deeper, and deeper” until the words alone were able to elicit the trance response.[4]

I asked Kathy to help me bring Karen out again because my last effort had failed. Kathy said she was willing to help me. She offered, “All you need to do is say, ‘Karen I will count you down from 10 to 0, and when I reach 0, you will be fully awake, pain free and relaxed.’ ” This sounded like a standard hypnotic countdown procedure. Earlier when attempting to bring the group members out of the trance state, I had tried several similar methods but none of them had worked. Kathy explained that I had to use the exact words as she had stated them to me. Kathy said that Karen had been trained to respond specifically to those words and might not respond to other phrases that were worded too differently. I followed Kathy’s instructions, and Karen reappeared and resumed executive control of her mind and body.

I asked to see her arm where Kathy had said that cutting had occurred. Little scars were visible, but it was not clear to me that the scars were necessarily caused by the abuse that Kathy described. This patient had engaged in some self-mutilation in the past and it was possible that the scars were self-inflicted. I asked Karen what had caused the little scars on her arm, but she said that she did not know. I asked her if she had ever cut herself there, and she said, “Not to my knowledge.”

I asked Karen if she would not discuss what Kathy had said to me in the session that day with anyone else. She asked why, and I explained that I wanted to find out what each group member had experienced in session, and I did not want their views contaminated or influenced by one another, and so for that reason I wanted all to refrain from discussing it with each other. I especially did not want the other patients to know what Kathy had said to me because that might influence their reaction to a similar test of their responsiveness to the words and phrases. Karen agreed to my request. She also said that she did not remember much of what Kathy had revealed.

I met with each patient individually and requested permission to investigate what had earlier occurred in the group and each person agreed. I did not tell any of the individuals that I had talked to Karen’s Kathy nor what Kathy had discussed with me regarding the manner in which these words had been paired with trauma to produce a trance response. However, in each case, the patient in question went into a trance when I introduced some of the words and phrases into our conversations, but the patients each appeared oblivious to what was happening to them and could not initially explain why they were re-experiencing altered states of consciousness while we conversed.

Karen had specifically responded to the word deeper when it was used repetitively. Another patient responded most strongly to the phrase “feel the feelings” when it was stated repeatedly, and to a lesser degree she responded to “deeper” and “you will soon be cured.” One of the individuals became agitated when I used the phrase “you will soon be cured.” I asked her why, and she did not know. At a later date, an alternate identity in her system said that in her cult they would sometimes repeat the expression “You will soon be cured of your false virginity” in a sexual abuse ritual. All four patients responded with trance to either one or a combination of these terms and phrases and, to my surprise, they all awoke from the trance when I utilized the procedure described by the alternate identity, Kathy. However, when one of the four individuals emerged from trance, she was in a panic state. With tears in her eyes and a look expressing her mental anguish she said, “Don’t say pain free.” “Why?” I asked. At first she seemed puzzled as if she did not know. Then she blurted out, “Because that means we’ve been hurt.” With further inquiry, only two of the four patients could tell me why they were going into a trance (i.e., were able to identify the words and phrases to which they appeared to respond).

I was astonished at what I witnessed, but I thought that I should further cross-validate these findings. Science is based on the premise that valid knowledge can be acquired through careful observations that can be repeated or replicated. When replicated, results can be found with at least some consistency and they defy the chance or random variations in nature, then one can say that there is scientific support for a finding. However, in order to properly test these initial findings, I had to ensure that some alternative explanation could not account for the observed results. For example, if I had told the other three members of the group what Kathy had told me about the various effects of the words and phrases, it might have implanted the idea that they were supposed to respond in a particular way. By not telling them what I was doing or what I was looking for, I was getting results that were more likely to be free from the effects of suggestion.

I decided that in order to continue to test this particular effect, I should do so in an unobtrusive manner and with other individuals while observing their reactions. In the process I also discovered a variety of other specific signals that resulted in producing altered states of consciousness, physical immobility, and other peculiar responses in some patients. I found that most of these could be surreptitiously introduced into a normal conversation, resulting in mild to profound trance responses and other anomalies. On some occasions, these methods would bring out specific alternate identities, some of whom would appear ready to do anything asked of them. On some occasions, patients would go into such a deep trance as to appear to be in a coma-like state.

Once, during a therapy session, a female patient, “Jenny,” went into such a deep trance that her speech was barely audible. While in this state her body was limp and she drawled, “You can have me.” I asked her name and she identified herself as “Natasha.” She indicated that it was her job to sexually please any male who had the ability to access her. I told her that she would not have to do this anymore and that the decisions about her sexual behavior should not be made or carried out by any individual alternate identity but should be made by the whole person.[5]

The incident in the group therapy session is an example of what some survivors call a response to programming (as I later learned). The term programming is sometimes used in two ways in the context of cultism and mind control methods. Most commonly, the term refers to any coercive persuasion whether it is experienced in a destructive cult, an established religion, the armed services, or any other group or organization. A second use for this word is more specific, and I introduced it in 1993 in lectures on this subject. I have defined programming as “the manipulation or traumatization of alter personalities, fragments or other dissociated mental states or entities for the purpose of mind control” (Noblitt, 1993). Some patients and therapists refer to the stimuli that bring out particular and often programmed behaviors, moods, and states of consciousness as triggers.[6] These reported stimuli may be words (as previously described), sounds (e.g., tones, rhythmic patterns, a particular pitch, or sequence of pitches), visual cues (e.g., hand signals, colors), or tactile stimulation (touch patterns or designs on the skin). Some survivors state that virtually any stimulus can be used for the purpose of eliciting a preprogrammed response if that particular stimulus has been used previously as a signal for a repetitively traumatizing procedure.[7]

Could this really be possible? This was essentially the theme of the fictional novel (Condon, 1988) and motion picture (Axelrod & Frankenheimer, 1962), The Manchurian Candidate, in which a U.S. serviceman was portrayed as being programmed to kill the president.[8] But is there any nonfiction description of this phenomenon? In his book A Criminal History of Mankind, Colin Wilson (1984) wrote about a case that may illustrate this process. He described an account of a woman who traveled by train to Heidelberg, Germany, where she planned to consult with a physician regarding pain she was experiencing in her stomach. According to Wilson, she entered into a casual conversation with a man named Franz Walter, reportedly a “nature healer” who claimed he could cure her of her ailment. Apparently, Walter persuaded the woman to leave the train at one of the stations, purportedly for coffee.

> She was unwilling, but allowed herself to be persuaded. As they walked along the platform he took hold of her hand “and it seemed to me as if I no longer had a will of my own. I felt so strange and giddy.” He took her to a room in Heidelberg, placed her in a trance by touching her forehead, and raped her. She tried to push him away, but she was unable to move. “I strained myself more and more but it didn’t help. He stroked me and said, ‘You sleep quite deeply, you can’t call out, and you can’t do anything else.’ Then he pressed my hands and arms behind me and said: ‘You can’t move any more. When you wake up you will not know anything of what happened.’ ” . . . Later, Walter made her prostitute herself to various men, telling her clients the hypnotic word of command that would make her unable to move. And when she married, he made her attempt to kill her husband by various means. The latter became suspicious after her sixth attempt at murder—when his motor cycle brake cable snapped, causing a crash—and when he learned that she had parted with three thousand marks to some unknown doctor. The police came to suspect that she had been hypnotized, and a psychiatrist, Dr. Ludwig Mayer, succeeded in releasing the suppressed memories of the hypnotic session. In due course, Walter received ten years in prison. How did Walter bring her under his control so quickly and easily? (Wilson, 1984, p. 29)

Although Wilson poses the question, he offers no conclusive answer. He speculates that paranormal processes accounted for the apparent ability of Walter to induce such a powerful trance in this woman, presumably against her will. However, one of the “rules” of the logic of science is called parsimony. In science, we are required to explain phenomena in the simplest terms necessary to account fully for them. In other words, if we can explain these events in purely naturalistic (rather than supernatural) terms, we are obligated to do so. The procedure that I have already defined as programming can easily account for these trance states. In fact, the scenario described by Wilson is similar to many of the reports made by survivors of ritual abuse.[9] Their programming reportedly begins in early childhood and continues as long as the survivor is unable to resist being accessed or otherwise controlled by the programmers. Others who know how to access the survivor can then use triggering stimuli to induce a trance or call out alternate identities to do their bidding.

This may make sense to the reader except for the fact that Wilson’s description of this case does not indicate that Walter previously knew the woman he met on the train. For this reason, how could he know of her possible previous programming? According to my patients, some programmed responses are general and commonly used in a variety of cults (e.g., in the example I described earlier where all four members of the therapy group went into a trance). However, it is possible for an individual who understands the concepts underlying programming to identify cues that would affect the programmed person simply by talking to that individual and by observing his or her eyelid and other responses to potential triggers that are introduced unobtrusively. Patients with programming will often initially respond with eye blinks and a lowering of their gaze when effective access methods are presented. When the accessing method is repeated and becomes overwhelming to susceptible individuals, they will often close their eyes and sometimes show a fluttering response in their eyelids. Sometimes another alternate will present for the purpose of complying with the commands of the person who initiated this access procedure.

There are legends that tell of men who make a pact with the devil for the purpose of having relatively extensive sexual access to women (e.g., the story of Faust). The concept of programming with the potential for access may explain how there may be some truth to this legend. As cult members do the bidding of their cult leader, they can, in turn, be taught more about the procedures for accessing others and thus may be rewarded with increasing power and control over the minds of others who have also been programmed.

Other reports may illustrate this phenomenon further. Wilson (1988) describes a criminal trial in 1865 in which a beggar by the name of Timotheus Castellan was sentenced to 12 years in prison after being found guilty of raping a 26-year-old peasant woman named Josephine:

> Castellan had begged a night’s lodging from her father, a poor peasant, claiming to be a healer. . . . Over the midday meal Castellan made a sign with his fingers, as if dropping something on the girl’s plate, and she felt her senses leaving her. He carried her into the next room and raped her; she said she was conscious but unable to move. Later Castellan departed, taking her with him. At one farm where he stayed the night he demonstrated his power over her by making her crawl around on all fours like an animal and burst into peals of laughter. He was eventually arrested. (Wilson, 1988, p. 201)

Brian Inglis (1989) describes a 1988 court case in Wales in which an uncredentialed hypnotist, Michael Gill, used a device with flashing lights to hypnotize women who, while in this state, were allegedly raped by him.[10]

The three cited criminal cases illustrate instances in which women were sexually abused while in trance states that were induced powerfully and quickly, causing the women to lapse in their normal, self-protective behaviors.[11] Professional hypnotists and hypnotherapists have no such technology at their disposal.[12] Although I know of no large-scale study that has proved it, hypnotists commonly believe that one cannot hypnotize another individual to do anything against that person’s will or anything that violates that person’s conscience. In cult programming, however, the loss of the individual’s normal sense of executive control is commonly reported by survivors. Not only are such uncharacteristic responses reported, they can also be demonstrated in the consulting office. Although it would be unethical to deliberately provoke patients sexually, it is possible to generate the powerful trances with rapid onset and also to investigate other atypical behaviors that can be accessed by such techniques. Such phenomena have occurred on numerous occasions and have been witnessed by other therapists and by other patients when they have happened in group therapy sessions. I have also shown how this works in lectures, where an extreme abuse survivor volunteers, allowing me to demonstrate the accessing techniques as well as methods that discontinue the dissociative behaviors.

One patient wrote in her therapy journal an example of the process whereby some of her alters could be accessed:

Dim the lights

implement the countdown

insert information
repeat information several times (6) anoint the sense points (forehead, cheeks, throat) w/Blood enter this may cause anger if not done in a proper way have others stand by

Speak the words
“restrain thyself—show no resistance” (may need to be repeated)

> Breathing will slow
> When inputting information breathing will increase.
> Administer Nitro 1 tab > will create headache to assure confusion and block all other thought processes except for the one in which you wish to implement.
> “We offer our minds to you (our leader). Please accept our offering of sacrifice—ourselves.”[13]

For several years now, I have unobtrusively introduced stimuli (as I described earlier in Leslie’s case) into my consultations with patients in an effort to cross-validate the results described earlier[14] and in order to provide some objective procedure for assessing a given patient’s possible history of ritual abuse. I have found that some patients respond in a predictable way to specific triggering stimuli. I have observed similar behavioral and trance responses from patients in my practice who grew up in a wide variety of locations in the United States. I have, of course, had patients who did not respond to any of the techniques I used. On other occasions, some of the techniques have worked with some individuals, whereas other methods did not. I have also supervised other therapists who have used such techniques with their patients with similar outcomes. Other therapists refer patients to me for evaluation to assess the possibility of cult programming. Typically, I videotape these sessions so that the referring therapist, as well as the patient, can later observe the results of the evaluation.

In addition to observing what can only be described as idiosyncratic programmed responses to particular eliciting stimuli, it is notable that these patients recount similar histories of tormented childhoods involving sadistic and ritualized abuse. As my caseload grew, I saw more clients reporting such experiences. I learned that many of them have had no conscious awareness of previous interactions with one another, coming as they do from different geographical locations, cultural backgrounds, religions, socioeconomic strata, and different generations. Yet, despite the differences, these individuals share memories of the same or similar ritualized traumatic events, and they present with similar internalized systems of alternate identities.

Although the majority of my clients typically had no conscious memories of having previously known one another, it was curious that several of them switched to alternate identities and identified one another by cult names when speaking to me privately and individually. For example, on one occasion I was saying goodbye to a male patient diagnosed with DID and inviting the next patient, “Alice,” into my office. Once inside my office, Alice switched to a child alter who fearfully inquired, “Why do you have Robert James coming to see you? Don’t you know he’s very dangerous?” Because of patient confidentiality, I could not say anything about the male client with whom I had just visited. I could not even identify him as a patient. However, his real name was Robert Dale. Robert James was one of his secret cult names. How was it that Alice recognized him at all, much less identified him by his cult name, Robert James? To my knowledge, he had not told that name to anyone else—that is, no one outside his cult—and to my knowledge, he had never seen or met Alice before. He neither greeted her nor recognized that he knew her when they passed each other in the waiting room. Alice also identified three others of my clients, allegedly from rituals she had attended in childhood, two of them by secret cult names that were only known to me and, presumably, the cults where these individuals reportedly had been abused. Alice was also recognized by the alter identities of two other clients who, in private session, revealed that they had known each other from past cult experiences.

Some of my clients have complained of being “accessed” by other people whom they believe to be involved in destructive cults in which programming methods are understood and utilized. Some reported experiences where they received telephone calls or patterned knocks on their doors that have caused alter identities to emerge who were allegedly trained to acquiesce to anyone using that particular signal. This point leads us to the story of “Maggie.”

Maggie was estranged from her mother who she claimed was the high priestess of a satanic cult in a distant state. When she occasionally received mail from her mother, she would bring it to my office to open in the presence of staff because she feared that the mail could be provocative to the extent of precipitating strong suicidal urges. One day Maggie came to the office with a bulky envelope that was sealed and bore an out-of-state postmark. The return address on the envelope was the same as her mother’s. Maggie asked one of my staff to open the envelope because she feared what it might contain. The staff member could feel a cylindrical object through the paper and cautiously opened the envelope, allowing the contents to spill onto the surface of her desk. The contents included a folded piece of notebook paper, four photographs, and a hypodermic syringe containing one cc of a red, viscous liquid that looked like blood.

The four photographs looked like candid, amateur photos taken of a man, woman, and two children in four different poses. The letter appeared innocuous. It was a chatty letter addressed to Maggie from her mother, full of mundane items regarding family news. There was no explanation for the syringe. When Maggie saw the syringe, she went into a trance state. When she heard my voice as I stepped from my office, she lunged for the syringe and attempted to stab me with it. It took several staff members to subdue her and remove the syringe.

Eventually, Maggie dissociated with several alternates who explained that the pictures and the syringe were all triggers designed to influence or coerce Maggie to kill me.[15] She subsequently received other syringes through the mail, each with different levels of liquid. Unfortunately, we were unable to obtain any assistance from the police. The local police claimed there was no law against sending syringes with what appeared to be blood products through the mail. The postmaster concurred. No one within the city, county, or state government was even willing to analyze the liquid, and at the time neither Maggie nor I could afford to do so through a private laboratory. We were advised that we could consult the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), but Maggie was terrified of the prospect of FBI involvement because she feared it would mean her death. I dropped the matter in deference to Maggie's fears. Ultimately, Maggie was effectively desensitized to those triggers such that she no longer responded to them by-dissociating. However, she reported an additional disturbing situation that had occurred earlier.

Maggie said that she was abducted and tortured with electric shock, during which time she was instructed to kill me with a knife, mutilate my body, and take selected body parts back to her cult. According to her story, Maggie had attended a group therapy session with me and was prepared to stab me when the session ended. Maggie recalled that during the course of the group session, another patient said something that effectively canceled the alleged assassination program. Later in individual therapy, we discovered that Maggie's programming could temporarily be interrupted by using the word disarm.[16] Knowledge of that word became an important element in dealing with this highly volatile and violent client. One of the unfortunate realities of working with these patients is that some have a potential for violence. On some occasions I have been threatened but never injured. Many other therapists who work with this population report similar threats.

Evidence of exposure to deliberate and traumatic methods for inducing dissociation, and what I have described as programming, has been a near-universal characteristic of clients who report ritual abuse. They described programming procedures that they said had occurred in a variety of different environments, including destructive cults. Many of the cult experiences that were described were consistent with demon-worshipping groups,[17] but this is not always the case.[18] More recently I have had survivors of ritual abuse who have come to speak at the classes that I teach at my university. They all explained how deliberate programming was done with them. One of them allowed me to demonstrate my techniques while eliciting her dissociative responses.[19]

The African Connection

Like Leslie, “Sarah” began therapy in my private practice shortly after it was established. Sarah was a Caucasian woman of medium height with dark brown hair and penetrating dark brown eyes. When I first met her in an inpatient therapy group she said that I intimidated her a great deal. She also frequently complained about what she perceived to be my critical attitude toward her. She initially made this complaint before I had ever said anything to her. Actually, she was her own worst critic. Sarah felt that she was a bad and incompetent person and often flew into rages when she recognized some minor mistake she had made. Her anger was even more intense when she perceived that someone else was making similar critical judgments of her.

Sarah was initially referred for psychological counseling by her gynecologist and was assigned a female therapist for individual psychotherapy. She was diagnosed with borderline personality disorder, and when her condition periodically deteriorated, she was rehospitalized for suicidal acting out and self-mutilation. During her inpatient stays, she participated in group therapy sessions that I facilitated. On one occasion between hospitalizations when her individual therapist was out of town, Sarah called my office in a panic for an emergency consultation. She was feeling a strong impulse to cut herself. I agreed to see her but recommended that we videotape our meeting so that her individual therapist could later review our taped session. Sarah arrived at my office a short while later. The video camera was in place and ready to run. We began the session.

Sarah told me that she had a strong urge to cut herself. She recognized that this impulse was irrational, and she knew that if she seriously cut herself she would be hospitalized. She asserted loudly and in no uncertain terms that she did “not want to go into the hospital!” She was unable to explain her compulsion to harm herself other than saying, “I hate myself.” I thought that there must be more to the story, but she was unable to elaborate.

I asked Sarah to close her eyes and tell me what she could see inside her mind.[1] A moment after her eyes were shut, she told me that she could see “confusion.”

“What does the confusion look like?” I asked her.

“People.”

“What do you mean, people?”

“I see people in my head.”

“Tell me about the people.”

“They’re arguing.”

“Who are the people? Do you recognize them?”

“No, I don’t recognize them, but they’ve always been there.”

“Have you told your individual therapist about the people?”

“No. She didn’t ask and I was embarrassed to bring it up.”

“Why embarrassed?”

“She would think I was crazy!”

“What are the people arguing about?”

“Whether to kill me or not.”

“Do some of them want to kill you?”

“Yeah, especially one.”

“Tell me about the one who wants to kill you.”

“He’s really mean. He says he wants to cut me. And then he just laughs at me.”

“Who is he?”

“He says his name is ‘Damon’.”

Before I knew it, Damon assumed control of Sarah’s speech and began talking to me. I was relieved that the video camera was on because I didn’t know if Sarah would later remember the session. (Some clients are evidently co-conscious for such dissociative experiences, although others are not.) Damon told me that “he” enjoyed hurting Sarah and that “she deserved it.” Damon took credit for other occasions when Sarah had been cut and was later rushed to the emergency room.

As we talked, I learned that Damon was a male adolescent alter who first came into existence when Sarah was being sexually abused earlier in her life. According to Damon, he had been created by Sarah's mind[2] to protect her from this abuse. However, Damon had reportedly been unable to effectively fight off Sarah's assailants and since that time, Damon had taken out his rage on Sarah rather than on Sarah's perpetrators. It was eventually possible to create something of an alliance with Damon, and he agreed to a temporary moratorium on the self-mutilation. I was happy with this outcome. Together, we had been able to avert another psychiatric hospitalization while keeping Sarah safe from self-injury.

When Sarah watched the videotape, she was astonished. Although the name Damon seemed familiar, she had no memory of Damon taking executive control during our session. She invited her husband, who was in the waiting room, to come to my office and watch the tape along with her. Upon viewing the tape, her husband did not seem surprised. With the numerous instances of strange and bizarre behavior that Sarah had displayed throughout their married life, he believed that they had never gotten an adequate psychiatric explanation. The strange events on the videotape explained other incidents that he had observed at home, and so, ironically, he received some consolation that progress was finally being made. Sarah said that she wanted to transfer her therapy to my care. I told Sarah that I would rather she talk to her usual therapist and get her therapist's recommendation before she made any sudden decisions.

I provided the videotape to Sarah's individual therapist, who wasn't pleased. She said that she had no experience with clients who dissociated and felt that she could no longer follow her client. I offered to provide occasional consultation to assist them in their work together, but Sarah's therapist decided instead to terminate her relationship with Sarah. I talked to Sarah's psychiatrist, and he was also unhappy with what had transpired. He refused to even look at the videotape of Sarah's session with me. He insisted that Sarah did not, and could not, have a dissociative disorder. Sarah's psychiatrist was in training to be a Jungian analyst. He told me that it is normal for people to have "inner people" and he mentioned John Rowan's (1990) book Subpersonalities: The People Inside Us, and he also discussed some other concepts regarding dissociation from a Jungian point of view. I was appreciative of the information he provided to me but disappointed that he was unwilling to consider that this patient might really have a dissociative disorder and that he would not even take the time to examine the evidence.

At that time I did not know much about the contributions of Carl Jung or John Rowan to the topic of dissociation. I began reading more about Jung's theory of what he called complexes and archetypes. He had studied under Pierre Janet during the winter of 1902–1903. "What Jung called 'complex' was originally nothing but the equivalent of Janet's 'subconscious fixed idea' " (Ellenberger, 1970, p. 406). I was surprised to find Jung's description of his own dissociation of identity in his autobiographic Memories, Dreams, Reflections (1961).[3]

From Rowan's book I learned that the idea of subpersonalities could be traced, in part, to Jung's theory, as well as to the Italian psychiatrist Roberto Assagioli (1975). Rowan presented the concept that people normally have a variety of inner roles or identities that may be, to some degree, dissociated from one another.[4] Rowan indicated that the presence of subpersonalities was not indicative of multiple personality disorder, which he described as being a more severe manifestation of personality dissociation. However, from reading his book, it was not clear to me where one would draw the line between the two. Further, it was not entirely clear that subpersonalities were, as Rowan argued, normal facets of one's personality.[5] For example, he cited another author (Schwartz, 1987) who was impressed with a bulimic client partly because the voices she described in her head were somewhat like the voices in his own head. Richard Noll (1993) has described "the all-too-real, almost audible, internal dialogue that babbles incessantly on and on in many of us, and is especially pronounced in times of great moral conflict" (p. 250). Are incidents of hearing voices that are not objectively present a normal experience? Mental health professionals have historically categorized such phenomena as hallucinations and symptomatic of psychoses, especially schizophrenia. Perhaps this question should receive further research.[6] Unfortunately, Jungian concepts did not help my understanding of Sarah's predicament.[7] As I was later to learn, Sarah had problems of an entirely different nature.

Sarah began to experience and enact a variety of different alternate identities in our sessions. Like the other clients diagnosed with dissociative identity disorder, Sarah had a quite a few different alters who would periodically take executive control in our sessions and would sometimes have conversations with me. Before too long, some of Sarah's alter identities began to describe sexual abuse by an uncle. Some of the abuse reportedly occurred in an abandoned house not far from where she lived during her childhood. Over time, Sarah said that during the abuse other people wearing robes and chanting to Satan were present. She began to have alters emerge that appeared to be enforcers (Marmer, 1980) of the perpetrators' demands to submit, never talk, and forget. These alters took credit for injuring her body or threatening harm, particularly when the perpetrators' rules were not followed.[8]

It took considerable effort to negotiate with the numerous alters that emerged in therapy. There were children, teenagers, and adults, both male and female. A couple of animal alters were identified. An alternate who believed herself to be a 17th-century witch presented herself. There were a variety of satanic alters, those who remembered being victimized in the rituals, those who believed they were the abusers, priests and priestesses, and entities who believed that they were demons. Much work went into addressing their narratives of abuse and her ability to appropriately express and experience the feelings they had become dissociated during these traumatic incidents.

I encountered, however, an entirely different category of alters. Sarah began to describe abuse in several different cults for which she attributed the general label, voodooism. Although Sarah denied having any knowledge of voodooism, a number of her alters claimed that they had extensive knowledge and experience with the subject. They explained to me that Sarah had been forced to participate in rituals in three different voodoo sects. The first one, they said, was of Dahomean origins. The second was associated with a cult that followed the traditions of the Yoruba tribe of Africans (who reside in present-day Nigeria). The third was what the alters called "Haitian voodoo," which, they explained, was an amalgam of the first two combined with other influences. These alters described the various pantheons of gods and goddesses associated with these sects in detail. Much of the information was written in Sarah's journal. They discussed rituals that were just as grizzly and shocking as those recounted by her satanically abused alters.

When the alternate identities were no longer present and Sarah resumed executive control, I asked her if the alters' allegations were true. Sarah said she had no idea. She reiterated that she knew nothing about voodooism and seemed skeptical that her alters could have so much detailed knowledge about a subject that was basically alien to her.

Voodoo was also something about which I knew little. It appeared that I needed to become more familiar with the subject, and so I began to read about the topic. In the meantime, Sarah made a trip to New Orleans, where she purchased some books in order to check the accuracy of what the alters had written in her journal. She was, however, too anxious to read the books in New Orleans and waited until she had returned to the Dallas area to do so. To her horror, the books supported what the alters claimed about the rituals and gods of this old African-derived religion.

Through my own research I learned that some authors prefer the term vodoun[9] as a more accurate or more respectful name for this religion. To further confuse things, people sometimes incorrectly use the term voodoo or vodoun in referring to any “primitive” (or, preferably, the less value-laden term, preindustrial) magic or sorcery-oriented religion.[10] Vodoun specifically refers to the African-derived cult or religion that is a syncretism of French Catholicism superimposed over a core of beliefs derived primarily from the Fon people of Dahomey (who currently reside in the African nation of Benin).[11] Although vodoun is historically from Africa, it is not an indigenous African religion. The term juju[12] is sometimes used to describe an indigenous religion of Western Africa (Oke, 1989) that may be related to vodoun. Vodoun has thrived primarily in the Americas in areas that were colonized by the French and where Africans were subjected to slavery; for example, Louisiana (Tallant, 1990) and Haiti (Deren, 1991; Rigaud, 1985). However, vodoun has been reportedly practiced in other parts of the world, including other islands of the Caribbean; the southeastern United States, including the environs of Charleston, South Carolina; and cities in the north where African Americans emigrated to escape slavery, racial hatred, and violence. According to Rigaud (1985), vodoun rituals have also been practiced in Galveston, Texas. My own clients described vodoun rites occurring in Louisiana and East Texas. Luhrmann (1989) reported that vodoun ceremonies have occurred in London. Elsewhere in the United States, especially within some African American communities, there are traditions involving an eclectic mixture of magical beliefs called hoodoo (Haskins, 1978).

A number of reputable scholars have investigated vodoun and similar related phenomena. For example, the eminent Harvard physiologist Walter

B. Cannon (1942) researched this subject and reported his findings in a paper "Voodoo Death." Cannon was interested in investigating claims that voodoo practitioners could bring on a person's death through ritual magic (e.g., bone pointing). Unfortunately, Cannon incorrectly used the term voodoo in reference to several different sorcery-oriented religions that existed in a variety of preindustrial, or "Third World," communities, including African and Polynesian cultures. However, Cannon did record sufficient accounts from people he believed to be reputable witnesses and concluded that some victims of voodoo curses did die afterward. As one might expect, Cannon, in the tradition of modern science, did not seriously consider the possibility that supernatural forces were responsible. Instead, he offered a variety of more conventional explanations for these deaths, including the possibility that some individuals who had been cursed may have deeply believed that death was imminent and may have stopped taking proper care of themselves.[13] At the time that Cannon wrote his paper, there was not much known about dissociation of identity and how alters could be triggered to do self-harm in response to a particular signal. This last explanation might also account for these deaths and would be a consideration for further study.

The anthropologist and ethnobotanist Wade Davis investigated vodoun practices in Haiti and described them in his book The Serpent and the Rainbow (Davis, 1985). His research was intended to study the pharmacology of substances associated with vodoun rites and the alleged power of vodoun priests to resurrect dead persons as zombies. Davis examined the hypothesis that the so-called zombie phenomena were the result of ingested drugs that produced deathlike symptoms and appearance but did not actuality kill the victim. Continuing with this premise, such a "dead" person might later be revived, and supernatural power might then be attributed to the individual doing the "healing." Davis did find some evidence for his hypothesis, but he also discovered mystical, ominous, and secretive subcultures that practiced these rituals and ceremonies.[14]

A curious observation about vodoun appeared in two publications by the prominent psychiatrists Herbert and David Spiegel (Spiegel, 1974; Spiegel & Spiegel, 1978). The focus of these comments was not primarily concerned with vodoun. Instead, the authors' writings discussed some personality characteristics that they believed were associated with highly hypnotizable subjects. They identified one such characteristic, "a fixed personality core," characterized by the subject's entrenched ideas that were not challengeable by logic or observation. They related an anecdote about a Haitian native:

> An amusing illustration in a sociological aspect was provided by a Haitian native. When asked what the distribution of the different religious beliefs in Haiti is, he replied without hesitation: "70 percent Catholics, 20 percent Protestants, and 95 percent Voodoo." In sum, this is an illustration of the hard core non-negotiability. (Spiegel & Spiegel, 1978, p. 320)

Unfortunately, the Spiegels may be missing the point behind this Haitian's narrative. Vodoun is apparently practiced by individuals who also consider themselves to be Christians.[15] How is this done? It is accomplished through syncretization and dissociation on the part of the vodoun follower. It is the same with Santeria, in which Catholic ceremonies are overtly followed and saints are ostensibly prayed to, but in actuality some element of the worship is really directed toward the African gods.

Vodoun is a possession cult with specific liturgical components: A houngan is a vodoun priest, and his female counterpart is a mambo. The vodoun sorcerer is sometimes called a bokor. The vodoun temple is called an oumphor, and its altar or altar stone is the pé. The peristyle is a partly enclosed courtyard that in the middle has a center post, the poteau-mitan. According to Rigaud (1985), the oumphor "closely resembles the design used by Moses to build the Ark of the Covenant and the tabernacle described in Exodus" (p. 14). Furthermore, according to Rigaud (1985):

> In the Voodoo tradition Moses was initiated into Voodoo and perfected his knowledge as a student of the black Midianite teacher Ra-Gu-El Pethro (Jethro). The Tradition relates that Moses became the husband of Pethro's daughter Sephora, who bore two mulatto sons by him: Gershom whose name means I dwell in a foreign country, and Eli-Ezer, whose name means Help of God. The tradition goes on to say that Aaron and Miriam, the brother and sister of Moses, complained that he never should have married a black, and so to please them Moses finally repudiated Sephora. When Moses built the first Hebrew temple, according to the Voodooists, he planted his staff in the place occupied by the poteau-mitan in the oum'phor. The gods of Voodoo were so angry at Moses' repudiation of Sephora and Voodoo, according to the tradition, that they "struck Miriam with white leprosy." (p. 14)

There has been some controversy as to whether human torture or sacrifice ever occurs in any vodoun rituals. According to Tallant (1974), there is not much evidence that human sacrifice has ever been performed in vodoun rituals in Louisiana. Nevertheless, my client Sarah reported that she had been present at rituals in Louisiana involving torture, human sacrifice, and ritual cannibalism. Other clients subsequently reiterated Sarah's claims in that they also described abusive and traumatizing vodoun rituals.

Rigaud's (1985) account indicated that some vodoun followers in Haiti did practice ritual acts of human violence in what have been called the red sects. Like Christianity or any other religion, vodoun consists of a variety of smaller sects that differ from one another in some particular aspects of belief, ritual, or tradition. One of the larger of the red sects is the Petro sect (Deren, 1991; Gersi, 1991; Rigaud, 1985), which apparently is known for its violent rituals. The specific subgroups of vodoun practitioners who engage in abusive rituals are also likely to be more secretive and represent a more closed society.[16] Tannahill (1975) cites a report by Sir Spenser St. John, the British consul general in Haiti during the 1860s, who witnessed a criminal case in which eight people were convicted for participating in a human sacrifice ritual.

Efforts to learn about New World vodoun also led us to explore the subject of indigenous African religions. We found E. E. Evans-Pritchard's book Witchcraft Oracles and Magic among the Azande (1980) to be useful and instructive. This work presented a methodical and detailed account of the beliefs, customs, and rituals associated with an African tribal confederacy in East Africa. The Worlds of a Maasai Warrior, by Saitoti (1986), depicted the spiritual beliefs and life experiences of the author as he grew up in an East African herding community. Lucy Mair's (1971) Witchcraft and Parrinder's (1970) Witchcraft: European and African discussed aspects of sorcery and witchcraft that are common features of African native religions offering some comparisons with European lore, traditions, and accounts of witchcraft. Parallel Worlds by Gottlieb and Graham (1993) presented a personal account of the authors' experience living in a West African village, observing the culture, spiritual beliefs, and rituals while coping with the secrecy, distrust, and ambivalence of the local villagers.

Indigenous healing practices are component features of African village life. The word muti comes from the Zulu language and is used to refer to the indigenous medicine healing of South Africa. Many methods of indigenous healing consider wellness to be the result of balancing the spiritual forces that are thought to influence the patient. This is often accomplished through the use of herbal remedies that are believed to block or activate particular spiritual processes essential to healing. Amputated body parts are believed to possess spiritual power, and there is a thriving practice in South Africa involving the murder of adults and children whose body parts can be used in magical rituals. These rituals may be done for a variety of purposes, including healing, but in other circumstances the intent is entirely malignant.[17]

However, of all the literature available on indigenous African religions, Blood Secrets, by Isiah Oke (1989), most directly addressed the question of ritual abuse. The author recounted his upbringing as the grandson and successor of an important babalorisha, or juju high priest, in West Africa. Oke described the traumatizing ceremonies he underwent in his training to be a high priest and the ordeals he was required to inflict on others, including an act of ritual torture and murder. He related what appeared to be common experiences of dissociation (although he did not use that term) in the community as he illustrated instances of significant memory loss as well as accounts of spirit possession among his fellow villagers.

According to Oke (1989): “Our rituals are designed to appease the most horrid of our gods. And—because those gods are so fearsome—so must be the rituals: We believe that nothing better appeases the fierce spirits of juju than blood” (p. 19). Oke explained that although the religion of juju is practiced openly in West Africa, there is a side to it where the “secrecy is so complete that one might almost say there is another religion, unknown to the outside world, inside the religion of juju” (p. 19).[18] He described the open and relatively benign ceremony that occurs in the public Temple:

> But there is another sacrificial place, usually well out in the forest, far from prying eyes and ears, that we call the Shrine. It is usually no more than a hut in a hidden clearing in what we call the igbo-awo (the secret forest). What is performed here is not the innocuous ceremony, but rather the gruesome and bloody ritual. (p. 19)

Oke explained that blood rituals are a common aspect of juju, and he speculated that the prevalence of these rituals may have something to do with the high incidence of AIDS among the entire African population (not just among gay males and intravenous drug users). Although Oke did not mention it, it may not be a mere coincidence that AIDS is also prevalent in Haiti,[19] given that Haiti is a center for the related cult of vodoun. Oke wrote that among his countrymen, there is a practice of infant sacrifice, but there is an even more prevalent custom of discarding unwanted babies to die of exposure or fall prey to predators. This typically occurs not for ceremonial purposes but simply to free the mother from the burden of caring for the child. According to Oke, Western demographers have mistakenly overattributed Africa’s high infant mortality rate to poor dietary and health conditions when the problem of “baby dumping” and sacrifice are also significant factors.

Another author who reiterated some of Oke’s observations regarding African religion is Malidoma Somé (1993, 1994). Somé is a West African and a scholar in the Western sense, holding doctoral degrees from both the Sorbonne and Brandeis University. Although Somé has been an advocate for his religion, he emphasized its use of secrecy and fear. He described rituals in which people appeared to be speaking in different voices with different identities. He noted that the priests who conduct the rituals were able to affect the minds of others present so that they were typically unable to recall the events that had transpired. He explained the case of a tribesman who offered to reveal secrets of the cult to outsiders, but before being able to do so, reportedly experienced a psychotic episode and committed suicide.

Such accounts are similar to those of survivors of ritual abuse in the United States who indicate that they feel their mind is blocked or “shut down” as they try to remember the details of their abuses or who feel particularly self-destructive when they are about to tell or have already told some of the secrets. In the United States, this enforcement of inner secrecy is accomplished by the procedure sometimes called programming.[20] As previously mentioned, programming has nothing to do with the supernatural. It is a form of classical conditioning that involves creating and manipulating conditioned responses to trauma.[21]

Sargant (1974) described the personality transformation, dissociation, amnesia, and programming associated with an orisha[22] cult, the ritual practices of which were carried out in what the author called a “convent”:

> Pierre Verger himself has become a priest of the Orisha cult, so he could not tell me about many of the secret ceremonies that took place in the convent. But he was able to say that it was a severe brainwashing process in which the normal personality is replaced by a new personality. The postulant is never permitted to remember his normal personality, what he was like and how he behaved as his former self. But when he leaves the convent he is given back his old personality by a special process, and has little memory of what happened during his time in the convent. People go back into the convent from time to time and by the same hypnotic process revert to their god-like personality, to emerge once more with their ordinary personality when they return to the outside world. (p. 149)

A variety of other cults may have evolved in part from African juju. In the Spanish-speaking cultures of the Caribbean and North and South America, there are sects that go by such names as Santeria, Abaqua, Palo Mayombe, Palo Monte, and Obeah. Native to Brazil is Macumba, a general term that can be subdivided further into more specific sects: Candomblé, Umbanda, Batuque, and Quimbanda. It is beyond the scope of this chapter to attempt to describe them all in detail, but some brief comments about Santeria, Palo Mayombe, and Macumba should be made along with a few words about Brujeria, even though it is not technically of African origin.

In Santeria: An African Religion in America (1988), Joseph Murphy narrated his experiences observing and participating in Santero practices in the Bronx, New York. Murphy presented his view that the sensationalized media reports of cruel ritual practices sometimes associated with Santeria were inaccurate and reflected cultural biases and prejudices. He wrote that ceremonies involving the blood sacrifice of animals were always conducted in a humane manner and that the animals were killed quickly and later eaten. He made no mention of any rituals where humans are harmed but described an emotionally warm and supportive sense of community among these people. However, Murphy admitted that he was both a neophyte and an outsider who was not immersed in the beliefs and inner traditions of Santeria. As mentioned earlier, other authors have described incremental levels of secrecy with increasingly higher involvement in violent rituals in some of the African and African-derived cults.

Garrison (1977) observed that in New York City, the traditions of the African-derived Santeria had become intermixed with the beliefs and practices of curandismo and Espiritismo, the latter two reportedly being of more European American derivation. However, the “great majority of those who attend spiritist centros in both area surveys and in the centro client sample report their religion as Roman Catholic” (Garrison, 1977, p. 395). This parallels what was previously stated regarding vodoun practitioners who typically consider themselves Christians. Garrison also wrote about how experiences of possession were categorized and interpreted in this amalgamous sect.

Migene Gonzalez-Wippler (1984, 1987, 1992) is a scholarly author who has written about Santeria, describing it as another possession cult primarily derived from the African religion practiced by the Yoruba tribe of Nigeria. As was mentioned previously in this chapter, Isiah Oke, a Yoruban and former high priest of his native African religion, described ritual murder as an intrinsic component of his cult. However, Gonzalez-Wippler refuted that any element of such “black magic” practices were normally a part of Santeria.[23] The author did concede, however, that abusive and violent acts were common in Palo Mayombe, a possession cult derived from the Bantus of the Congo tribes. The alleged malignancy and violence associated with Palo Mayombe was reiterated by Detectives Pat Metoyer of the Los Angeles Police Department and Jim Bradley of the Washington, D.C., Metropolitan Police Department in interviews conducted by Larry Kahaner (1988).

The practices of Santeria and Palo Mayombe have been associated with the drug cult led by Adolfo Constanzo at the Santa Elena ranch outside Matamoros, Mexico, across the border from Brownsville, Texas. There is evidence that ritual murders occurred in the vicinity, and the remains of 15 bodies and numerous artifacts of Santeria and Palo Mayombe were discovered (Kilroy, 1990). In a thoroughly researched account by Carl Raschke (1990), the author also pointed out that the sadistic and ceremonial murders committed by Constanzo showed the influence of Brujeria,[24] an Hispanic form of black magic derived from Aztec blood rituals. In addition to the material evidence, some of Constanzo’s accomplices confessed, providing eyewitness accounts of their ritualistic activities and descriptions of the occult beliefs:

> The Hernandezs’ confessed to the murder of Kilroy and began to reveal all about the workings of the cult and its leaders. They fingered Adolfo de Jesus Constanzo, as well as a Brownsville college student named Sarra Villareal Aldrete. She acted as the “high priestess” of the group. . . . Aldrete was an honors student by day at Texas Southmost College and a narcotraficante by night. At her home in Matamoros, police came across an assortment of “voodoo” paraphernalia and a blood-splattered altar of sacrifice. Aldrete’s neighbors, her classmates, and her teachers naturally expressed astonishment and dismay. . . . Aldrete, however, had fled the scene of the crime along with Constanzo and there was much talk about her . . . “multiple personalities.” (Raschke, 1990, p. 11)

Despite the abundance of evidence,[25] some writers (Green, 1991) have chosen to discount the sadistic and occult religious practices of Constanzo and his accomplices. However, the nature of the murders of Kilroy and the other victims, the particular mutilations perpetrated on them, and even the manner of their burials were steeped in occult traditions. To better understand this, one needs to consider the significance of death and the use of body parts in ritual magic (e.g., our earlier discussion of muti murders).

At least one of my other clients reported experiencing cult abuse while living in Brazil. Sarah also alleged abuse by a group located in Louisiana that reportedly used the term Macumba to describe its practices. Macumba, or santuario, is a general term for the Brazilian version of Santeria. Both belief systems are primarily traceable to the Yoruban religion. They have essentially the same gods with the same legends. There are only minor differences in the spellings of their names along with the expected regional variations in status and idiosyncratic characteristics that the particular gods have to the local believers. According to Guiley (1989), Macumba has been sometimes erroneously equated with black magic, but such malevolent practices are more correctly specifically associated with the sect of Quimbanda.[26] The French author and photographer Serge Bramley (1977) wrote about the secretiveness that Brazilians have about Macumba, yet reported on its prevalence. For example, Bramley stated that on December 31, 1975, there were an estimated one million participants in the festival for the Macumba goddess Iemanja in the city of Rio de Janeiro alone. Seth and Ruth Leacock (1975) describe the encantados, who are believed to be important spirits of the Batuque religion, an Afro-Brazilian cult. When a person is possessed by an encantado, harm is sometimes self-inflicted while in the possessed state if that person has broken any of the rules of the cult.[27]

Sarah was my first client to clearly identify that ritual abuse could be conducted in the manner of African-derived cults. After her, however, a number of other clients reported similar experiences.

CHAPTER 9

Other Cultures

Coincidentally, with our efforts to learn more about African-derived cults we began to study other cultures. Some clients reported abuse in rituals associated with other cultures, including those of Native Americans, Hawaiians, and Australian Aborigines that appeared similar to Sarah's (see Chapter 8) accounts of traumatizing vodoun ceremonies. The clients describing these incidents substantiated their having lived (although sometimes temporarily) in the locations where the abuse reportedly occurred.

One of the classic anthropological works by the eminent scholar Clyde Kluckhohn (1962) addressed Native American occult practices. Kluckhohn was president of the American Anthropological Association in 1947 following the 1944 publication of what many considered to be his finest work, Navaho Witchcraft (republished in 1962). Kluckhohn noted the extreme degree of secrecy associated with Navaho ritual magic and the reluctance of these Native Americans to discuss the subject with outsiders. After extensive time was spent collecting data from interviews with the Indians, Kluckhohn concluded: "There seems to be clear evidence that witchcraft is practiced—we as yet have no scientific certainty as to frequency or as to whether all the types which are described in words are indeed actualized in deeds" (Kluckhohn, 1962, p. 56).[1]

It was surprising to learn the extent to which abusive rituals were documented in diverse cultures throughout history. According to Terje Oestigaard (2000), research fellow at the Centre for Development Studies at the University of Bergen: "Sacrifice of both living and dead humans was a common practice" (p. 54). In addition to the Moche (Davies, 1981; Sutter & Cortez, 2005; Swenson, 2012), the Incas (Andrushko, Buzon, Gibaja, McEwan, Simonetti, & Creaser, 2011; Reinhard & Ceruti, 2005; Wilson et al., 2007), the Mayans (Davies, 1981; Lemonick, 1993; Romney, 2005; Schele & Miller, 1986, Tompkins, 1990), and the Aztecs (Davies, 1981; Markman & Markman, 1992; Pennock, 2012; Tompkins, 1990) demonstrated a history and clear archeological evidence of ceremonial acts of violence. If one carefully scrutinizes the subject, it becomes apparent that human sacrifice was also part of Europe's heritage.[2] It is a shared legacy in human history. Several of my clients alleged being abused in what they believed were Native American ritual ceremonies. One of the clients identified a specific cult using the term shamas.

The topic of shamanism is receiving increasing scholarly attention. In the article "Shamanisms Today" published in the Annual Review of Anthropology, Jane Atkinson (1992) wrote that "just a few decades ago, shamanism appeared to be a dead issue in American anthropology" (p. 307). Atkinson (1992) cited Taussig, who opined that:

> Shamanism is . . . a made-up, Modern Western category, and artful reification of disparate practices, snatches of folklore and overarching folklorizations, residues of long-established myths intermingled with the politics of academic departments, curricula, conferences, journal juries [and] funding agencies. (p. 307)

In spite of Taussig's criticism of the subject, Atkinson presented a scholarly and thoroughly researched account of the subject in a prestigious anthropological publication. She concurred with Holmberg's (1983) observation that there really is no single unified shamanism per se but that there are a plurality of shamanisms, each with its own individual variations. Thomas DuBois (2011) noted there was a growing trend in shamanism scholarship:

> Today, in the year 2010, one can see that the trends Atkinson noted have only continued to grow in importance, with valuable research ongoing within a number of different theoretical frameworks and a marked increase in scholarly and popular publication venues, including new presses and journals and a bourgeoning internet presence for shamanic topics. (p. 100)

Two of the classic scholarly works on shamanism that are frequently cited are Mircea Eliade's (1964) Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy and Michael Harner's (1990) The Way of the Shaman. According to Harner and Eliade, shamans are essentially what Westerners call "witch doctors" and "medicine men." They describe shamanism as a primordial system of healing, spiritual revelation, and the exercise of "spiritual power" practiced since prehistoric times. It is distinguishable from witchcraft and sorcery (e.g., Guiley, 1989) and the possession cults (e.g., Oesterreich, 1966),[3] although Harner (1990) specifically identifies some as “warrior shamans” who may also be correctly called sorcerers.[4] The shaman is an individual who is able to attain a ritual trance state, often with the aid of drums, chanting, and ceremonial dancing. Sometimes sleep deprivation and/or the ingestion of mind-altering drugs facilitate these dissociated mental states.

While in a trance, the shaman purportedly enters a “parallel” spirit world, resulting in visions that allow him to diagnose health conditions. He may offer interpretations or make judgments about other problems, including legal disputes. In shamanism, cures are not usually achieved by giving the person seeking treatment drugs as much as the shaman himself may take a drug to alter his own consciousness. In such a state, the shaman believes himself able to confront and negotiate with spiritual forces, or to recover the sick person’s lost soul in the “spirit world” to effect the desired cure. Within this belief system, these tasks are sometimes accomplished with the aid of spiritual entities sometimes called a “guardian spirit” and one or more “spirit helpers.”

Not all shamans limit their craft to benevolent activities, and some may also dabble in sorcery or witchcraft invoking the “dark” or malevolent spiritual forces when needed. Huxley (1989) distinguished between what he called “black” shamanism and “white” shamanism that represented evil versus benign practices. Wright (1957) made a similar observation regarding the benevolent healers, curanderos and the malevolent feiteceiros among the Native American Amazon witch doctors. In his book The Shaman and the Magician, Drury (1987) noted a variety of similarities between traditional shamanic practices and selected features of modern ritual magic such as may be seen in the occult, quasi-Masonic organization, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

An important question regarding shamanism is whether these groups engage in abusive or traumatizing ritual practices. How do shamans obtain their “spirits”? We have hypothesized that these “spirits” are dissociated identities. It is conceivable that they could be produced by rituals whose net effect is repeated self-hypnosis. Some rituals are not traumatic. Other rituals are traumatic and those that involve repeated, circumscribed trauma would be expected to produce fierce, intrusive alters that could be easily mistaken for demons. This conclusion has been supported by the narratives of several clients who reported ritual abuse in possession cults (e.g., Sarah's abuse through the use of vodoun rituals).

In his book The Way of the Shaman, Harner (1990) was not entirely clear about how these spiritual entities come to be part of the shaman's inner psychological world. According to Harner, the guardian spirit may come to the shaman after a serious illness or this spirit may be deliberately encountered during a ritual exercise he calls a vision quest. In his book, terms like "another identity" (p. 43), "alter ego" (p. 43), and "another self " (p. 59) were used in reference to the guardian spirit. De Martino (1972) used the expressions "dual personality" and "second personality" (p. 85) in describing the experience of coming in contact with such an entity. Obviously, these terms could also appropriately refer to alter personalities.

However, one observable difference between DID and possession cults on the one hand, and shamanism on the other, is that in shamanism there is sometimes no complete "possession" by the spirit. Shamans may go into a possession trance but the possessing entity does not necessarily "take over" the shaman's functioning. The experience has often been described as an "inner journey" wherein the shaman attempts to communicate with spirits. This kind of mental functioning may be more similar to the DSM-5 category, other specified dissociative disorder, dissociative trance, although it needs to be noted that dissociative trance "is not a normal part of a broadly accepted collective cultural or religious practice" (APA, 2013, p. 307).

Harner (1990) added that there are "involuntary ways" (p. 43) whereby a person may obtain a guardian spirit, although he did not specify how this would be accomplished. Later in his book, he explained that the Jivaro tribe commonly gave their newborn infants a hallucinogenic drug for the purpose of assisting in the process of the child's producing a guardian spirit. After briefly mentioning the practice of drugging newborns, he indicated that there are other involuntary ways whereby children may acquire guardian spirits, but he did not describe these methods either.

In his book The Occult: A History, Colin Wilson (1971) argued that traumatization is part of the shaman's training. "The shaman himself has achieved his priesthood through the most terrifying ordeals, an initiation through pain" (p. 147). According to Gersi (1991), "becoming a shaman takes years of painful initiations. I have heard that many neophytes die from the hardships involved. The neophyte experiences the worst physical and psychological torments—even madness” (p. 45). Eliade (1964) also presented the view that shamanistic initiation involves traumatizing ordeals in which the initiate returns to the village with what appears to be memory loss to the extent that basic living skills must be relearned and the individual is given a new name.[5]

Ritual cannibalism has also been attributed to some shamanic practices. Ritual cannibalism is presumably a traumatizing experience both for the victims before they die, as well as for those who survive the ritual. According to R. D. Jamison (1984):

> The generally reliable account of the Cambridge expedition to the Torres Straits reported that sorcerers ate the flesh of corpses or mixed the flesh of corpses with their food when they were out to practice their art. The consequence was that they became violent and, when angered, committed murder. Too little is known of the steps taken to induce the shamanist trance except to note at cannibalism in this instance promoted the consumer to an inhuman or superhuman state. (p. 189)

The major motion picture from some years ago, A Man Called Horse (Silverstein & Howard, 1985), also depicted traumatic shamanistic practices. This movie portrayed a captive White man enslaved by a Sioux tribe. Once he proved his prowess as a hunter and earned respect from the tribe, he was allowed to participate in a torturous tribal ritual initiation. The ceremony entailed his suspension by ropes attached to claws inserted into his pectoral muscles. In this fictional account, the White man enters a trance during this torture, apparently in response to his suffering, and in this trance state, he sees spectacular and majestic visions. According to Kurath (1984), Powers (1977), and Yenne (1986), such practices actually occurred in the past and continue in the present among some tribes of Plains Indians. White Americans sometimes call this ritual the sun dance; however, according to Powers (1977), the Indian phrase describing this ceremony is better translated as the sun gazing dance (p. 95). John Lame Deer (1972) describes the ritual as follows:

> The dance is not so severe now as it once was, but even today it asks much of a man. Even today a man may faint for lack of food and water. He may become so thirsty blowing on his eagle-bone whistle that his throat will be parched like a cracked, dry riverbed. He may be blind for a time from staring at the sun so that his eyes see only glowing spirals of glaring whiteness. The pain in his flesh, where the eagle’s claw is fastened in his breast, may become so great that a moment arrives when he will no longer feel it. It is at such moments, when he loses consciousness, when the sun burns itself into his mind, when his strength is gone and his legs buckle under him, that the visions occur—visions of becoming a medicine man, visions of the future. (p. 189)

The author adds:

> The difference between the white man and us is this: You believe in the redeeming powers of suffering, if this suffering was done by somebody else, far away, two thousand years ago. We believe that it is up to every one of us to help each other, even through the pain in our bodies. Pain to us is not "abstract," but very real. We do not lay this burden onto our god, nor do we want to miss being face to face with the spirit power. It is when we are fasting on the hilltop, or tearing our flesh at the sun dance, that we experience the sudden insight, come closest to the mind of the Great Spirit. Insight does not come cheaply, and we want no angel or saint to gain it for us and give it to us secondhand. (p. 197)

In another account of Native American religion, Lemonick (1993) described the manner in which the traumatizing rituals of the Mayans (who inhabited southeastern Mexico and Guatemala) induced altered states of consciousness that had religious significance to the community of believers. The author states: "The gruesome ritual of bloodletting accompanied every major political and religious event in ancient Maya society. . . . The intense pain of such rites led to hallucinatory visions that allowed participants to communicate with ancestors and mythological beings" (Lemonick, 1993, p. 49).

Other shamanistic and preindustrial cultures also allegedly performed painful or abusive rituals. In Kingship and Sacrifice, Valeri (1985) described numerous episodes of ritual human sacrifice performed by Hawaiians prior to 1819 when such ceremonies were officially abolished. Valeri noted that sacrifices were also used in rites of sorcery. Steiger (1971) indicated that among the Hawaiians (as elsewhere) male circumcision has been a kind of blood ritual. Without anesthesia, it is also presumably a painful ritual experience that may cause an altered state of consciousness. Similarly, Cowan (1992) described the shamanistic practices of the Australian Aboriginals:

> The idea of bloodletting or blood sacrifice is rooted in Aboriginal ritual practice. There are few ceremonies that do not involve the cutting of some part of the body to release blood. . . . In the strict sense a boy cannot become a man until he has undergone initiation. Until he is initiated, it follows that he lives only a part life as a child. Ritual initiation allows him to be 'reborn' into a more complete life as an adult. Prior to European contact young girls often underwent ritual deflowering by men of the same class as the intended husband. This also involved a clitoral cut with a stone knife, followed by intercourse with the men concerned. (p. 55)

According to Cowan, Aboriginal boys also experience painful rituals that result in a transformation of identity:

> During the ceremony a boy's personality undergoes an abrupt and permanent change. Not only must he experience pain in the act of submission to his Elders, he must learn obedience. . . . Sworn to secrecy about the rites he has witnessed, the initiate finds himself transformed by the nature of his experience into a man on whom the burden of cultural continuity is already beginning to fall. (pp. 56–57)

The practice of ritual infanticide and keeping the embalmed body has been reportedly practiced by some Eskimo shamans as a means of gaining a "familiar" spirit (Ahmed, 1968). This procedure would be expected to be traumatizing to the shaman perpetrator, who then might dissociate (further) as a result of this experience. This ritual act is similar to a practice observed in some of the Caribbean islands in which, according to Beck (1979), a "familiar" spirit called a bolum can be acquired. Ritual sacrifice of children is attributable to a variety of shamanistic and other cultures (Potter, 1984). Repeated ritual murder is reportedly a characteristic practice of "sorcerers" from the Cebuano culture of the Philippines (Lieban, 1967):

> To become one who can practice hilo, it is said that a man must first kill a member of his own family, and from then on one or more victims each year. One sorcerer said that the sorcerer's obligation to kill grows with time; the longer the sorcerer practices, the more frequently he has to kill. All informants agreed that once a sorcerer assumes such obligations, if he does not victimize others according to schedule, he himself will become a victim, struck down by his own instruments of sorcery that turn against him. As one sorcerer expressed it, "If he does not kill, he gets seriously ill, and he only gets well when he kills. If he does not kill, he will die." (p. 23)

It is our hypothesis that repeated experiences of trauma are a necessary precedent to the development of intrusive experiences of dissociated identity. Furthermore, certain rituals that include blood sacrifice and the ritual eating of the sacrificial victim increase the probability of mentally internalizing the concept or image of the victim, or the entity that the victim symbolizes, thereby facilitating the creation of dissociated identities or alter personalities.

It is plausible that painful rituals have been used in the training of shamans. Such folk healers may have observed suffering people who appeared to be in a state of psychological shock as a result of their pain. Because of the unresponsiveness often seen in people in a state of shock, it would be easy to understand how shamans might conclude that these people's souls had left their bodies. The return of a person's soul to his or her body might have been construed when an unconscious, but suffering, individual, returned to consciousness. Certainly, the capacity to regain consciousness after a brief lapse would be a favorable sign in the unconscious individual’s recovery, and presumably, shamans did typically try to assist their clients’ return to consciousness as expeditiously as possible.

It is possible that as shamans gained experience in healing, they were able to generalize the idea of loss of soul to phenomena beyond the simple loss of consciousness induced by trauma or sickness. For example, some illnesses may also result in less obvious departures in a person’s normal consciousness. An effective healer would need to be sensitive to such subtle changes, particularly as they related to illness and health. Early shamans probably also noted that there are other altered states of consciousness that are adaptive, such as sleep. When early shamans themselves became sick or accidentally ingested certain drugs, especially hallucinogens, these practitioners may have believed that they had entered a spirit world much like the parallel worlds where they believed their clients’ souls had become lost. At other times, shamans may have noticed that trances could be induced through certain repetitive sounds and activities: drum beating, chanting, dancing, sleep deprivation, or the like.

In taking such a perspective, it is possible to see ways that shamans might have developed their characteristic approaches to healing. Their primary goal was to negotiate in the spirit world or otherwise return their clients’ souls to their bodies. What better way to do this than for the healer to go into the “world” of lost consciousness (i.e., the “spirit world”) to find and recover these “lost souls”? As strange as this may sound to modern Westerners, it is a sacred idea that is treated reverently in many cultures. Furthermore, there may have been some effective cures, or the practice would probably not have continued. But how could such a magical, but unscientific, approach to treatment have any useful effect? Even today in modern Western medicine, one of the most potent treatment effects is said to be the placebo effect.[6] Because the placebo effect seems to depend on the client’s belief in the practitioner’s ability and the client’s own capacity for recovery, it would seem reasonable that in some cases a dramatic ritual might exert a more powerful placebo effect than routine office practices in a contemporary clinic.[7]

How might one organize such a dramatic ritual? A ritual killing, although gruesome, might provide a particularly emotionally provocative method. To symbolically trade the life of one (e.g., an animal or person of lessor value to the tribe) for the life or the improved health of the “benefactor” might be enacted as an impressive spectacle wherein the expected result would be maximized. In some cases where clients got well, it seems reasonable that the recovered client attributed the “cure” to the shaman’s prowess. The client might even describe his or her descent into the fearful spirit world simply by reporting the imagery and hallucinations experienced while in that particular altered state of consciousness.[8]

But what would happen if the client recovered, but was in a state of confusion, disorientation regarding his or her own identity, and unable to recognize family or friends or the immediate environment? Such cases do occur in modern Western hospitals and emergency rooms where an individual is so ill as to be disoriented. In such cases where the shaman was unable to assist in recovering the client’s soul through the other means already described, it may have seemed necessary to give the client another soul (identity), possibly a helper soul, and presumably rituals evolved in which people could effect this alternative kind of cure. The effects of hypnosis are typically short-lived. Something stronger might be needed to ensure that this helper soul did not leave as well. Some people might be able to keep their helper soul alive by repetitive rituals equivalent to ongoing hypnosis sessions. However, to produce a truly lasting helper spirit, some sort of extremely powerful ritual might be needed. The effects of trauma are sometimes unavailable to conscious awareness, sometimes they emerge as nightmares and flashbacks, but this kind of dissociated reaction doesn’t easily go away on its own accord. It leaves characteristic psychological features of trauma that often require lengthy therapy or some other intensive emotionally healing process. What if the flashback experience could be molded into taking the form of an alternate identity?

It is at this point with the discovery of more powerfully dissociated states produced through traumatizing rituals that some shamans may have given birth to a new kind of spiritual tradition: sorcery and black magic. Such a diabolical craft would have some obvious disadvantages (i.e., painful rituals, the abandonment of normal morality, and so on). On the other hand, these methods of sorcery would be expected to produce more powerful and lasting experiences of possession and dissociation.

In many preindustrial communities, there may have been a desire to have the immediate presence of their gods among them. Such spectacles might be possible after the gods had ostensibly taken possession of one of the local villagers. The use of traumatizing techniques may have been more effective in creating possession by the gods than other less dramatic and demanding methods. Valeri (1985) made an interesting observation: “gods who no longer receive human recognition in the form of sacrifices and prayers die” (p. 104). However, in most cultures, the traumatic rituals for inducing this kind of possession often would have to be secret. In order for the dissociation of identity to work most effectively, the victim (or recipient) of the possession would need to be amnestic for the details of the traumatizing rituals. It has been demonstrated that in working with modern dissociative clients, psychological recovery, including a lessening of the effects of dissociation, is facilitated by recovering the memories of traumatization. Observant sorcerers may have learned that they could also create other kinds of possessing entities including familiars (e.g., the spirit guardians mentioned earlier) and a particular kind of familiar that is a helper to the sorcerer, not the victim, of the ritual. Oke (1989) referred to this entity as an iko-awo or “spirit slave.” The spirit slave is presumably a dissociated alter identity that is created in the victim by the traumatizing ritual. The iko-awo is instructed under severe duress to do anything the sorcerer commands, including suicide. The enforcer alters previously discussed would be similar to spirit slaves. The victim typically would be amnestic for the traumatizing ritual and unaware of the malevolent training that was part of the initiatory ritual.

We propose that this is how black magic works. When a spell is cast, or a curse or a signal is given, the “spirit slave” is effectively called out.[9] The spirit slave is commanded to carry out a specific task for the sorcerer. This command could be expressed in the form of a signal to which the victim was previously taught to respond during a traumatic ritual. If the dissociation is great enough, this can be done without the victim’s conscious awareness.[10] If the sorcerer does not know the victim’s programming or if the victim has no such programming, then the sorcerer’s efforts may fail altogether. However, if the sorcerer has successfully programmed several individuals in the tribe without their awareness, then the community may have great fear and reverence for him or her, particularly after such “magical powers” are later apparently demonstrated.

Sorcerers who themselves had inner dissociated entities would probably more accurately be considered “witches” because of the anthropological distinction that is sometimes made between sorcery and witchcraft.

Anthropologists have responded in large part to E. E. Evans-Pritchard's (1931) observation that the African Azande have different words to denote witchcraft versus sorcery.[11] Although this anthropological distinction is not universally accepted,[12] we find it useful to make a differentiation for purposes of clarity. Sorcery may be defined as the use of ritual magic and cues that are designed to cause psychological changes in others by triggering or accessing dissociated mental states in such individuals. Witchcraft may be defined as a more specific form of sorcery in which the practitioner believes that he or she has a special bond (or pact) with a spiritual entity that is actually a dissociated alternate identity within the witch. The witch may then use ritual magic or other cues to cause mental changes both within the witch as well as within the external person who is "bewitched" (i.e., assessed or triggered). Witches purportedly perform black magic with the aid of an evil deity or "demon," but they are also indebted to that malignant entity.[13] In other words, true witches may have undergone some ceremonial procedure whereby one or more dissociated entities have been created in themselves. Such dissociated entities could be viewed as demons or malevolent gods (depending on the procedures by which the entity is created and the beliefs of the cult).[14] Such practices reportedly are secretly passed down through individual families.

It is noteworthy that in many cultures, witchcraft is considered to be hereditary.[15] In the United States, the incidence of ritual abuse is also frequently associated with multigenerational practices.[16] Another perplexing characteristic of witchcraft in many cultures is its association with incest and other behaviors typically taboo in most organized societies. This feature of witchcraft also parallels the North American reports of ritual abuse. Most European American satanism constitutes a kind of possession cult or sorcery religion similar to the others that I have described. Thus, satanism is a particular form of witchcraft wherein the evil deity is, of course, Satan. This is not to confuse satanism with Wicca, which is not, in an anthropological sense, actually witchcraft but is instead a syncretized form of modern nature worship combined with elements of shamanism and some influences of Western ritual magic.[17] (Wicca is discussed further in Chapter 11.) It should also be noted that the term satanism might sometimes be incorrectly used for other occult (see Chapter 12) and non-occult beliefs and practices.

With the advent of sorcery and witchcraft, possession cults may have been able to formalize effective, but secret, rituals for creating possession states. As has been noted elsewhere in this book, some religions have evolved around these practices, including African and African-derived sorcery religions and some similar rituals of Australian Aboriginals, Polynesians, Native Americans, and Eskimos, some of which would be considered primarily shamanic. Similar cults and religions also emerged in Asia (e.g., some Asian shamanisms, Thugees, and worshippers of Shakti), the Middle East (e.g., devotees of Baal and Molech), the Mediterranean (e.g., mystery cults), and northwestern European cultures (e.g., Druids).[18]

1990: The Year of the Awakening

I noticed seasonal mood changes among some of my clients. They seemed to function more poorly at certain times of the year. Curiously, some deteriorated in a pattern that coincided with the phases of the moon. At least one of these clients expressed frustration because I ignored her, repeatedly telling me that she became more self-destructive when the moon was full. She was right. I had discounted what she was saying. I was confident that the moon had no effect on anyone's behavior and so paid little attention to her comments.

When I was in graduate school, I wrote my doctoral dissertation on the subject of astrology (Noblitt, 1978/1979). I conducted an empirical study that found no relationship between selected astrological predictions of personality and objective personality testing results. Nevertheless, in reviewing other published research, there were some other studies that did show occasional significant relationships "between the moon's phases and state hospital admissions (Osborn, 1968; Weiskott & Tipton, 1975), psychiatric ward admissions (Blackman & Catalina, 1973), criminal offenses (Tasso & Miller, 1976), and homicides (Lieber & Sherin, 1972)" (Noblitt, 1978/1979, p. 19). However, a number of studies showed no significant relationship: "in comparing lunar periodicity with patterns of suicide (Lester, Brokopp, & Priebe, 1969), homicides (Porkorny & Jachimczyk, 1974), suicides and homicides (Porkorny, 1964), psychiatric emergencies (Bauer & Hornick, 1968), mental hospital admissions (Porkorny, 1968), telephone calls to a counseling service (Weiskott, 1974), and 'acting out' behavior on a psychiatric ward (Shapiro, Streiner, Gray, Williams, & Soble, 1970)" (Noblitt, 1978/1979, p. 19).

The eminent British psychologist Hans Eysenck also conducted research on astrology, most of which was published after I completed my dissertation. His stated views were initially open to some astrological interpretations, but as additional data accumulated he became more skeptical (Eysenck, 1997; Eysenck & Nias, 1982). Another luminary in psychology, Carl Jung, was more actively supportive of astrological lore, and he included the interpretation of birth horoscopes in his care of patients. Jung (1962) opined that “astrology represents the summation of all psychological knowledge of antiquity” (p. 142).

Although there is no compelling evidence supporting the claims of astrology, it is safe to say that self-fulfilling prophecies can and do occur. Bok (1975) suggested that such self-fulfilling prophecies played a role in validating individual personal beliefs in astrology, and these beliefs could foster unhealthy magical thinking. Could it be that some of these clients were responding with distress to the phases of the moon (typically the full moon) because of their own expectations? When we explored this possibility, an altogether different explanation began to emerge. My clients would at first typically say that they had no idea why they had emotionally deteriorated when they did. However, alternate identities would sometimes emerge and recall traumatizing abuses that coincided with a full moon. Sometimes these recollections occurred along with flashbacks of particular abuses. As their narratives became clearer and more coherent, they often concluded that they had been abused in rituals that were synchronized with specific celestial or seasonal phases. Such narratives and their clinical manifestations are consistent with traumatized individuals who are triggered into flashbacks or states of panic or depression by some event or occurrence that reminds them of the original distressing event. One such example is the anniversary reaction that occurs when clients relive some traumatic experience on the same date but during a year subsequent to the actual traumatic incident.

Many survivors described past abuses in rituals during the full moon. We explored this claim further by asking other therapists about their clients’ allegations and by researching the literature. Our colleagues’ responses and our findings from other published sources have been consistent with these narratives.[1]

Furthermore, some survivors produced calendars listing what they call “cult holidays.”[2] Although the calendars have been similar to one another, there may have minor individual variations. Of the various calendars of cult holidays that my clients described, the most detailed one was provided by “Elaine” with a notation that the year of 1990 was “the year of the awakening.” When I asked Elaine about what she had written, she said that she had primarily been abused in a satanic cult that had taught her that 1990 was the year when all the members of her group were to “awaken,” or start to recognize the presence of their cult alters, in preparation for the arrival of Satan.

I told Elaine that I did not understand and asked, “What arrival?” She told me that in her cult, she was taught that Satan was supposed to make a presence on Earth for the Apocalypse in the manner described in the Bible’s book of Revelation. However, according to her abusers, Satan and his followers would be victorious in the final battle against G-d[3] and the forces of light. She told me, “1999 is the year of the arrival.”

This was news to me. I had heard of apocalyptic proclamations that prophesied the “final days,” but not about an Armageddon in reverse. My concern was that even if this belief were false, it might provoke volatile people toward acts of violence. Such incidents have already occurred under the auspices of apocalyptic groups that announced that the end of the world was near.[4]

I explored this question with other cult survivors and was told by some that they thought Satan was indeed coming to do battle on earth. Some specifically mentioned the year 1999. What were the origins of such a strange belief ? My clients were unable to explain it to me. In the course of researching this question, we came upon a series of verses by 16th-century French occultist Michel de Nostredame. Better known as Nostradamus, his quatrains were supposedly predictive of major events in history. According to Wilson (1971), “one of its most disquieting prophesies declares”:

> Like the great king of the Angolmois
> The year 1999, seventh month,
> The Great king of terror will descend from the sky,
> At this time, Mars will reign for the good cause. (p. 265)

Like many examples of prophetic language, this material is unclear and could be open to a variety of different interpretations. However, in this case, a cultist might interpret “the Great king of terror” as G-d or Satan (depending on his or her point of view). Of course, there was no such disastrous occurrence in 1999.

Elaine further explained that she believed that the reason that so many individuals with dissociative identity disorder were “coming out of the woodwork” at that time was because those who had been abused in such cults were preparing for this “arrival.” Although 1990 was supposedly the “year of the awakening,” some were apparently awakening even earlier. A number of other clients indicated that they had alternate identities that were preparing for an apocalyptic return and victory for Satan or Lucifer. Some even used the phrase Armageddon programming to describe the training that they had allegedly received for this purpose.

Some clients indicated that they believed mass killings would be under way as the “end times” approached. Several said that they believed that a number of the mass killers of recent times had been trained by such cults, in which these grand acts of evil were looked upon as sacrificial events. By increasing human suffering, there was supposed to be a magical augmentation of the power of evil. For other cultists, their goals have been described as establishing a “new world order” along the lines of a totalitarian police state. Some ritual abuse survivors stated that they had been trained in military-style combat in remote areas of the United States. A number of such individuals told me that they believed that the bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City was one such undertaking as part of a series of future destructive acts.

In the course of our researching clients’ reports regarding recent, allegedly cult-inspired murders, it became apparent that a number of convicted killers had actually confessed or made allegations of satanic involvement or other cultic influence over their criminal acts, including Charles Manson, Henry Lee Lucas, Charles Gervais, and Richard Ramirez. Several books have been written regarding the subject of frequently brutal criminal activity associated with destructive cults (Kahaner, 1988; Mandelsberg, 1991; Newton, 1993; Raschke, 1990; St. Clair, 1987; Terry, 1987).

Cult-related crime is in itself a curiosity. Do the police believe that such crimes are really occurring? In a survey of 125 Chicago police officers by Connie Fletcher (1990), the author concludes that “satanic cult murders are out there. It is not to say that it is everywhere. But people are doing these things” (p. 90).

In order to understand these allegations better, we reviewed the early literature within the field of mental health. We thought that such material would provide a historical background germane to the current psychiatric narratives of ritual abuse. One of the earliest professional references to the subject of ritual abuse was a comment in Dr. Karl Menninger's (1930) popular book on psychiatry, The Human Mind, that mentioned the Black Mass, satanism, and devil worship as real events that occurred in large cities in Europe and the United States—although in great secrecy. Thirty-five years later, there was an entry, "Devil Worship," in the Encyclopedia of Aberrations, edited by Edward Podolsky (1965):

> In the twentieth century in England black magic is practiced and taught in secret schools both at Oxford and at Cambridge. The Black Mass is still celebrated in the drawing rooms of Mayfair and in Chelsea studios under conditions of almost absolute secrecy. There are at least seven active chapters of Satanists, each with an initiated membership of nearly fifty men and women, who meet at stated intervals and have their hidden chapels devoted to the worship of the demon. (p. 186)

The article described a variety of incidents involving the desecration of churches in Europe and a case in Helsinki where a group of cultists[5] was discovered "meeting in a cemetery and that more than thirty corpses had been disinterred and indescribably mutilated" (p. 186). The article further described abusive acts toward children that were reportedly perpetrated by other satanic[6] cultists along with the ubiquitous threat of death for "those who spill the secrets" (p. 187). It was surprising to find such a clear and unequivocal statement about modern devil worship and crime. Furthermore, The Encyclopedia of Aberrations is a reputable professional publication authored by a prestigious group of psychiatric experts with the foreword written by Alexandra Adler, the daughter of Alfred Adler.

Sigmund Freud (1966b) also wrote about such a possible cult:

> I have an idea shaping in my mind that in the perversions, of which hysteria is the negative, we may have before us a residue of a primaeval sexual cult which, in the Semitic East (Moloch, Astarte), was once, perhaps still is, a religion. . . . I dream, therefore, of a primaeval Devil religion whose rites are carried on secretly, and I understand the severe therapy of the witches' judges. (p. 243)

Freud seemed to be expressing the idea that malignant cult practices did exist and that somehow there was a connection between such ritual acts and his client's symptoms. In The Assault on Truth, Jeffrey Masson (1992) argued that Freud abandoned his original theory that sexual abuse caused hysteria after one of his patients, Emma Eckstein, described a mental image in which the devil “sticks pins into her finger and puts a piece of candy on each drop of blood” (p. 103).

The theory Freud then dismissed was his earlier “seduction theory” that postulated that neuroses were caused by the trauma of childhood sexual abuse. According to Masson, Freud’s decision to abandon his seduction theory occurred after he wrote a letter to his friend and colleague Wilhelm Fliess dated January 17, 1897:

> What would you say, by the way, if I told you that my brand-new theory of the early etiology of hysteria was already well known and had been published a hundred times over, though several centuries ago? . . . But why did the devil who took possession of the poor things invariably abuse them sexually and in a loathsome manner? Why are their confessions under torture so like the communications made by my clients in psychological treatment? (Masson, 1992, p. 104)[7]

Were some of Freud’s clients survivors of ritual abuse? Was this the disturbing possibility that prompted Freud to ignore his clients’ reports that they had been sexually abused in childhood? Was this what motivated Freud to formulate his later theory of psychosexual stages, wherein he asserted that children normally go through psychosexual developmental phases with particular associated sexual preoccupations and fantasies?

Masson did not address the possibility that ritual abuse occurred among Freud’s clients. Instead, Masson stated that the memories of diabolical experiences were screen memories for the actual sexual abuse that was usually perpetrated by the child’s father. However, many of my clients describe ceremonies in which they were sexually abused by someone costumed as Satan or some other demonic entity in the manner described by Freud’s client Emma Eckstein.

The mental image of being stuck with pins and having candy placed on the drops of blood certainly paints a bizarre picture for any modern, civilized person, but such accounts are commonly reported by individuals who say they were ritually abused. The activity is often explained as programming in a ceremonial cult. Pins stuck into a child in a nonmedical context are likely to cause the child to dissociate, to go into a trance. Candy placed on the child’s wounds might be used to bring out a newly created alter identity, to define particular characteristics of that alter, or to direct the manner by which accessing that alter may occur in the future. Later, the newly created alternate identity could be accessed or brought out by someone who simply provided the particular relevant signals (that could include the kind of candy used in the ritual and/or stimulation of that part of the body where the pins were inserted). Such a process would not require any supernatural explanation but could be understood as Pavlovian conditioning with dissociated trauma-mediated responses.

In another letter to Fliess, dated January 24, 1897, Freud noted the following: “Imagine, I obtained a scene about the circumcision of a girl. The cutting of a piece of the labia minora (which is still shorter today), sucking up the blood, following which the child was given a piece of the skin to eat” (Masson, 1992, p. 105). Masson affirmed that Freud was still referring to the same client, Emma Eckstein. The scenes reported by Eckstein are consistent with the accounts of clients describing ritual abuse in contemporary narratives. Such rituals increase the individual’s likelihood of experiencing an altered state of consciousness, dissociating into fragmented identities, and responding submissively to the abusers.

Pamela Hudson (1991) and Valerie Sinason (1994) also observed that Eckstein may have been a ritual abuse survivor. Further, Hudson (1991) wrote:

> One hopes that by 1996, one hundred years after Freud’s initial paper on Hysteria, we shall have adopted the more logical view that previously repressed rape memories are, in the words of one ritually abused child, “no fun” to recall. I submit that it is “no fun” to fantasize ritual abuse and that 3 or 4 year olds could not possibly invent identical reports across the United States, Canada, and Europe. (p. 65)

In order to understand these survivors’ narratives, we also decided to familiarize ourselves with the available occult literature. Although this domain is characterized by secrecy, there are a number of publications that provide an introduction to these practices and beliefs. We used multiple sources in an effort to piece together useful and relevant information on this subject. This, along with the narratives that clients provided, helped us better understand the puzzle of ritual abuse.

Investigating Western Occultism

Beliefs in magic are prevalent in many cultures. These traditions seem to share a number of common themes and practices. Some authors have proposed that such traditions originated long ago in prehistoric times among the first shamans and folk healers (Wilson, 1971). Lissner (1961) claimed that shamans were originally monotheistic but later regressed into polytheism and a belief in magic, but it is not clear that Lissner's theory is widely accepted among scholars who address such phenomena.

The term occult is often used but may be unclear to some readers. For the purpose of this book, occult is defined to mean "relating to hidden, mystical or purportedly magical phenomena in which secrecy and often, ritual, is reportedly an important feature" (Noblitt, 1993a). So where did such beliefs and practices begin? The previously cited authors made the case that occultism began with the early folk healers, prehistoric and ancient people who utilized magical beliefs and practices in their work. Although such thinking is speculative, it is consistent with archeological findings that lend evidence to the existence of magical beliefs among the prehistoric and ancient peoples of the world.[1]

In ancient times, ritual magic, witchcraft, and sorcery were ubiquitous aspects of everyday life. Many ancient sources describe these practices as commonplace within diverse cultures. Shamanism, possession cults, sorcery, and witchcraft, having all taken place in a variety of preindustrial cultures, are also further discussed in other chapters of this book.

Obviously, Western occultism may have begun in much the same way as it did in other cultures. Western occult practices and traditions also may have a shared ancestry with shamanism but we can only speculate about such hypothetical origins.[2] A more clearly recognizable occult movement in ancient times was evident with the appearance of the mystery cults of the Mediterranean and Middle East. Walter Burkert's Ancient Mystery Cults (1987) compared five of these cults associated with Eleusis, Dionysus, Meter, Isis, and Mithras. Burkert emphasized the notion that these mystery religions were not religions in the sense of modern monotheistic faiths that are normally mutually exclusive traditions of worship. The mystery cults were each merely one part of the ancient panoply of beliefs and rituals available in the pagan world. According to Michael Howard (1989):

> The Mystery cults used elaborate initiation ceremonies, arcane symbolism and theatrical rituals to provide the initiate with the revelation of the spiritual reality hidden behind the illusion of the material world. During initiation, the neophyte was placed in a trance and experienced contact with the gods through a symbolic journey to the Underworld. Initiates symbolically died and were reborn as perfected souls. (pp. 21–22)

Howard's account is interesting particularly because of the obvious similarities between the mystery cults and shamanism, possession cults, sorcery, and witchcraft. The importance of trance states, a ceremonial "journey," and rituals of death and rebirth are repeated themes. Furthermore, these are phenomena described by modern survivors in the context of their own experiences of ritual abuse.

Were the mystery cults abusive? This is difficult to determine with great certainty primarily because of the imposed secrecy. According to the ancient Roman historian Livy (trans. 1976), the mystery cult of Bacchus was investigated by the Roman Senate and it was determined that these Bacchic rites included sexual transgressions, murder, and other criminal acts:

> All sorts of corruption began to be practiced. . . . The corruption was not confined to one kind of evil, the promiscuous violation of free men and of women; the cult was also a source of supply of false witnesses, forged documents and wills, and perjured evidence, dealing also in poisons and in wholesale murders among the devotees, and sometimes ensuring that not even the bodies were found for burial. Many such outrages were committed by craft, and even more by violence; and the violence was concealed because no cries for help could be heard against the shriekings, the banging of drums and the clashing of cymbals in the scene of debauchery and bloodshed. (p. 402)[3]

But did these cultists also experience possession states? In Plato's dialogue Ion, he made a passing reference to the female followers of Dionysus while more generally commenting about great poets and their inspiration. He wrote that the inspiration of such poets is like "the Bacchant women, possessed and out of their senses, [who] draw milk and honey out of the rivers" (Warmington & Rouse, 1956, p. 18). Plato's statement would seem to indicate that he believed that these women were possessed or could be possessed, but it is not clear whether his opinion was based on fact or rumor. However, Burkert (1987) stated that "Plutarch declares himself convinced that ghosts, daimones, take part in the mystery celebrations" (p. 113) and further that the madness associated with these ceremonies to some ancients represented possession by the god.[4]

The cult of Mithras was another mystery religion that has attracted scholarly attention. Unfortunately, and partly because of its secrecy, we have little information about it. In fact, there is some controversy over whether it was of Roman (Ulansey, 1989) or Persian (Cumont, 1956) origin. However, Benjamin Walker (1989a) wrote about a Mithraic initiation ceremony:

> There followed a few days abstinence from food and sexual relations, then a ceremonial ablution, after which the candidate's hands were bound behind his back and he was laid on the ground as if dead. After certain solemn rites his right hand was grasped by the hierophant and he was raised up. Then followed the baptism of blood. He was made to stand naked in a pit covered with a grating, and over this an animal as sacrificed, so that its blood flowed over him. Whatever the animal was, it was regarded as a surrogate of the bull of Mithras. Prudentius (d. AD 390), a Christian poet writing in Latin, gives a vivid description of this rite, of which he may have had a personal recollection. 'Through the open grating the bloody dew flows into the pit; the neophyte receives the falling drops on his head and body, he leans back so that his cheeks, lips and nostrils are wetted; he pours the liquid over his eyes and does not even spare his mouth, for he moistens his tongue with blood and sips it eagerly.' Symbolically the initiate has been raised from the dead and washed in the vitalizing blood of the bull, and is regarded as 'born again into eternity.' He is received into the community of initiates as a brother, and is allowed to participate in the sacramental meal of bread and wine which establishes his status as one of the elect. (p. 155)

Regarding the Mithraic cults, Luther Martin (2006) wrote: "The enigmatic and terrifying ordeals characteristic of these initiations would have produced cognitive disorientation among the individual initiates" (p. 387).

Several authors have noted a strong resemblance between the mystery cults and the lodges and fraternal organizations that appeared later in Europe.[5] Some have argued that the Freemasons and other similar brotherhoods patterned themselves partly after these traditions.

The rise of Gnosticism was another significant movement in the overall evolution of Western occultism.[6] Some literature has also attributed a major role to Gnosticism in the history of satanism and ritual abuse.[7] Scholarly accounts of the history of the devil,[8] Satan,[9] Lucifer,[10] witchcraft,[11] and secret societies[12] have cited Gnosticism as an important related spiritual perspective.

The term Gnosticism is sometimes used in different ways. In its narrowest sense, the term refers to a variety of sects that appeared in the Roman Empire of the first century CE. These congregations subscribed to certain common beliefs that will be described later, that were declared heretical by the established Christian church. Some attribute the founding of Christian Gnosticism to Simon Magus, who was mentioned in Acts 8: 9−24.[13] The early Christian Gnostics and their later derivative sects often considered themselves to be the true Christians in opposition to what they viewed as the inferior, if not downright evil, organized churches of Rome and, later, Constantinople.[14] In its broader usage, Gnosticism also refers to other parallel and related religious movements, including: (1) the Persian-derived Manicheanism and post-Manichean dualisms as espoused by the Bogomils of southeastern Europe and the Cathari of southern France and Italy, (2) pagan Gnosticism such as Hermeticism, and (3) modern variants of Gnosticism, some of which are active in present-day Europe and America.

These various sects differed in some respects but tended to have several features in common. Most were based on a dualistic notion of good and evil as relatively independent, eternal forces in the material and spiritual universe. This dualism was more extreme than the qualified dualism of Christianity in which good and evil have been construed as existing in opposition to one another, but where the good is considered to be more powerful and ultimately the force that will prevail. Judaism, in contrast, has presented a more monistic position on this question whereby good and evil are usually both subsumed as normal features of G-d's creation, where Satan is a relatively unimportant figure and not necessarily G-d's adversary.[15]

One of the prominent Gnostic themes was that the creator of the universe, sometimes called the Demiurge, was an inept or overtly evil spiritual being.[16] The Demiurge arrogantly and falsely believed himself to be the god who ruled heaven and earth, but was actually a spiritual entity of lower rank in comparison with the true, ultimate god[17] of the Gnostics. The human spirit was viewed as a spark of this ultimate deity trapped within the inferior and evil material body created by the Demiurge.[18] Many Gnostics equated the Demiurge with the G-d of Israel, whom Christians call G-d, the Father. Conversely, the serpent mentioned in Genesis (and considered by Christians to be Satan) was viewed by many Gnostics as a benevolent and wise being who had come into the world to help humanity learn the hidden knowledge of good and evil. In the Gnostic treatise The Testimony of Truth, the author quoted from Genesis:

> It is written in the Law concerning this, when God gave a command to Adam, “From every [tree] you may eat, [but] from the tree which is in the midst of Paradise do not eat, for on the day that you eat from it you will surely die.” But the serpent was wiser than all the animals that were in Paradise, and he persuaded Eve, saying, “On the day when you eat from the tree which is in the midst of Paradise the eyes of your mind will be opened.” (Robinson, 1988, p. 454)

The Gnostics observed that Adam and Eve did not die the day they ate the forbidden fruit, but that their eyes were indeed opened. Thus, they concluded that the serpent was correct and the god of creation was in error or had been lying.[19] The author of The Testimony of Truth wrote:

> And he cursed the serpent, and called him “devil.” And he said, “Behold, Adam has become like one of us, knowing evil and good.” Then he said, “Let us cast him out of Paradise lest he take from the tree of life and eat and live forever.” But what sort is this God? First [he] maliciously refused Adam from eating of the tree of knowledge. And secondly he said, “Adam, where are you?” God does not have foreknowledge; (otherwise), would he not know from the beginning? . . . Surely he has shown himself to be a malicious grudger.[20]

Thus, one can plainly see that some Gnostics had essentially reversed what orthodox (or “straight-thinking”) Christians regarded as the holiest of beings with the one who was regarded as most evil. In some instances, from a Gnostic point of view, mainstream Christianity was satanic, and from a Christian point of view, Gnosticism was satanic. However, many Gnostics did consider themselves to be Christian, and although they expressed hostility toward G-d the Father, they were usually favorably predisposed toward Jesus, whom they considered to be (along with the serpent) a savior figure who had come to Earth to provide knowledge.

Gnosticism also differed from orthodox Christianity on the subject of spiritual salvation. The Gnostics believed that humanity is in a deplorable spiritual condition because of a lack of knowledge; that is, gnosis.[21] They did not consider Adam and Eve in the Genesis story to be sinful as a result of their eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. The Gnostic view was that the Demiurge unfairly wanted people to remain ignorant in order to control and dominate them. With the appropriate knowledge, Gnostics argued an individual could reunite with the ultimate god by becoming the god. This knowledge was not readily available to all because (1) it was a kind of mystical knowledge or "enlightenment" and (2) much of it was secret.[22] Additionally, the Gnostics held that this enlightenment and the process of becoming the deity were accomplished by magical operations or ritual magic, sometimes called theurgy, or high magic.

Some Gnostics claimed to possess secret knowledge from Jesus that had been passed down to specially chosen individuals, citing Mark 4:11:

> To you has been given the secret of the kingdom of God, but for those outside everything is in parables; so that they may indeed see but not perceive, and may indeed hear but not understand; lest they should turn again, and be forgiven.[23]

The secrecy of some Gnostics included a ritual handshake[24] that is similar (or identical) to a modern Masonic grip and a handshake to which some modern survivors of ritual abuse often respond with an altered state of consciousness, frequently without awareness of why they are doing so.

Ritualism was another source of contention between orthodox Christians and Gnostics. The Gnostic Gospel of Phillip states: "God is a man eater. For this reason men are [sacrificed] to him" (Robinson, 1988, p. 147). Allegations were made that some Gnostics performed religious ceremonies that involved ritual cannibalism and communal sex acts. Some of these ceremonies would clearly fall under the rubric of ritual abuse. Among the more believable reports of bizarre Gnostic ritual practices were the accounts of Epiphanius, a monk who allegedly witnessed orgiastic rituals among a Gnostic group that he called the Phibionites.[25] However, a number of authors have argued that the criticisms of Gnosticism may have been religious propaganda designed to vilify these sects.

Nevertheless, it is evident that there are historians[26] and modern occultists who consider at least some of the accusations of immoral Gnostic practices to be true.[27] In his book The Gnostics, Jacques Lacarriere (1991) argued that the Gnostic violations of sexual and other conventions demonstrated a "Luciferian" conviction of the believer's indestructibility and incorruptibility (p. 70).

Lucifer literally means "the bringer of light." Although Christians traditionally have defined Lucifer as Satan before his fall,[28] some Gnostics associated Lucifer with Prometheus, the Titan of Greek mythology, who was said to have given fire to mankind in defiance of the will of the Olympian gods.[29] Spence (1993) argued that pure satanists have been historically rare, but he maintained that there is more known about the cult of Lucifer (p. 123).

Western occultism was also influenced by Jewish lore, notably the Kabbalah,[30] and also alchemy. Jewish scholars advised us that the Kabbalah described in the scholarly and occult literature does not reflect a genuine or legitimate understanding of their traditions. There are prohibitions against teaching Kabbalah to non-Jews and all those who lack the spiritual maturity for such training. Thus, the genuine Jewish Kabbalah is not revealed or explained to the public.[31] We want to make it clear that when we discuss the Kabbalah, it is only in the context of the scholarly (e.g., within the discipline of religious studies) and occult literature only, not the secret Jewish traditions that are passed down from teacher to learner. This point is sometimes confusing because the Kabbalistic source material such as the Zohar and Sefer Yetzirah are not secret and are readily available to anyone who wants to read them. However, orthodox Jewish tradition maintains that there are deeper meanings to this material that can only be imparted through the personal learning that occurs privately between the teacher and the student. Some scholars have considered the extent to which early Gnosticism may have originated within Judaism.[32] The development of the Kabbalah[33] was another extension of ideas similar to Gnosticism, but within the context of Jewish mysticism. The lore of the Kabbalah is found in a variety of writings, the most important being the Zohar and Sefer Yetzirah. These texts provided a mystical interpretation of the absolute and unknowable deity identified as En-Soph.[34] From En-Soph there were 10 emanations or Sephiroth, which are the 10 “spheres” representing aspects of the universe and essential characteristics of humanity as well as representations of the essence of G-d. The 10 Sephiroth have been depicted as part of a mystical Tree of Life that occultists often use to conceptualize their spiritual and mystical journey to know G-d, the self, and for some to discover the G-d within the self. Such “journeys” may involve altered states of consciousness resembling the trance journeys of shamans.[35] According to Bakan (1965) and Schneider and Berke (2008), Sigmund Freud himself was influenced by the Kabbalah.[36]

Alchemists were known for their search for the philosopher’s stone (lapis philosophorum) that supposedly could change base metals into gold, but some interpreted this as a metaphor representing the spiritual processes that individuals must undergo in order to be transformed into higher spiritual beings. In alchemy, according to Robert Ziegler (2013), suffering was understood to represent a process of “purifying man’s base nature and refining it into the gold of his redeemed spirit” (p. 115). The search for the elixir of life and fountain of youth may have represented the desire to magically escape the normal limitations of mortality.

Additionally, alchemists had interest in creating homunculi,[37] or artificially created people-like entities. The Sorcerer’s Handbook (Baskin, 1974) explains that a “golem” (p. 285) is an example of a homunculus. Within the traditions of the Kabbalah and Jewish mysticism, a golem referred to an automaton, or living being (either with or without a physical body), that could be created by the magician. One might consider the possibility that alchemists and Kabbalists were actually referring to dissociated states of mind that could be created by ritual trauma. Knapp (1977) argued that golems were created in the phenomenal or experiential world of these occult practitioners while in an altered state of consciousness.

Thus, alchemists may have known how to create alter identities. Through the experience of having alternate identities, one might be able to achieve one of the alchemist’s other dreams, to be able to feel young and childlike even in old age. Such an experience occurs when child alters take executive control of the individual. One could also produce the illusion of immortality by creating what appeared to be immortal alter personalities whose identities were kept relatively intact as they were handed down (i.e., programmed) generationally. Some ritual abuse survivors reported that their cults and families followed such a practice. They believed that they had achieved spiritual immortality by inserting their identity into others who would live on after them and would pass on their identities through successive generations. This concept may also be related to the traditions of ancestor worship and ancestor veneration that have been observed in a variety of preindustrial cultures.

One of the significant developments of European history was the witch persecutions. Like the oppression of the Gnostics and other “heretics,” this was a deplorable practice that caused great human suffering. The victims, including children and elderly women, were often the ones who were most vulnerable. Ironically, these crimes against humanity were perpetrated with the approval of the established churches of Europe, both Catholic and Protestant. Given the irrational nature of the accusations and the unreliable methods of obtaining evidence (e.g., torture), some have questioned whether any witchcraft actually occurred in Europe during that time.

Norman Cohn (1975), Hans Sebald (1995), and Hugh Trevor-Roper (1968) argued that such lore was merely fabricated by medieval churchmen, who substantiated their presuppositions by torturing the accused until confessions were forthcoming. Hans Sebald (1995) went one step further contending that many of the current allegations of sexual abuse and ritual abuse made by children represent a modern kind of inquisition and witch hunt. On the other hand, Margaret Murray (1921, 1933) argued that medieval (and modern) witchcraft represented the continuation of an ancient Western European pagan cult that existed in secrecy since the conquest of Europe by Christianity.[38]

An analytical approach to this debate was offered by Jeffrey Burton Russell (1972), who reduced the question of the actual existence of medieval witchcraft into alternative hypotheses:

> Within the framework of historical interpretations of European witchcraft, there are at least eight degrees of skepticism (in descending order). (1) Virtually no one in the Middle Ages believed in witchcraft, which was a vicious fraud perpetrated by the Inquisitors and their attendant theologians, who provoked witch scares in order to increase their own power and wealth. (2) Many people (including Inquisitors and theologians) were deluded by the superstitious atmosphere of the Middle Ages into believing that others were witches, but no one believed that he himself was a witch. (3) At least some people were deluded into believing themselves witches. (4) Some of what these witches believed and practiced was real, deriving from old pagan cults, folklore, sorcery, and heresy. (5) Witch beliefs and practices as described by the sources (mainly trial records) did exist to a substantial degree. Witches did worship the Devil; they did believe and practice what was attributed to them, though these beliefs and practices were constantly evolving. (6) A formal witch cult existed virtually unchanged from ancient times (the argument of Margaret Murray and the modern occultists). (7) Weird phenomena, such as flying and shape shifting, are themselves real. (8) The weird phenomena are not only real, but supernatural, and proof that the Devil is not only real, but supernatural, and proof that the Devil and his minions live. (pp. 20−21)

Russell proposed that all of the previously mentioned options are possible, but that historians have no right to affirm or to deny the last because it deals with supernatural, rather than empirical, phenomena. However, he argued that the weight of history supports the idea that the truth lies somewhere within the range of options three to five.

It has been noted that there was a resurgence in occult beliefs and practices in the 19th century (Webb, 1974). Helena Blavatsky was one of the first well-known occultists of the 19th century. Her system of occultism was not secret. She lectured and published books and articles on this theory known as Theosophy. Blavatsky also edited the periodical Lucifer,[39] which addressed such views. By her own account, Blavatsky's Theosophy was heavily influenced by Gnosticism (Blavatsky, 1877/1988).

Another of the prominent personalities of the 19th century allegedly associated with the cult of Lucifer was Gen. Albert Pike, the Grand Commander, Sovereign Pontiff of Scottish Rite Freemasonry in the southern and western United States from 1859 to 1891. His purported Luciferian beliefs were stated in Masonic instructions attributed to him, but no original copy exists. The following is from Pike's alleged statement:

> That which we must say to the crowd is—we worship a God, but it is the God that one adores without superstition. To you, Sovereign Grand Inspectors General, we say this, that you may repeat it to the Brethren of the 32nd, 31st, and 30th degrees—The Masonic Religion should be, by all of us initiates to the high degrees, maintained in the purity of the Luciferian Doctrine. If Lucifer were not God would Adonay (the God of the Christians) whose deeds prove his cruelty, perfidy and hatred of man, barbarism and repulsion for science, would Adonay and his priests, calumnate him?
> Yes, Lucifer is God, and unfortunately Adonay is also God. For the eternal law is that there is no light without shade, no beauty without ugliness, no white without black, for the absolute can only exist as two gods: darkness being necessary for light to serve as its foil as the pedestal is necessary to the statue and the brake to the locomotive. Thus the doctrine of Satanism is a heresy; and the true and pure philosophical religion is the belief in Lucifer, the equal of Adonay; but Lucifer, God of Light and God of Good is struggling for humanity against Adonay, the God of Darkness and Evil. (Short, 1989, p. 94)[40]

The question of Masonic involvement in malevolent occult practices has been a long-standing controversy. Masons have sometimes argued that they are unfairly attacked and vilified.[41] On the other hand, critics continue to accuse them of blatant acts of impropriety and abuse.[42] In her book Ritual Abuse, Margaret Smith (1993) describes allegations of cult abuse associated with Masonry. In a conversation, Smith told us that she had been abused in a cult where the members would sometimes express amusement at what they considered to be the stupidity of those who would label their activities as satanic. From their point of view, they were Luciferian. They viewed Satan as a Judeo-Christian myth or metaphor.

Other clients alleging histories of ritualized abuse have sometimes explained the religious views of their Luciferian cults where the deity (who is sometimes labeled Lucifer) is conceptualized not as exclusively good or evil, but as an entity who is capable of both good and evil. Again, Satan is sometimes considered a myth or metaphor, but one that must be experienced through abusive rituals to create sufficient suffering to achieve enlightenment. In order to approach the ultimate god of good and evil, one must encounter and engage in both profound evil and good according to some of these cultists. Some survivors also reported that they were encouraged to attend church and develop a part of their personality that is on “the light side.”[43] The concept of a “light” versus a “dark side” is essential to Gnostic thinking and frequently appears in Gnostic writings as well.[44] It is also curious that the same terminology is commonly used by survivors to describe their inner, or phenomenological, world. Smith and many survivors with whom we have consulted have described elements of Gnostic thinking in their abuse. Many survivors making such allegations have explicitly reported abuse where Masonic regalia, ceremonies, or members were present.

It is not our intent to accuse Masons of the perpetration of ritual violence. Although this is possible, it may also be that such cultists operate within Freemasonry without the knowledge or consent of the majority of its members as they reportedly do within conventional religious and political organizations. It is also possible that some cultists imitate Masonic rituals during their own abusive ceremonies. Nevertheless, there are some things about the Freemason organization that are perplexing. For example, the symbol for the Order of the Eastern Star, the woman’s Masonic organization, is an inverted pentagram, a design that is generally used to represent evil and, often, satanism. There are different interpretations of the meaning of this symbol. However, because the star is upside down, some say that it signifies Lucifer described in the book of Isiah (14:12) as “the bright morning star” that fell from heaven. The word Lucifer entered the Bible text when Jerome translated the Bible into Latin around the year 383 CE. Thus, the word Lucifer refers both to the principal demon in the Christian tradition and to a celestial body, the morning star. Lucifer as the morning star is the only celestial body that always appears in the eastern sky; hence, it is sometimes called the Eastern Star.

It is also clear that Masonry has served to preserve and promote elements of Gnostic thinking along with other occult traditions, including the Christian Cabala and Hermetic Qabalah, and the lore of the ancient mystery cults. According to Albert Pike (1871/1960), Freemasonry was established by Jacques de Molay, the last Grand Master of the Knights Templar, after which he was burned alive outside Paris for heresy and sorcery (p. 820).[45] Pike further explained that the Knights Templar pretended to be Christians who were loyal to the Church of Rome but in actuality their agenda was to keep and transmit the secret knowledge of a sect of Middle Eastern Gnostics that Pike identified as “Johannites” (pp. 815−824).

The Ku Klux Klan (KKK) is another cult or cult-like organization that has a history that can be traced to individuals that included Masons and “incorporated Masonic-style initiation rites, symbols and argot words” (Vankin, 1992, p. 281). Bob Larson (1989) wrote that a prevalent KKK perspective is that Satan or the evil Archons fathered Cain through Eve and from Cain the Jewish people supposedly emerged.[46] The idea that Eve was impregnated by Satan to produce Cain is a Gnostic myth[47] that is similar to the story in the Book of Enoch that tells of rebellious angels that came to earth to mate with human women to produce the Nephilim, beings whose ancestry was partly human and partly derived from the evil angels that were said to have fathered them.[48]

Furthermore, similar to the KKK, many Gnostic groups were noted for their anti-Semitism, which may have been due, in part, to their belief that the Jewish G-d of creation was an evil spiritual entity. Many survivors of ritual abuse allege traumatic experiences associated with what they believe to be KKK activities and many of these individuals describe the KKK as a cult.

It has been further alleged that other cult-like organizations have developed in tandem with or under the influence of Freemasonry and Western occultism. Two of the earlier such groups were the Hell Fire Clubs and the Bavarian Order of the Illuminati (Melanson, 2009), both founded by Masons. There actually were several Hell Fire Clubs, but the best known was the Friars of Medmenham in England led by Sir Francis Dashwood, who also was a member of a neo-Druid brotherhood.[49] Dashwood’s particular Hell Fire Club was more accurately called the Friars of St. Francis of Wycombe, and when he later purchased Medmenham Abbey (pronounced med-nem), they also became known as the Friars of Medmenham. Curiously, when Sir Francis was renovating the abbey, he had the workmen inscribe “Do what you will” in Renaissance French over one of the doorways. Over a hundred years later, this phrase, expressed in slightly different language, would become the motto for one of the more notorious occultists of the modern era, Aleister Crowley.

The Friars of St. Francis were known to provide their membership with orgies and sometimes performed Black Masses and other similar ceremonial acts. Nevertheless, some authors have interpreted their unorthodox behaviors as not genuinely satanic but more as a kind of organized libertinism.[50] English aristocrats and high government officials frequented the club. For example, Sir Francis was himself a personal friend and adviser to King George III and a longtime Member of Parliament who later became Chancellor of the Exchequer. Benjamin Franklin, who was a high-ranking Mason in the American colonies, visited the Hell Fire Club in 1758 while he was in England meeting with representatives the English government on behalf of the American colonies.[51]

The Bavarian Order of the Illuminati was not the first organization to use the Latin word illuminati (the enlightened ones) to refer to their brotherhood. However, the order established by Adam Weishaupt in 1776, and first known as the Order of the Perfectibilists, is one of the better known. It has been alleged that Weishaupt created the Order of the Illuminati for the purpose of infiltrating Masonic lodges in order to exert influence over issues of international politics.[52] Many of my clients have made reference to their abusers as Illuminati, either during our sessions or in their journal notes or drawings. Raschke (1990), among others, has described historic accounts of their alleged diabolical ritualism. It would be difficult to prove that the Order of the Illuminati continues to exist given that it is supposedly a secret organization. Nevertheless, occult groups that do currently exist sometimes attest to continuing the traditions of the Illuminati.[53] This is an area that deserves further investigation by all of us who work with such clients. It is clearly a repeated theme.

Another Masonic brotherhood temporarily under the jurisdiction of the Grand Orient in Italy (G.O.I.) was found to be involved in organized crime and tied to international banking disasters, drug deals, and terrorism. According to anthropologist Lilith Mahmud (2012):

> Propaganda 2, or “P2” for short, was the name of a covert Masonic lodge operating within the G.O.I., the largest and oldest men-only Masonic Order in the country. In the pyramidal structure of Freemasonry, a covert lodge operates as a secret society within a secret society. Its existence is known only to the Grand Master, but not to any of the other lodges within the same organization. (p. 1187)

Mahmud (2012) further explained that the Grand Master of the G.O.I. revoked P2's charter in 1976, and after that time, P2 operated as "a secret criminal society, no longer under the purview of the G.O.I." (p. 1187). The Italian police and secret service found records that documented the membership of over 1,000 individuals that included prestigious international business and political leaders:

> When the existence of the P2 was revealed to the public, what emerged was the specter of an organized network of powerful men plotting right-wing coups, terrorist acts, and multi-million dollar bank fraud throughout Italy, Europe, and Latin America. The P2 was, therefore, the very embodiment of long held fears about Freemasonry: a brotherhood of men conspiring to bring about a new world order through oligarchic control of the financial markets, the media, the military, and the governments of individual countries. (Mahmud, 2012, p. 1188)

Other Masonic- and Gnostic-influenced occult organizations emerged in the 19th and 20th centuries, including the Hermetic[54] Order of the Golden Dawn and the Ordo Templi Orientis (O.T.O.). A well-known figure associated with both of these organizations was Aleister Crowley. On the cover of his autobiography, The Confessions of Aleister Crowley (1979), he is described as "a saint of the Gnostic church." He was also reputedly a high-ranking Mason and one who called himself the Great Beast, 666, of Revelation. There has been some disagreement regarding whether Crowley was a satanist.[55] One might argue that he was, more precisely, a dualist, a modern Gnostic of the libertine type and a practitioner of ritual black magic. One could also demonstrate that not all black magic is satanic. For example, in the West African juju cult described by Oke (1989), there is clearly a practice of ritual abuse with altered states of consciousness but no particular belief in Satan. Not all ritual abuse is satanic, although some occult Gnostic groups probably come close to what many Western people would call satanic. However, in some cases it would be more accurate to label them Luciferian, neo-Gnostic, or dualistic. There may also be cults that incorporate rituals involving or mentioning Satan along with other spiritual entities and concepts but in which Satan is not considered the focus of their beliefs or energies. With that being said, Crowley's published opinions and acts do show a fascination with demonic occultism.

Crowley devised a sexualized ritual, the Gnostic Mass,[56] which became the central ceremony for the O.T.O. He practiced sex magic (e.g., sexual rituals intended to cause altered states of consciousness) and he admitted to engaging in ritual human sacrifice.[57] According to Ashe (1974, p. 235), Crowley was noted for “hypnotic powers,” which he freely used in sexual seduction. Ritual abuse survivors often describe similar reactions to their perpetrators, a process that they sometimes call accessing. Ashe (1974) also observed that Crowley was “like three or four different men” (p. 235). Crowley himself reported altered states of consciousness in which he confronted other imaginary, dissociative, or spiritual entities. Did Crowley have a dissociative disorder? Crowley advocated self-punishment by cutting oneself with a razor blade.[58] Therapists who work with ritual abuse survivors commonly note that self-injury through cutting is one of the most common characteristics of those with this diagnosis.

Crowley joined the Golden Dawn on November 18, 1898. By the spring of 1900, he had been expelled. In 1901 there was a public scandal involving the conviction of Theo Horos (also known as Frank Jackson) and his wife for the rape of a 16-year-old girl. The judge concluded that the couple had used Golden Dawn rituals in the sexual exploitation of minors.[59] According to Kaczynski (1993), other members of the Golden Dawn were practicing sexual rituals within its inner order.

The Golden Dawn demonstrated sufficient credibility in the occult community to attract the luminary Irish poet W. B. Yeats to its membership. However, the organization was plagued with other problems. The Golden Dawn was created in response to the alleged discovery of mysterious German documents attesting to the organization’s ancient, occult heritage transmitted to its British founders. These papers were translated by one of its founding members, Dr. W. W. Westcott, a Mason. Later it was thought that the documents were probably forged, but forgery was a dubious explanation because such an act was out of character for Westcott. In an effort to clarify this question, author Ellic Howe presented samples of Westcott’s writing to a handwriting expert, who made the observation that Westcott probably had multiple personality disorder (MPD) because of his markedly different writing styles. Gerald Suster, a Golden Dawn advocate (1987, pp. 110−171), took issue with the MPD interpretation, noting the inconsistent handwriting styles of another leading occultist and Golden Dawn Adept, Israel Regardie, who had never been diagnosed with MPD or any other psychiatric disorder. Of course, an alternate interpretation is that both men may have had dissociative disorders caused by traumatic ritual experiences and that the accurate diagnoses were not consistently being made because few mental health professionals then knew how to appropriately formulate these diagnoses.

Karl Kellner and Theodor Reuss, both high-ranking Masons, founded the Ordo Templi Orientis. In 1912, the O.T.O. published the following:

> Our Order possesses the KEY which opens up all Masonic and Hermetic secrets, namely, the teaching of sexual magic, and this teaching explains, without exception, all the secrets of Nature, all the symbolism of Freemasonry and all systems of religion.[60]

Frater U∴ D∴ (1991) wrote about the practice of sex magic from the occultist’s point of view. He observed that altered states of consciousness are sought by sex magicians through erotic rituals to generate what he called “magical powers” (p. 11). In this process, one experiences what he called “Gnostic trances” (p. 11). This author encouraged the ritualistic breaking of sexual taboos emphasizing that “by employing bizarre, unusual practices, we access those altered states of awareness which provide the key to magical power” (p. 17).

In 1912 Crowley was appointed head of the O.T.O. for Great Britain, and in 1922 his authority extended over the entire O.T.O. The O.T.O. was first established in North America in 1912, when Charles Stanfield Jones, along with 12 associates, was chartered as the Agapé Camp in the Vancouver area of British Columbia. It is curious in that one of the local communities, Victoria, was the location of the first case of ritual abuse reported by a mental health professional (Smith & Pazder, 1980). In a book published by the O.T.O., it was reported that this organization has since spread to the “US, England, South America, Germany, Norway, the Balkans, New Zealand and Australia” (Ad Veritatem IX, 1990, p. 97). According to this O.T.O. publication, the international headquarters is now located in New York City.

Another organization, similar to the O.T.O. with its Masonic structure, philosophy, and origins, is the F.S., the Fraternitas Saturni or Brotherhood of Saturn. According to Eldred Flowers (1990),[61] who wrote about this group from a sympathetic point of view, it is the “most unabashedly Luciferian organization in the modern Western occult revival” (p. xv). Like the O.T.O. and much of the Masonic literature, the F.S. also places considerable importance on Gnostic terminology and concepts. Flowers made frequent reference to “Saturn-Gnosis” and specific sexual rituals were described.

In London, Robert and Mary Ann de Grimston founded the Church of the Process of the Final Judgment (better known as the Process Church) in the early 1960s. It was there that the de Grimstons broke away from their affiliation with the Church of Scientology, which had been established by L. Ron Hubbard.[62] They proposed a theology based on four deities: Christ, Jehovah, Lucifer, and Satan. They essentially created a dualistic matrix in which people could explore the extent to which their own personalities were expressions of these four proposed archetypal gods. The similarity of this point of view and Gnosticism is obvious and was noted by Carl Raschke (1990).

The Process provided role-playing exercises in which the individuals involved expressed or presented “alternate personal identities” (Bainbridge, 1991, p. 304).[63] Some authors suggest that there may have been a connection between the Process Church and the ritualistic homicides perpetrated in the late 1960s by Charles Manson (Raschke, 1990; Terry, 1987). I have consulted with clients who believed that their particular cult used some of the philosophy of the Process Church or that they had been abused in one of its subgroups or affiliates.

Another example of modern occultism is the neo-pagan movement, particularly the Craft of Wicca, or what is sometimes referred to as white witchcraft. Some would say that white witchcraft is a contradiction in terms. But like all other new religious movements, it deserves to be understood on the basis of its own actual characteristics and practices and not on the preconceived ideas we may have about it.

An Introduction to Wicca

While living in England, I taught university psychology courses in the evening. One of my students, a young man named “Ken,” was soft-spoken, bright, articulate, and he wore a gold-colored chain with an inverted five-pointed star around his neck. Once after class, I asked him what the star symbolized. He smiled in his friendly way and said, “I’m a pagan. I follow the religion of Wicca.” I later learned that some Wiccans prefer to use the term neo-pagan to make clear that they are part of the new movement to revitalize ancient pagan practices. Because I was unfamiliar with Wicca, Ken explained that it was a nature-worshipping religion, “white witchcraft.” It was a form of witchcraft, according to Ken, that advocated “doing no harm.”

At the time, I did not realize that this five-pointed star had any special meaning. Later I learned that the pentagram, or five-pointed star, has long been a symbol used by various people who practice ritual magic. When the star is inverted in a Wiccan ritual, it may be used in the ceremonial invocation of a non-satanic deity that Wiccans call the horned god (Crowley, 1989). However, to my knowledge, this symbol has only two other meanings. It may either signify the Order of the Eastern Star, a Masonic women’s auxiliary organization, or modern satanism. Most Wiccans attempt to distance themselves from overtly demonic cults and frequently assert that they are not satanists in their publications and policy statements.

Sometime after returning stateside and entering private practice, I was asked to consult with a patient hospitalized on a medical unit of the nearby community hospital. The patient, diagnosed with multiple sclerosis,[1] was referred by a neurologist colleague for psychological evaluation. Her name was “Erin,” and she was a Wiccan.

My discovery of Erin’s religion was accidental. She had not intended to tell anyone at the hospital because she expected a hostile, judgmental reaction. After all, despite its big-city sophistication, Dallas was a conservative community. I noticed that Erin had not completed the item designating her religious preference on the hospital intake form, and I simply asked her about her religion. After a moment’s hesitation, Erin said that she did not usually discuss her religion with strangers. I told her that she did not have to discuss her religion if that was her preference. She hesitated again and then said she was a pagan. Once Erin realized that I was not critical of her religious beliefs, alter identities began to emerge and converse with me. Erin was co-conscious with some of her alter personalities, but she was amnestic for the presence of others.

Like most of the other multiple personality disorder patients, Erin’s alters eventually described sadistic childhood abuse. None of her alters made allegations of ritual abuse per se, but because I was still relatively unfamiliar with ritual abuse, I did not know how to access the alters that might have memories of such abuse had it had occurred. I later found that people with dissociation of identity not only have a variety of internalized alter identities, but that these alters were also often organized in a series of “layers” or “levels.” Generally speaking, the more deeply one explores these levels, the worse are the memories. It is as if the layers are organized to protect the survivor from her most painful recollections by insinuating many levels of less traumatizing dissociated information in between. Cult memories, when present, are usually found at the deeper levels of this internal “system.” I presumed this patient had experienced no ritual abuse because she never talked about it, but, in retrospect, this possibility really cannot be ruled out because I did not know how to explore it at that time.

I asked about Erin’s pagan religion in further detail. She told me that much of it was secret and, for that reason, there were things that she could not disclose. However, an alter personality named “Skye” emerged to talk to me. Skye said that she was a Wiccan high priestess and that she had more authority to discuss the subject than did Erin. She laughed and said that Erin didn’t really know many of the secrets anyway. Skye also claimed that she had psychic abilities.

Skye explained that in Wicca, there was the belief that "whatever one does, it comes back in threes." For this reason, she said, Wiccans usually do not engage in the practice of black magic. However, she admitted that Wicca could have a dark side. She explained that Wiccan rituals were a celebration of life and encouraged a sense of unity with nature. While describing some of the goddesses and gods of Wicca, she explained that most Wiccans did not have a literal belief in these deities, but that they were viewed as archetypes or representations of personal characteristics that people can find in themselves. She admitted that in Wicca there were some rituals that were sexual in nature but she said that children were not allowed to be present at those. Skye imparted more information about Wicca, but it seemed that she was holding back somewhat, perhaps out of respect and concern for the element of secrecy that she acknowledged was part of her religion. In order to help me understand Wicca, Skye recommended a book called Earth Magic: A Dianic Book of Shadows by Marion Weinstein (1980).

As I delved further into Wicca, I learned that its workings are not entirely secret. Numerous publications about Wicca are accessible to the general readership. Furthermore, many Wiccan rituals have been openly publicized and, in some cases, are open to anyone who wishes to participate.

I was especially intrigued by the Wiccan concept of magic. Other clients with dissociative disorders often have similar beliefs even when they do not admit to being Wiccans. It is curious how such beliefs seem to survive in an era so thoroughly dominated by science.

Erin sometimes described out-of-body experiences in which she reportedly floated above her body and observed herself from above. She said that she learned to do this when she was a child and did not want to feel the abuse her body was experiencing. I asked Erin whether she believed that she was literally able to float out of her body or whether she thought this was merely an imaginary experience. She laughed and said, "everything happens in your imagination."

In order to clarify what Erin was saying, I asked her if we could perform a little experiment. I requested Erin to turn her head away from me and, when she did, I asked her if she could let her mind float out of her body. She agreed to do this. I wrote a simple word in large letters on the writing tablet that I was holding. I asked Erin if she would watch me from the ceiling of the room and read the word that I had written. She reportedly did so, but it is probably no surprise that she was unable to correctly tell me what I had written.

Erin was unimpressed by this experiment. It seemed irrelevant to her whether she could, in fact, see from above. What was significant to her, as she explained, was that she was able to have the experience of leaving her body. Whether or not the experience corresponded to objective reality seemed to be of no consequence to her. Erin's point of view also seemed to be similar to those of other patients as well as authors who have written about Wicca, magic, and the occult.

One could argue that Erin's perspective represented a metaphorical belief in magic. Such a point of view would not necessarily reflect a literal conviction in the existence of paranormal events. It may merely represent the belief in magic as a metaphor. In other words, people can have mental images of magical experiences such as dissociating out of their bodies. Although such fantasies don't necessarily have any objective correspondence, they are genuine mental events that may have significance to the individual experiencing them. On the other hand, a metaphorical approach to magic need not be totally without practical use in dealing with the "real world." Erin told me that she believed that she was able to maintain her sanity through her ability to dissociate away her pain and terror. Through fantasies, she had learned to disregard external reality when the need arose.

Margot Adler, in her book Drawing down the Moon (1986), wrote:

> A few scholars and specialists have studied Neo-Paganism, but the public continues to have an inaccurate picture of it. Misunderstandings begin at the most basic level, with the meanings of words used to describe beliefs and attitudes. Let us consider the word, magic. Most people define it as superstition or belief in the supernatural. In contrast, most magicians, Witches and other magical practitioners do not believe that magic has anything to do with the supernatural. (p. 6)

Adler, who is a contemporary leading figure in the Wiccan movement, is also the granddaughter of Alfred Adler and the niece of Alexandra Adler. She describes magic as "techniques that allow communication with hidden portions of the self " (p. 160).

Adler also presented a metaphorical view of gods and goddesses and their corresponding rituals. Her perspective seems to be that Wiccans typically do not have a literal belief in their deities as much as they view the gods and goddesses as representative of character traits, emotions, and personal strivings. Adler (1986) cited a letter she received in which the writer stated, “I do not believe in gods as real personalities on any plane, or in any dimension. Yet, I do believe in gods as symbols or personifications of universal principles” (p. 35). According to Adler’s explanation, Wiccans seem to eschew dogmas but they value the psychological experience created in their rituals and gatherings.

Adler used the term neo-paganism to distinguish her religion from the pagan beliefs of the ancients as well as from the current pagan beliefs of other cultures where they have existed uninterruptedly. Wicca has been frequently conceptualized as neo-pagan because it is not clear that it is the continuation of any ancient religion.

The theories regarding Wicca’s origins vary in a manner that parallels the disputes about medieval witchcraft already discussed in this book. However, one difference is that Wicca occurs in the present and thus is, to some degree, open to observation. In the case of medieval witchcraft, we must rely on historical documents written by individuals who often had a vested interest in representing witchcraft as an undesirable, if not despicable, practice.

Wicca appears to be a modern religious and social movement that has been shaped by a number of factors. The idea that it is a remnant of an ancient Western nature-worshipping religion cannot be completely ruled out. It is also possible that Wicca is, in part, related to methods of folk healing frequently seen in many cultures. Certainly, there are similarities between Wiccans and the shamans, witch doctors, and other preindustrial healers. Were there such healers in England? Numerous sources, both historic (e.g., Burton, 1621/1927; Scot, 1584/1972) and modern (Haining, 1975; Davies, 1999), document the presence of “cunning” men and women[2] in Britain who provided folk healing in much the same manner as the curanderos or shamans in other cultures.[3] However, as has already been noted, there is often a fine line between shamans, sorcerers, and witches. Thus, one might argue that white witchcraft is to some degree a variant of shamanism.

Although there has been much criticism of Margaret Murray’s thesis that a secret, pagan, nature-worshipping religion somehow survived in western Europe, the truth is we simply do not have enough data to know with certainty either way. On the other hand, if we carefully observe the modern features of Wicca, we can clearly see that at least some of these characteristics are not derived from an ancient Western nature-worshipping religion. For example, several books[4] exhibit a picture of a Wiccan marriage, or handfasting, officiated by Alex Sanders,[5] one of the leading figures of the Wiccan movement. In the picture are found the words “Tetragrammaton”[6] and “Elohim”[7] between the inner and outer rims of a magical circle. These words are not related to any primitive western European nature-worshipping religion. Instead, they are more likely borrowed from the Christian Cabala and Hermetic Qabalah that were used in a variety of other magical traditions such as those practiced by the Rosicrucians and spurious Masonic groups. It could be argued that Wicca is an amalgam of different beliefs and traditions and that a variety of factors (including the following) have probably affected its development and growth.

1. British folk healers with their magical traditions of treating illness have been in existence and have conducted business for hundreds of years (or more) with some secretiveness due to the periodic persecutions of occultists and heretics. Their beliefs and customs may have influenced Wicca.
2. Other esoteric systems, including occult fraternal organizations, individual occultists, and some practitioners whose traditions have been passed down generationally, may have contributed to current practice and lore of Wicca.
3. Popular psychology and especially the self-help movement has been a source of encouragement for people finding greater happiness and meaning in life through introspective self-exploration. For some, this has apparently become an alternative track for spiritual growth as well as a methodology for those wanting escape from the confines of more traditional religions. Some Wiccan rituals resemble group therapy, particularly the encounter groups of the 1960s and 1970s.
4. The feminist movement has made people more aware of the injustices done to women, children, and other unfairly subjugated groups. Wicca eliminates the stereotype of god as a male entity with exclusively male clergy. In Wicca, much emphasis is placed on goddesses and priestesses.

According to Vivianne Crowley (1989), “the origin of Wicca lies not in the distant past but its modern history really begins in 1951 when, with the repeal of the Witchcraft Act, people were free to talk openly about the ‘Old Religion’ ” (p. 20). Whatever the origins of Wicca may be, it appears to be a religious movement growing in numbers and in influence. In her 1986 edition of Drawing down the Moon, Adler estimated that there are “at least 50,000 to 100,000 active self-identified Pagans or members of Wicca in the United States” (p. 455). In her more recent 2006 edition, she estimated that there were more than a million neo-pagans worldwide. She also discussed what appears to be a growing connection between the Unitarian Universalist Association and the neo-pagan movement. I was invited to speak on the subject of ritual abuse at a local Unitarian church, and I found that a large proportion of the church members were reportedly Wiccans. I also noticed that literature provided at the information counter in the church vestibule gave announcements and information about Wiccan lectures and other activities.

Wiccans share some other similarities with other forms of Western occultism. Francis King (1970) argued that Gerald Gardner, the official founder of modern Wicca, had assistance from Aleister Crowley in developing the rituals for Wicca.[8] Although they are supposed to be secret, at least some of the ranks, rituals, implements, and traditions of Wicca have been described in various books.

Like Freemasonry, Wicca commonly has three levels, or ranks, and the designations accorded to these ranks vary from coven (group) to coven but often include titles such as priest and priestess, magus (for males), witch queen, high priestess, and high priest. Many rituals are conducted within a circle drawn with a nine-foot diameter. Some ceremonial acts are performed naked or skyclad, and some are performed clothed, often in ceremonial robes or other costumes. Wiccans reportedly eschew violent rituals, but symbolic scourging is practiced during some gatherings, and sometimes “the Great Rite,” ritual sexual intercourse, is performed symbolically or in actuality. Wiccans sometimes call their individual groups covens, and these are traditionally supposed to consist of 13 members but in actual practice may vary in size.[9]

Some individuals who were ritually abused in violent cults reported that they were attracted to Wicca in order to carry out some likeness of previous rituals, but without the trauma. I have heard rumors about Wiccans who try to help people escape other, malignant cults. Although patients of mine have stated that some followers of destructive cults occasionally attend Wiccan gatherings for the purpose of recruiting to their own particular group, I have been unable to either verify or disprove these claims. Nevertheless, I continue to hear similar reports from a variety of different ritual abuse survivors.

Is Wicca a possession cult? Does it promote dissociation? It is not clear that the experience of possession is an essential feature of Wicca. However, individuals who have witnessed Wiccan ceremonies, as well as published accounts of their rituals, seem to indicate that possession states sometimes occur. In the ritual of Drawing down the Moon, for example, the high priestess is sometimes said to respond with an altered state of consciousness that may include features of possession (Guiley, 1989). Luhrmann (1989) also wrote about the development of alternate identities in Wiccan rituals through activities that resemble role-playing. However, this author provided no description of participants developing involuntary dissociation of identity (as is common among patients with dissociation of identity). In Earth Magic, Marion Weinstein (1980) explained what she called the “alternate lives” that coexist within the individual involved in Wicca, perhaps reflecting Jungian views of personality as being normally multifaceted and somewhat dissociated.[10] Or possibly, in some cases, these alternate lives are the result of genuinely dissociated personalities.

Satanism?

The term satanism has appeared frequently in this book. Exactly what is satanism? Like other concepts associated with obscurity and secrecy, it is difficult to define in a precise, scientific manner. Satanism may represent an organized belief system or religion such as the Church of Satan. It may be understood merely as a vague and dramatized concept of extreme rebellion against Western norms and conventions such as the “satanism” of some death metal rock musicians. It may be a mythological vestige of medieval religious thinking that still lingers in modern times. It may also be a deviant practice used to intimidate and control others through ritual abuse.

If satanism is sometimes associated with ritual abuse, one can also say that not all ritual abuse is satanic.[1] Many of these abusive practices have appeared in societies or under conditions where Satan is not a recognized spiritual entity.[2] In earlier times, it was not uncommon for Western scholars and world travelers to ascribe the influence of Satan as an explanation for the religious practices of people in less developed countries, which, to them, appeared to be idolatrous or violent. Even now, one occasionally hears the notion that if something is not Christian, it is the result of Satan’s power or influence.

How can we distinguish satanism from other pagan religions and satanic ritual abuse from similar malevolent practices by non-satanic individuals and groups?[3] Many problems are evident in attempting to answer this question, but perhaps the most formidable is the reported secrecy associated with allegedly abusive satanic cults. This is not to say that all variants of satanism are secretive.

For example, the Church of Satan, founded on April 30 (Walpurgisnacht), 1966, in San Francisco, California, openly operates as a religion. Its founder, Anton LaVey (1930–1997), repeatedly asserted that the Church of Satan was not engaged in any illegal activity such as ritual murder or sexual abuse of children. Instead, this new religious movement publicly espouses a position of hedonism and materialism along with the rejection of Christianity. Its publicly stated philosophy is so mild mannered that author Francis King (1989b) commented that “there is nothing particularly Satanic about this” (p. 221).

Although the Church of Satan is sometimes portrayed as relatively tame, other accounts are not so benign. Arthur Lyons (1988) wrote that during a “lecture on cannibalism, a severed human leg was brought from East San Francisco Bay Hospital by a physician-member, basted in Triple Sec, and served to the less queasy in the group” (p. 107). However, cult crime expert Carl Raschke (1990) cited cultist Michael Aquino, who claimed that this “was actually leg of mutton roasted with exotic herbs” (p. 240). Nevertheless, Blanche Barton (1990), a biographer of LaVey and Magistra Templi Rex of the organization, wrote that this was “a cooked thigh of a young white woman” (p. 78).

The Church of Satan was described from an anthropological perspective by Edward J. Moody (1974) who, by his own account, was a member of the Church of Satan in San Francisco for two-and-a-half years. Moody observed that one common denominator of the membership of this organization that he referred to as the Church of the Trapezoid was that the members appeared to be socially deviant in some way, although Moody asserted that the Church of the Trapezoid[4] appeared to be an effective means of resocialization for these individuals—at least within this group. Thus, Moody (1974) argued that the Church of Satan may assist these people in developing a more functional and adaptive mode of living and concluded that “perhaps it is for this reason that marginal religions such as the Church of the Trapezoid should be encouraged” (p. 382).

A former member of the Church of Satan, Michael Aquino, established his own brotherhood, the Temple of Set. This organization also professes to be law-abiding, but in 1990 Aquino was recommended for separation from the U.S. Army because of the Army’s determination of “probable cause” in a case of alleged sexual abuse of children. However, he was never convicted.[5]

Where did satanism begin? In an indirect form, the predecessors of satanism may be found in archaic religions in which gods were revered, not because of their inherent goodness, but because of their perceived power. The ancient Greek and Roman gods were such deities. Few of them showed many admirable traits or strength of character. These gods were often portrayed as possessing the foibles and veniality of mere mortals. Many of the cults devoted to such gods and goddesses allegedly conducted traumatizing rituals (e.g., the mystery cults). On the other hand, some religions specifically worshipped and supplicated overtly evil deities.

However, in some cases involving the worship of "evil," appearances may be deceiving. For example, the Yazidi sect of Turkey, Syria, Armenia, and Iran worship Ahriman (who, in the Zoroastrian religion, is roughly the equivalent of Satan). Yet the Yazidi believe that Ahriman is no longer evil, having asked for and received G-d's forgiveness, and consider it an outrage to equate their Ahriman with the Satan of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.[6]

In other cases, what appears to be the worship of an "evil deity" may simply represent the devotion to a spiritual entity who no longer enjoys favored status in the prevailing culture of a given region. There are examples in history whereby a culture's demons were really past divinities no longer revered and sometimes given new and less attractive roles. Such revolutions among the gods sometimes resulted from conquests, whereupon the new gods of the conquerors took the place previously held by the gods of the conquered.

In other instances, evil may be revered or worshipped outright. In cultures where Christianity is the prevalent "white light religion," one might assume that the worship of evil would entail some devotion to Lucifer or Satan, the primary names given to the European American spiritual representations of evil. To many traditional Christians, Satan and Lucifer are equivalent and merely different names for the same demon. But some theologians make the distinction that Lucifer is the name of Satan before his fall. Within some occult traditions, there is even a clearer differentiation between Satan and Lucifer. As already mentioned, within certain cults Lucifer has sometimes been portrayed as a Promethean figure, the "bringer of light." In the tradition of some Gnostics, Lucifer was represented as the rebellious spirit opposed to Christianity and the G-d of creation—who was instead characterized as the one responsible for introducing evil by creating a flawed material world. Thus, Luciferianism reverses the Judeo-Christian-Islamic concept of a good creator and an evil demon. Satan is occasionally represented in such relatively benign terms[7] but more often Satan is described as the personification of evil. Such a satanic theology attributes goodness to the Judeo-Christian G-d, but satanists venerate Satan because he is perceived to be more powerful, or because the cultist might believe that he or she is beyond redemption by a benign deity. In this system of thinking, goodness itself may be characterized as a weak, ineffective, or futile goal. Spence (1993) described a similar dichotomy in views of satanism and Luciferianism, although he defined his terms slightly differently:

> Modern groups practicing Satanism are small and obscure, and unorganized as they are, details concerning them are conspicuous by their absence. Plentiful details, however, are forthcoming concerning the cults of Lucifer, but much discrimination is required in dealing with these, the bulk of the literature on the subject being manifestly imaginative and willfully misleading. The members of the church of Lucifer are of two groups, those who regard the deity they adore as the evil principle, thus approximating to the standpoint of the Satanists, and those who look upon him as the true god in opposition to Adonai or Jehovah, whom they regard as an evil deity who has with fiendish ingenuity miscreated the world of man to the detriment of humanity. (p. 123)

The wearing of dark, hooded robes is a commonly reported ceremonial practice of these cults, but survivors describe a variety of different costumes and ritual acts. One of my patients arrived at my office with a ceremonial cowl.[8] When she brought it to me, neither she nor I knew what it was. Without identifying the patient to whom the item belonged, I asked other survivors if they recognized the article of clothing and I was told that it was a cowl, a form of ceremonial headdress. The survivors indicated it was authentic, pointing to details of its construction that I had not noticed. The patient who brought it to me reported that she had awakened from a trance in her own house. The cowl was on her head but she didn’t know how or why it had gotten there. Some survivors describe the wearing of a miter by high-ranking members of their cult. The miter is a somewhat cone-shaped ceremonial hat worn by Catholic bishops and abbots. Some of the artwork from earlier times depicting the trial and execution of “heretics” (i.e., Gnostics) during the Inquisition shows them dressed in miters and robes.

Sexual abuse, torture,[9] and murder are often alleged to be components of satanic cult rituals. However, some survivors claim that they witnessed rituals involving the torture or murder of a person that were simulated. In these cases, the feigned killing was conducted in a sufficiently realistic manner that many of the participants believed that they witnessed the actual ceremonial killing of a person. In the Fran’s Day Care criminal case, a child testified that he was told to close his eyes and that his perpetrator was cutting his arm to perform surgery to replace his bone with the bone of Satan. The child revealed to the court that he unobtrusively peeked and saw that the “surgery” was not actually taking place.

An adult patient described witnessing a naked woman who was tied to a chair in front of a table where a bloody razor blade was prominently displayed. The woman was then blindfolded, and the perpetrator took a straight pin and slowly ran it across the victim’s body, causing slight scratches. According to my patient, the victim’s reaction showed her terror—she believed she was being sliced with the razor blade and consequently, she appeared to go in and out of numerous dissociated mental states.

Acts of ritual murder also have been reportedly simulated for the purpose of terrorizing those present into silence, reinforcing obedience, and creating further dissociated mental states. “Actual human sacrifice of children and adults may also be performed, but only on special occasions. Mock killings are performed more often and are designed to look as believable as real killings” (Smith, 1993, p. 130). Barb Jackson (1993), another survivor, described her observations of an abusive cult in which the rituals actually occurred but sometimes they were simulated. Both reportedly had the capacity for being overwhelmingly traumatic.

Hearing countless reports of ritual abuse from my clients and others an obvious question arose: why would anyone want to do these things? These stories typically lack any redeeming features whatsoever. What would motivate people to do these things? When asked, my clients sometimes had answers. The most commonly given explanation was that such rituals provided an intoxicating sense of power to those who were in the role of perpetrating the abuse. The individual perpetrating the abuse may experience a sense of power over life and death, whether simulated or in actuality. During such abusive acts, perpetrators exert profound control over the abused and dominion over the creation of what might appear to be new souls or, as one patient explained, “the souls of dead people,” that could then “inhabit” the body of someone present at the ceremony. In reality, these “souls” are alternate or dissociated personalities created via traumatizing rituals.

Nevertheless, in such a role the cultist not only “plays god,” but, for the purposes of those present, actually becomes the god (e.g., through a state of possession) and is recognized, respected, and worshipped as the god by the followers. On other occasions, the cultist simply enjoys being in the powerful role of a god.[10] The following was written by one of my clients about such an interaction. She described an abusive male who repetitively claimed he was G-d before sexually abusing her:

> Was taken into a room and thrown down on a bed. The man was very big and blonde. Muscular. Over 6 ft. tall. Very angular features. Had been "led" to the room by others. "He" told them to leave me alone with him. Said he was going to teach me a lesson. We talked back to him. He got right in my face and said he was God. He repeated it over and over. He kept saying he was god, "God, God, God." When we first were taken in to the room, we were scared. After he kept saying god, we were very compliant.[11]

Another ritually abused patient sometimes switched to altered states, describing in terror her experience of being tortured by "gods." But the gods she described were not metaphysical abstractions; they were merely people who had taken on the roles or identities of gods in rituals that she had been forced to attend. My client called one of these "gods" Satan.[12]

The pursuit of power[13] may become attractive to those who have been placed in a role of extreme powerlessness, a feature of being in the victim role in such a cult. Apparently all, or almost all, members of satanic cults reportedly are, at one time or another, in the victim roles of these abusive rituals. However, as one's rank increases in the cult, the extent of victimization decreases; thus as the cult member rises in power, he or she is increasingly placed in the role of a perpetrator of painful ceremonies and procedures.[14] Power can be desirable for its defensive as well as offensive potential. Getting power decreases the harm that is done to the individual. Sometimes the power of "the dark side" may be sought because the individual has lost any hope of protection from "good" people or a good deity. As one patient explained while in the state of a child alter, "God can't protect you. Satan can."

Several clients described rituals in which Christian ceremonies were parodied and the victim of the abuse was told to pray to G-d for help. No help was forthcoming because the participants deliberately orchestrated the situation so that no aid would appear under such conditions. In some circumstances, no relief was offered until the victim made a sincere plea to Satan or until the victim was transformed by the torture into another identity (through dissociation), one who was more loyal to or compliant with the demon.

The power that exists in satanic (and Luciferian) cults is reportedly reflected in an organized hierarchy with incremental ranks.[15] These positions may vary somewhat from one group to another, but one example is the following: page, knight, priest (or priestess), prince (or princess), high priest (or high priestess), king (or queen), savior, and god (sometimes goddess, but goddess is not always the feminine equivalent to god and vice versa). As one increases in rank, one is taught more about the programming cues or “triggers” used in ceremonies with the other followers of the cult. Some of these triggers are relatively generic and thus can be used to exert control over a relatively large number of people. The example given earlier in this book is the repeated use of the word deep or deeper. When this word is used repeatedly, even unobtrusively (e.g., in ordinary conversation), many survivors of satanic and Luciferian cults will commonly go into a trance or show some other signs of change in mental state or other physical response such as an eyeblink or altered gaze. Those who increase in rank are not only taught a variety of triggering stimuli that can be used in controlling others (via such programming methods) but also reportedly retrained so that their responses to these lower-level generic cues are less powerful in exerting control over them. Thus, survivors who are higher ranking in the satanic and similar cults are “trained” with more specific and idiosyncratic programming cues so that the majority of other members will not readily have control over them. Such control remains with the elite who are higher in rank and who have had more advanced training.

The origins of satanism are as obscure as other occult belief systems. One can never be precisely certain when such practices first began. Nevertheless, some of the historical accounts of satanism in Europe may provide at least some general hypotheses. The practice of satanism can be traced to a variety of possible sources: (1) European witchcraft, sorcery, and shamanism; (2) Gnostic-derived religions (e.g., the Cathari)[16] who viewed the established Church as evil and oppressive; (3) the general traditions of Western occultism (which are often seen as encompassing a “dark” or “left-handed path”); and (4) what Francis King (1989b) calls “the bad theology of a minority of Roman Catholic priests” (p. 219).

Centuries ago, after the military defeat of the Christian crusaders in Palestine, many Europeans may have come to doubt that G-d was really on their side. Others may have begun to doubt that G-d’s power was great enough to protect them. Countless natural disasters and an oppressive social order may have further challenged the beliefs and hopes of medieval Europeans. According to John Robinson (1989), the devastating bubonic plague epidemic of the 1300s, the so-called Black Death, may have seriously shattered the faith of many who survived this disaster. Some may have "believed an appeal to Satan was the only alternative, now that they had been abandoned by God" (p. 5).[17]

Some of the practices of the Church may have also provided opportunities for the further abuse of people. In addition to the Inquisition and inhumane persecution of those accused of heresy and witchcraft, there arose the notion that flagellation (whipping or scourging) was an acceptable way of doing penance or atonement for sins. In some cases, the practice of flagellation clearly became excessive, and the Church eventually prohibited certain kinds of extreme self-mortification. However, even today the Penitentes, or Brothers of Our Father, Jesus, a Catholic sect in New Mexico and northern Colorado, is said to engage in relatively severe forms of physical punishment. The Penitentes reportedly engage in various forms of "discipline"[18] that on rare occasions have left the penitent permanently injured or dead. According to Darley (1968), there are eyewitness accounts of actual crucifixions of people conducted by this sect in secrecy, although the Penitentes deny this accusation.[19]

The pervasive superstitions in medieval Europe were probably also a factor in the evolution of dark occultism. During that era, even the Church appeared to be steeped in superstition.[20] Many believers had a magical understanding of their religion and worship services evolved for procuring the death of a living person—the Death Mass—and the Amatory Mass, ostensibly for obtaining sex or love. There were also a number of defrocked priests and "wandering"[21] priests and bishops who performed such magical masses for a fee, although the seventh-century Council of Toledo banned the practice of the Death Mass.

The Black Mass may have evolved from such magical masses along with the alleged blasphemous and reversed masses attributed to various Gnostic and Gnostic-inspired sects. In The Golden Bough, Sir James Frazer (1963) described the Mass of St. Sécaire, which allegedly was conducted in Gascony, France, for the intended purpose of causing harm to another individual. This ritual involved sacrilegious acts and a reversal in the wording of the official Catholic mass.[22]

In the 15th century, French baron and onetime marshal of France, Gilles de Rais, was found to have engaged in numerous murderous and sadistic acts, some of which were alleged to be associated with bizarre rituals, where he was assisted by Francesco Prelatti, a Florentine priest and occultist (Hyatte, 1984). Gilles de Rais was noted to be a man whose character and personality seemed to be extremely variable at different times. Sometimes noted for his kindness and piety, he was distinguished for his bravery in his military assistance of Joan of Arc. However, there was a great deal of consistent testimony provided by witnesses as well as material evidence pointing to his guilt.[23] According to Francis King (1989b), satanism was sufficiently prevalent in 16th- and 17th-century France that its presence was noted by the police:

> It is difficult to know how widespread such Satanist activities were among the nonmonastic clergy of the Middle Ages, but they seem to have become common in the 16th and17th centuries. Exactly how common, no one knows, but if the rest of Catholic Europe was anything like the ecclestiastical underworld of Paris at that time, then they were very common indeed. For in France Satanism had attained the status of big business, its practitioners forming a kind of occult Mafia, a noisome octopus with tentacles which reached into almost every segment of Parisian society and which was uncovered by Nicolas de la Reynie, the Police Commissioner of Paris. (pp. 219–220)

Louis de Vanens, a self-avowed satanist, was arrested in November 1678 for forgery. A year later, fortune-teller Catherine Deshayes (using the name La Voisin) was arrested for poisoning. At her home were found not only poisons but also occult ritual paraphernalia. La Voisin admitted having sold poisons to young wives who intended to murder their elderly husbands. She also confessed to performing numerous abortions and organizing magical masses intended to cause death or amorous conquests. She allegedly had clandestine dealings with several priests, one of the more notorious being Abbé Guibourg. If these police investigations are to be trusted, then we should also note that material evidence was reportedly found, including the remains of infants who had allegedly been sacrificed during these Black Masses. Apparently many prominent individuals and members of the aristocracy were implicated, but when it was discovered that the Madame de Montespan, a mistress to King Louis XIV, was involved, the king silenced all who knew the details of the case and ordered that the records be destroyed.[24]

Later in 1839, Pierre Vintras, a foreman of a French cardboard-box factory, announced that he was a reincarnation of the prophet Elijah and that he had come to prepare the way for the second coming of Jesus. Professing that he had received a letter from Michael the Archangel, Vintras founded a sect called the Work of Mercy, which later was identified as the Church of Carmel. This group was condemned in 1848 by Pope Gregory XVI. Vintras performed strange masses in which bizarre events reportedly occurred including the spectacle of chalices magically overflowing with blood and blood appearing on communion wafers. Vintras claimed that his masses were intended to counteract the evil forces generated by satanists who, he said, were performing Black Masses during that time. However, the famous occultist Eliphas Levi reportedly observed these events and noted that the communion wafers used for these masses were triangular and reddish and that Vintras wore an inverted cross on his vestments, which, to him, were indicative of satanic influences.[25]

When Vintras died, the leadership of his sect passed to Abbé Boullan, a defrocked priest who had already achieved some notoriety when he and a nun by the name of Adèle Chevalier established a group called the Society for the Reparation of Souls, in which rituals involving sex magic and ritual murder were reported. Francis King (1991) wrote, "according to a document which survives in the Vatican archives, on 8 January 1860, Boullan and his mistress celebrated a Black Mass which incorporated the ritual sacrifice of their own bastard child" (pp. 116–117). He went on to say:

> Documents survive which provide evidence that Boullan and his disciples engaged, or imagined that they engaged, in sexual activities not only with angels and other heavenly beings but with the spirits of the mighty dead—Cleopatra and Alexander the Great, for example. The techniques used to achieve these ghostly copulations were largely masturbatory, the man or woman concerned was simply fantasizing that he or she was having sexual intercourse with a disembodied being. On occasion a human partner, also a member of the Church of Carmel, was involved. In this case each would imagine the other to be an angel. Boullan also seems to have approved of bestiality, sexual relationships between animals and human beings on the grounds that it speeded up the spiritual evolution of the animals concerned. There is no hard evidence that he acted on this theory, but some of his followers may have done so. Such teachings as those described above were only given to those in the inner circle of Boullan's so-called Church. In public he posed as a man of great, if eccentric piety. (p. 117)

Apparently Boullan had friendly encounters with J. K. Huysmans, who authored the novel Là Bas, depicting what many consider to be realistic descriptions of the Black Mass.[26] Huysmans, by his own admission, attended such a ritual.

In 1895 a Luciferian chapel was found in the Borghese Palace in Rome. The magnificent Palazzo Borghese had been leased to other residents by the Borghese family. Later, during an unexpected examination of the property by representatives of the family, they found a room with the words “Templum Palladicum”[27] inscribed on it with a large tapestry of Lucifer, an altar, and other occult paraphernalia.[28]

In modern America, satanic symbols and themes are visible and popular features of music, literature, and movies. Increasing numbers of reported survivors are coming forward to claim they are victims of such cults. Are these reports merely rumors or fantasies, or are people being victimized this way? Unless we seriously investigate these reports, we will never know for certain. We need to listen so that we can begin to realistically understand these experiences and work toward finding constructive solutions.

Nihilists and Revisionists

Ritual abuse survivors say they were told by their perpetrators that if they talked about being abused, no one would believe them. We also were skeptical in the beginning. Their stories were too bizarre to accept uncritically. We talked with other helping professionals and almost without exception they acknowledged their own initial surprise and incredulity. Yet these clients had comparable stories of abuse, similar psychological testing results, and the same pattern of dissociative and posttraumatic experiences. As time passed, other corroborating facts began to emerge.

In 1992 I was invited to participate in a panel discussion on the topic of “Breaking the Cycle of Child Abuse—Working Together for Change” at the Third Annual Texas Dissociative Disorders Conference. My topic was ritual abuse. Before beginning my presentation, I asked the audience of these 80–90 professionals representing the fields of psychology, counseling, and social work to respond with a show of hands to several questions. I asked the audience how many of those present thought that at least some of the allegations that their patients made about being ritually abused were true. About 90% of the audience raised their hands in the affirmative. I then polled the group inquiring who believed that none of the patients’ allegations about being ritually abused were true. No hands were raised. I asked how many were not sure. Only one woman raised her hand. Frankly, I was surprised to see the overwhelming acceptance of at least some of the stories about ritual abuse. Had this been a conference specifically addressing ritual abuse, the results might not have been so surprising. However, this conference dealt with dissociative disorders, and ritual abuse was only an adjunctive topic of discussion.

Psychologist George Greaves (1992) identified four groups of people responding to the ritual abuse controversy: “(1) nihilists, (2) apologists, (3) heuristics, and (4) methodologists” (p. 46). Greaves explained the nihilist position as follows:

> Nihilists seem to see their function as explaining how the presentations made by SCSs [Satanic Cult Survivors] cannot be true. They believe that because they can concoct alternative explanations of the data, the data are not true. They hold themselves to no other empirical criterion of truth, but they, nevertheless, rigorously demand such of others. Many of them fly the flag of scientific skepticism, but their skepticism—and their data gathering—are often unscientific in method. Rather than proving their hypotheses scientifically, they strike the pose of claiming that their hypotheses are factually correct until someone empirically proves them wrong. Among the nihilists I would include George Ganaway (1989, 1990), Richard Noll (1990), Arthur Lyons (1988), Robert Hicks (1990a, 1990b), and Kenneth Lanning (1989). Ganaway and Noll hold that SCS reports are the results of various kinds of psychodynamic distortions and/or artifacts induced in SCS subjects by clumsy or unwitting interviewers. Lyons, Hicks, and Lanning argue the reductio ad absurdum fallacy that if the reports were true, there would be physical evidence to back them up which they claim, there is not. (p. 46)

There are other logical fallacies associated with the nihilist point of view. For example, Sherrill Mulhern (1991b) wrote:

> The current revival of popular belief in the existence of an international conspiratorial Satanic blood cult has been promoted primarily by public declarations of alleged cult survivors, whose testimonies have been accredited by authoritative mental health professionals. These eye-witnesses can be divided into two groups: (1) adult mental patients, who claim to have been raised in transgenerational cults that “brainwashed” them through ritual torture, and (2) very young children, who allegedly have been subjected to ritual torture by cult recruiters while in day care. Both groups are said to have dissociated their memories of these horrifying experiences, recovering them only recently in psychotherapy. (p. 145)

Mulhern’s argument is an example of building a straw man. Rather than correctly identifying the various accounts and witnesses of ritual abuse, she selected a specific variant of ritual abuse, for example, the allegation of an “international conspiratorial Satanic blood cult,” and presented this as descriptive of the entire case;[1] she then attacked this straw man of her own making. Secondly, she incorrectly stated that the witnesses of these abuses fell into the previously mentioned two categories, and in both categories, the witnesses dissociated their experiences and only recover them in psychotherapy.

A similar logical error and misstatement of facts can be seen in the chapter “Occult Survivors: The Making of a Myth,” by Philip Jenkins and Daniel Maier-Katkin (1991). The authors criticized the claims of ritual abuse survivor Michelle Smith, whose history of abuse is told in Michelle Remembers (Smith & Pazder, 1980). Jenkins and Maier-Katkin argued that there were no satanic cults in the Vancouver area when Smith was a child:

> Before 1965, however, the religious fringe was more sparsely populated. The closest approximations to "devil worship" were strictly confined to geographic areas far removed from the locations of Michelle and Jenny—above all, to California. The Agape Lodge in 1930s Hollywood had been associated with wealthy decadence; by the 1940s, Jack Parsons transformed it into the Crowleyite Church of Thelema, based in Pasadena. At least in rumor, this group was active in orgies and sacrifice, but the tiny cult was moribund in the mid-1950s. (p. 138)

The "tiny cult" that Jenkins and Maier-Katkin were referencing is the Ordo Templi Orientis (O.T.O.). This occult fellowship is neither moribund nor tiny. As of 2006, they had an estimated international membership of 3,000 (Greenfield, 2006). Furthermore, their first local affiliate in North America was not in California as Jenkins and Maier-Katkin incorrectly stated, but in the Vancouver area.[2] According to their official website, they follow Allister Crowley's Book of the Law. Part of the Book of the Law (more precisely known as Liber Al vel Legis)[3] reads:

> Sacrifice cattle, little and big: after a child. . . . The best blood is of the moon, monthly: then the fresh blood of a child, or dropping from the host of heaven: then of enemies; then of the priest or of the worshippers: last of some beast, no matter what. This burn: of this make cakes & eat unto me. This hath also another use; let it be laid before me, and kept thick with perfumes of your orison: it shall become full of beetles as it were and creeping things sacred unto me. These slay, naming your enemies; & they shall fall before you. Also these shall breed lust & power of lust in you at the eating thereof.[4]

The use of sexual rituals and the ritual ingestion of human body products (blood, urine, semen, etc.) are ceremonial practices within the O.T.O. (Drury, 2011; Urban, 2003).

We are not implying that the O.T.O. was responsible for Michelle Smith's abuse. We are simply showing that the assumptions made by Jenkins and Maier-Katkin were incorrect. The fact that they didn't find evidence of a secretive group engaging in bizarre rituals in a particular location does not mean such groups don't exist. Sometimes researchers don't investigate carefully; sometimes they ask the wrong questions.

Jenkins and Maier-Katkin went on to write that "30 or more deaths" were associated with an allegedly African American "Church of Sacrifice" in Louisiana, and that Native Americans are known to have a history of witchcraft practices. However, they erred when they claimed that "none of the current survivors appears to be referring to these alleged ethnic traditions” (Jenkins & Maier-Katkin, 1991, p. 142). Readers will note that we specifically describe such patients’ allegations throughout this book. It appears that Jenkins and Maier-Katkin are unfamiliar with the literature of ritual abuse and the accounts made by these survivors.[5]

One of the more recent nihilist publications is David Frankfurter’s Evil Incarnate: Rumors of Demonic Conspiracy and Ritual Abuse in History (2006). Frankfurter began his book by stating his position: “Satanic atrocities are perennial phenomena, not authentic criminal events” (p. xvii). His book described a variety of historic cases where such allegations had been made but he says the “atrocities, imagined as the very substance of evil, never took place” (p. xiii). He argued that ritual abuse allegations represent a repeated, but erroneous, social construction, the product of a moral panic. However, he did not explain why contemporary allegations of ritual abuse have persisted from the 1980s into the 21st century. He wasn’t open to the possibility that some allegations of ritual abuse are true, nor did he give evidence of having gotten to know actual people who said they were survivors of ritual abuse, hearing them, and examining their stories. These are real individuals, many of whom are in treatment for psychological disorders. Is it appropriate to collectively sweep aside their individual allegations without interviewing any of them, studying their medical records, or reviewing their psychological test results? Such an indiscriminant theory could cause harm by silencing victims and their advocates. Frankfurter ended the discussion by blaming those people who talk about ritual abuse: “Real evil happens when people speak of evil” (p. 12).

If one wishes to accurately criticize the arguments supporting the existence of ritual abuse, then first one must correctly identify them. These arguments may be summarized as follows:

1. Allegations about ritual abuse have occurred in a variety of cultures throughout history. Among those groups where traumatizing rituals have reportedly been used, there have also been some accounts of dissociation, amnesia, and alterations of the individual’s identity. Why do these allegations of abuse correspond to these particular psychological symptoms?
2. In modern times, reports of ritual abuse in multiple international locations have been made by people who claim to be survivors.

Many of these survivors experience symptoms associated with severe dissociation, and many state that they have remembered particular instances of abuse while in therapy. However, these survivor memories are not all recovered in therapy.

3. Some perpetrators of ritual abuse and other criminal activity associated with cults are self-confessed.
4. There are a variety of credible witnesses to cult criminal activity. Included are a police officer who reportedly infiltrated a satanic cult and an attorney who stated that she was abducted by members of a cult at gun point while she was prosecuting a case in which there were allegations of ritual abuse. These witnesses told their stories in a videotaped documentary, Children at Risk: Ritual Abuse in America (1992). I have also spoken with two other individuals who were not psychiatric patients and who reported, in one case, witnessing abusive cult rituals, and, in both cases, being threatened. Both of these informants requested that I not identify them because of the threats made against them.
5. There have been convictions in criminal cases in response to allegations of ritual abuse. These convictions, by law, are based on evidence that is "beyond a reasonable doubt."
6. Civil cases have been won against individuals accused of ritual abuse. By law, these verdicts are based on "a preponderance of evidence."
7. Internationally, there are multiple cases of ritual murder that have resulted in criminal convictions. These are a matter of public record.
8. The abusive acts of some cults (e.g., the People's Temple of Guyana, Branch Davidians, Order of the Solar Temple, Aum Supreme Truth) are publicly known and documented.
9. The great majority of therapists who work with clients reporting ritual abuse tend to believe many of the allegations (Andrews, Morton, Bekerian, Brewin, Davies, & Mollon, 1995; Becker, Karriker, Rutz, & Overkamp, 2013; Bottoms, Shaver & Goodman, 1991; Ost, Wright, Easton, Hope, & French, 2013; Schmuttermaier & Veno, 1999; and Perry, 1992).
10. In a series of workshops, university lectures, and in group and individual professional supervision, I have demonstrated that > many of these survivors respond to preprogrammed cues with switching of alternate identities and trance responses. The patients were not trained to respond to these cues in therapy. I sometimes conduct these demonstrations with survivors that I have never seen before.

Given that there is proof for the existence of some cases of ritual abuse, we have to question why some people are motivated to publicly deny the existence of this phenomenon while refraining from accurately citing the evidence. Consider this ethical dilemma. A little girl states that she is being ritually abused. The perpetrator draws on the arguments published by these nihilists to support his or her innocence. In some cases, a perpetrator could be aided by those attempting to discredit the reality of ritual abuse. A truly victimized child might be further traumatized and silenced by the failure of others to fairly consider her story because the perpetrator, defended by the ritual abuse critics, is more readily believed.

This is not to say that the field of ritual abuse shouldn't be open to critical scrutiny. But why would critics resort to unscientific and unfair tactics? Why do critics of this subject have to stretch reason and distort facts in order to make their point, given the serious consequences that may result if this kind of abuse is occurring in actuality?

Christine Comstock (1991) made an important observation:

> Now that the possibility of ritualistic abuse affecting great numbers of people has arisen, I believe it is a good time to question our personal and organizational response. If the stories we hear about ritualistic abuse are true, it seems imperative that we accept some responsibility to do what we can to stop this devastation. It may be that our nonresponse could be considered to be on the same order as the nonresponse of the German citizens during the Third Reich. (p. 7)

Comstock's example of the nonresponse of German citizens to Nazi atrocities is thought-provoking because this lack of moral conviction was not merely limited to the Germans during World War II. It was, in fact, widespread throughout much of the world at that time. Even many of the European Jews could not initially believe the stories of the Nazi death camps. According to the psychodynamic theorists, this is how we cope. When we are confronted with reports or scenes of horror, we escape with denial. No one wanted to believe that such deliberate acts of terror could occur in a civilized society. As a consequence of their denial, coupled with the denial of the rest of the world and the unwillingness of any nation other than perhaps Denmark to assist the Jews, most European Jews were unable to escape the onslaught.

Now, to make matters worse, there is a modern effort underway to deny that the Holocaust occurred or that the European Jewish population was destroyed by the deliberate, willful, organized murder of six million men, women, and children. Telushkin (1991) describes this disgraceful movement:

> Amazingly, and despite very extensive pictorial and eyewitness evidence, the testimony of tens of thousands of survivors, and the confessions of thousands of perpetrators, a growing number of books, pamphlets, and articles have been published claiming that the Holocaust never happened. To make their case sound academically respectable, their authors refer to themselves as Holocaust revisionists. Many of these "revisionists" do indeed, come from the academic community. Arthur Butz, a professor of electric engineering at Northwestern University near Chicago, wrote The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, a book that offered "proof " that the concentration camps were work camps where no Jews were killed. Given the indisputable evidence of a great decline in the number of Jews living in Europe after 1945, Butz claimed that millions of Jews were admitted secretly to America, or fled to the Soviet Union. Butz's thesis, of course, is as preposterous as arguing that blacks were never slaves in America, but migrated here as paid servants and farm workers. Yet shortly after publication of Butz's book, the Institute for Historical Review was founded in California, and issued a journal devoted to Holocaust revisionism. In 1980 and 1981, the institute offered a $50,000 "reward" to anyone who could prove that there had been Nazi death camps, and that Jews had been killed in them. A Holocaust survivor in Los Angeles claimed the money. When the journal refused to pay him, he sued and won. (pp. 382–383)[6]

The tendency to deny or ignore the plight of European Jews was so great that Raul Hilberg (1992) divided the cast of characters into perpetrators, victims, and bystanders. The inaction on the part of the bystanders was also a significant factor in this tragedy. Adolf Hitler was so confident that no one would object to his destruction of the Jews that he made reference on several occasions to the Turkish genocide of Armenians during World War I: "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?"[7] According to Simpson (1993), "the Turkish government even today continues to refuse to acknowledge Ittahadist responsibility for the Armenian massacres, and has instead in recent years financed a large and sophisticated publicity campaign aimed at rewriting the history of the war years" (p. 37).

A similar organization was created in order to make revisionist interpretations about the modern widespread allegations of child abuse. It is the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (FMSF). The name is something of a curiosity in that the organization has no discernable interest in the numerous ways that memory can be false. Instead, the FMSF is invested in proving that most of the recent epidemic of reported sexual and ritual abuse is the fanciful product of overzealous or incompetent therapists.

False Memory Syndrome (FMS) is not a diagnosis recognized in either the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders or the World Health Organization's International Classification of Diseases. It is a contrived term that doesn't actually describe a "syndrome" or collection of symptoms. Rather, it is a pejorative expression that reassigns blame. Richard Lowenstein (1992) stated: "I know of no clinical research or tradition or clinical description that empirically validates or supports that such a clinical condition exists as such. FMS is a syndrome without signs and symptoms (the defining characteristics of a syndrome)" (p. 2).

The FMSF has redefined for us the identities of the real perpetrators: therapists and others who put "false" ideas in the minds of fragile patients who come to erroneously believe that they were abused in childhood. Although we know of no single case in which it has been proven that any therapist implanted such false memories, the FMSF has argued that this practice is widespread. Given the absence of substantiating evidence, the claims of the FMSF are inflammatory and prompt frivolous legal action against therapists who are merely trying to do their jobs in an ethically responsible manner. There are times when a therapist's job includes listening to patients' reports and recollections of childhood abuse. It is now easier for those accurately identified as perpetrators to successfully sue therapists because of the propaganda dispensed by the FMSF. It is also likely that some therapists will refuse to work with patients who make such allegations out of fear for their own liability. As one of my colleagues once commented, "in America you can sue anybody for anything."

However, there may be even more disastrous consequences to the FMSF's propaganda efforts. When a victim is not believed after making an outcry, the victim may be exposed to further harm when appropriate protective action is not taken. Furthermore, perpetrators who believe that they have an influential organization on their side may feel safer in engaging in further acts of abuse. According to Mark Schwartz (1993), previously an affiliate of the Masters and Johnson Sexual Trauma Programs: "In our perpetrators' program many individuals who had previously acknowledged their perpetrations have begun carrying around false memory articles to fuel their denial, resulting in more perpetrations" (p. 3). In 2011 Schwartz himself was accused of having implanted false memories of abuse in a patient while on the staff of Castlewood Treatment Center in St. Louis. Schwartz, other staff of Castlewood, and the facility itself were accused of malpractice and personal injury by as many as four plaintiffs (Bernhard, 2013). According to Bloomberg Businessweek ("Court dismisses lawsuit" 2013), the original case was dismissed and the subsequent lawsuits appear to be moving toward dismissal.

Given the serious consequences of sexual or ritual abuse, we question the appropriateness of inventing jargon that has the appearance of being scientific, although is unsupported by clear and convincing evidence. Such terminology could be construed as false and misleading and thus unprofessional and unethical. The theory behind the FMS hypothesis, that unscrupulous and incompetent therapists implant such memories, is not only unfounded but also absurd. As you read this, ask yourself whether you believe that a therapist could convince you that you were the victim of satanic ritual abuse at the hands of your parents if such were not the case. Although there is scientific evidence that human memory is not a perfectly accurate representation of reality, and that some people's recollections may be influenced by others, there is no scientific evidence that therapists are actively brainwashing their patients in this manner. On the other hand, for decades therapists have worked with patients in an effort to implant positive attitudes but have found this to be no simple or easily accomplished task. Any therapist who is so skilled in persuasion could likely create a successful career convincing patients to live psychologically healthy lives. Why would anyone with that kind of skill and education—it takes many years of study to become a psychotherapist—resort to such bizarre, harmful, and self-destructive practices?

Most therapists find that they exert little persuasive impact with their clients. Instead, most of psychotherapy consists of therapists taking on the role primarily as a listener. Clients make progress in therapy by becoming increasingly self-empowered, by learning to clarify their own questions, and finding their own solutions to their dilemmas of living. Even the FMSF has admitted that a large percentage of individuals who recall memories of childhood abuse do so without ever having been in psychotherapy.

Many therapists may eventually refuse to work with clients who report ritual abuse, just as some therapists currently refuse to work with actively suicidal patients fearing the potential exposure to liability. When therapists work with patients with thoughts of suicide or whose problems are embroiled in controversy, there is an increased risk that the therapist will be sued, even when the therapist's actions are entirely appropriate and ethical. Thus, there may be some patients who were indeed abused in childhood who later will be abandoned in therapy when they begin to reveal their abuse.

The FMSF disseminates data that are derived from biased and unscientific means, and from these data, the organization draws unjustified conclusions. The information published by the FMSF consists of testimonies by individuals who claim that their alleged victims have falsely accused them of abuse. Some of these accused individuals have been indicted or criminally prosecuted or civilly litigated subsequent to these accusations. The testimonies of these accused perpetrators have been used to "prove" that the allegations of wrongdoing are due to false memories. This is obviously an illogical conclusion. Although the FMSF has documented that many people who have contacted them reported that they were falsely accused of perpetration, there are a variety of other possible reasons that the accused deny these allegations. Perpetrators can also presumably have false memories and they can lie about their innocence.[8] However, we have not seen the FMSF address those possibilities. The reason that alternative explanations are not considered is because the FMSF is not really a scientific organization. A book published by FMSF apologist Claudette Wassil-Grimm exemplified this problem via the lack of scholarly exploration of both sides of the recovered memory phenomenon.[9] The FMSF appears to be an advocacy service designed to assist in the legal defense of alleged perpetrators of child abuse. It promotes its purpose by defending alleged perpetrators against their alleged victims by questioning the credibility of their accusers and, by extension, the advocates of these alleged victims, including therapists.

What exactly is the FMSF? What is its purpose, its agenda? How has it come to pass that an organization with such questionable origins has gained national and even international recognition in a brief space of time? Why does it attract support from the media and sometimes from the general public?

The founder and executive director of the FMSF is Pamela Freyd. By her own admission, she founded the organization in response to her adult daughter's allegations of childhood sexual abuse.[10] Her daughter, Jennifer J. Freyd, is a professor of psychology at the University of Oregon. Professor Freyd addressed her then public dispute with her parents when she spoke at a conference, Controversies around Recovered Memories of Incest and Ritualistic Abuse, on August 7, 1993, in Ann Arbor, Michigan. In her presentation, "Theoretical and Personal Perspectives on the Delayed Memory Debate," professor Freyd cited a family history of long-standing dysfunction, including her father's alcoholism and her parents' overt and inappropriate violations of her privacy such as eavesdropping on her telephone conversations and reading her diary. Beyond that, she documented a family history of disturbed interactions regarding sexuality in which she danced nude in front of her father; in which, at the age of eleven, he taught her to "kiss like a grown-up" in a play that he directed; and in which he made inappropriate sexually oriented remarks, exposed himself to her, and displayed other clearly inappropriate behaviors. According to professor Freyd, her father did not deny these allegations. Furthermore, she reported that her parents continued to invade her privacy by writing to her colleagues, making inappropriate sexual references, and carrying their private family dispute into the public forum. Professor Freyd (1993) poignantly stated:

> For me, and for many others, the bitter irony is that the memories, false or true, did not destroy healthy families. I have told you already about some of the events that I had never forgotten, about patterns of interaction. I have avoided discussing memories that only came back to me within the last three years because I am aware that I probably cannot prove those events took place, and because I don't think I should be forced into putting my memories on trial when I am not demanding to be believed about those things, when I never chose to make them public in the first place. I have instead told you about patterns of boundary invasion, about patterns of intrusion into my personal space, about patterns of coercive control and entitlement. Does this mean my childhood was only hurtful? Of course not. My parents provided me with many good things, many good times. But my family was not simply a happy, healthy family. It was a deeply troubled family, and its destruction did not begin simply by my entering therapy at the age of 33.

Not only are the motivations of the founders of the FMSF suspect, there are significant unanswered questions associated with the professional, ethical, and personal standards of other individuals who comprise the Professional Advisory Board of the FMSF. For example, professor Freyd (1993) cited a serious breach of both the patient's right to confidentiality and boundary violations that occurred between her mother's therapist, board member Harold Lief, and herself:

> He explained to me that he did not believe I was abused because in the early 1980s, when he met with my father once or twice in order to admit him to Silver Hill for treatment for alcoholism, he learned that my father's erotic fantasies were "entirely homoerotic." Now, I won't count it an ethical blunder to make the unfounded argument that a man with homoerotic fantasies in a heterosexual marriage is incapable of molesting his prepubescent daughter, but I do wonder about the ethics of telling the daughter of a patient such information—did I ask to know about my father's sexual fantasies? Most emphatically "no!" (p. 4)

Freyd (1993) also explained that advisory board members Hollida Wakefield and Martin Orne were consulted by Pamela Freyd in their roles as therapists, not as colleagues, and were in possession of intimate details of the Freyd family's functioning. According to professor Freyd, such an action would be a violation of the code of ethics of the American Psychological Association because it represented an unethical dual relationship.

Also disturbing is the fact that previous board member, the late Ralph Underwager,[11] and his wife, fellow board member Hollida Wakefield, granted an interview to Paidika: The Journal of Paedophilia, published in Amsterdam. In the course of the interview, Underwager was quoted as saying: "Paedophiles need to become more positive and make the claim that paedophilia is an acceptable expression of God's will for love and unity among human beings."[12] Underwager was frequently cited in child custody cases where he invariably attacked the credibility of those who making allegations of sexual abuse. Unfortunately, there also many inaccuracies associated with his research. In her unpublished 1991 manuscript, Anna Salter cited numerous errors in Underwager and Wakefield's book Accusations of Child Sexual Abuse. Salter scrutinized this book, which is sometimes cited in legal testimony in court cases, in a study supported by a grant from the New England Commissioners of Child Welfare Agencies. Prior to his association with the FMSF, Underwager founded the organization Victims of Child Abuse Legislation (VOCAL), whose sole purpose was the advocacy of men accused of child sexual abuse.

Another member of the FMSF scientific advisory board, Elizabeth Loftus, has been a frequent expert witness in civil and criminal prosecutions against therapists accused of implanting false memories of abuse in their patients. Loftus's mall study is often cited by FMSF apologists as evidence that false memories can indeed be implanted. However, there is considerable controversy surrounding the methodology, science, and ethics regarding Loftus's study.[13] The "study" was originally conceived in 1991 when Loftus attended a party and asked a friend to collaborate with her in a brief experiment to see if a false memory of having been lost in a mall could be created. The friend agreed and together Loftus and the friend recounted the lost in the mall scenario to the friend's eight-year old daughter. With the addition of details describing the emotional distress of the parent and child, the child agreed that she had indeed been lost and afraid. Loftus subsequently referred to this event as "pilot study one." A second pilot study was subsequently conducted by two of Loftus's graduate students as an extra credit assignment who recruited family members and friends to repeat Loftus's strategy to create a false memory of having been lost as a younger child. Reportedly, the four children in this effort agreed that they recalled having been lost. In the final study, 24 adults were recruited along with a family member who provided details of true childhood events along with one false event. Seven of the 24 subjects agreed that the false event had happened. The study has been successively used to demonstrate the ease of implanting false memories of abuse. The study's critics point to several ethical concerns. Firstly, Loftus did not obtain the approval of her university's Human Subjects Committee until 1992, after the "pilot studies." However, she included the results of these studies in her conclusions. Secondly, the recruitment of family and friends by Loftus and her students may be a boundary violation according to the principles of professional conduct established by the American Psychological Association. Thirdly, in a second interview, one participant indicated she no longer agreed that she had experienced being lost. Nevertheless, Loftus did not correct the statistics and continued to assert that 25% of participants remembered untrue events. The details and conclusions of the study have been consistently misrepresented over time. Finally, a scenario of being lost in a mall at age five is not the equivalent of having suffered a significant trauma, thus the conclusion that memories of past abuse are frequently confabulated has no basis in fact (Crook & Dean, 1999a, 1999b).

The FMSF is a tax-exempt organization that placed its income for the fiscal year 1992 at $365,485 ("FMS Finances," 1993). Researcher Stephanie Dallam discovered marked inconsistencies in the data published by the FMSF regarding the size of its membership and the manner in which data is collected and interpreted, something that can be especially problematic for tax-exempt organizations.[14]

The FMSF presents the argument that unscrupulous therapists implant false memories as a means of producing symptoms that require long-term psychotherapy. In fact, the precursors of abuse recollections such as flashbacks and other psychiatric symptoms frequently antedate therapy and are often the reason that such individuals seek therapy in the first place. Furthermore, a disproportionate number of adults who make allegations of childhood abuse often have histories of chronically disabling psychological disorders. Given their marginal levels of coping, many of them are unemployable and without any insurance benefits. Many, if they are lucky, are receiving disability benefits. Any therapist who works with this patient population is likely doing a considerable amount of work at a discounted fee or even pro bono. Conversely, psychiatrist George Ganaway, a member of the FMSF advisory board, has been contracted by insurance companies to scrutinize claims for psychotherapy related to allegations or memories of childhood abuse.[15]

If there is indeed a question of "false memories," how can we be sure that the false ones are not those of the accused perpetrators rather than those of the stated victims?[16] The appearance of normalcy is not an assurance that criminal behavior cannot be present. Certainly there is a history of criminals, including Ted Bundy, John Wayne Gacy, and John Hinkley, who led many to perceive them as normal, with no outward signs of their chaotic mental functioning and the secrets of their heinous criminal acts.

To date, there have been successful civil and criminal prosecutions against individuals who perpetrated criminal acts that were undetected at the time they occurred and were only brought to public awareness days, weeks, months, or years later, when the victims or witnesses were capable of providing testimony. Doubtless, there have been some occurrences of false criminal accusations. However, it is critical that all allegations of wrongdoing be given a fair hearing. Victims deserve to have the crimes against them be considered and fully investigated. A false accusation of child sexual or ritual abuse can result in some significant discomfort to the accused, perhaps even imprisonment. An incorrect accusation of "false memory" can cost the credibility, safety, and even the lives of the victims. This of course is not merely a recent problem exploited by the FMSF, but as anyone familiar with the literature of child abuse knows, there is a long history of public denial and resistance to the idea that children are being harmed, especially when it is alleged that abuse is ongoing in their own families.

Masson's (1992) book The Assault on Truth cites examples of brutality toward children during Freud's time, wherein children were given little or no protection by the legal or medical professions. Sander J. Breiner (1990) and Lloyd de Mause (2006) have written well-researched histories of child abuse practices throughout a variety of cultures illustrating the widespread pervasiveness of the problem. There are at least two major obstacles in the way of addressing the problems of child abuse in our culture. First, there is a lack of understanding regarding the various factors that increase the likely occurrence of child abuse. Many people simply don't understand it, and others don't particularly want to. This leads us to a second factor—denial. Through denial, the victim is able to temporarily survive the assault, the perpetrator is able to discard his or her feelings of guilt and shame, and the rest of us don't need to get involved because it "didn't happen." Unfortunately, denial only works for so long before thoughts, sensations, memories, and feelings that were previously safely locked away return to the survivor's conscious awareness, frequently in the form of nightmares and flashbacks.

Alice Miller (1990) wrote about the denial of child abuse in a more institutionalized form—within the profession and practice of psychoanalysis. In her book Thou Shalt Not Be Aware: Society's Betrayal of the Child, she spoke as a trained psychoanalyst disillusioned with her profession's disregard for the legitimate concerns of child abuse. In direct contrast to the mistaken notion promoted by the FMSF that therapists are obsessed with finding evidence of child abuse in their patients, she correctly noted the tendency of psychoanalysts to go to the other extreme, ignoring such reports and reinforcing denial in their patients:

> Sometimes I have to ask myself how many children's corpses psychoanalysts require as proof before they will stop ignoring their patient's childhood suffering or trying to talk them out of it. . . . It is unlikely that analysts will be able to alter the incidence of child abuse, but as long as they go on espousing theories that can be used to deny and cover up flagrant mistreatment, they will prevent their patients as well as the general public from becoming conscious of the truth. They will be lending support to the collective repression of a phenomenon whose consequences directly affect each one of us. (Miller, 1990, p. 212)

But does child abuse really occur that frequently? In a national survey focusing on a variety of questions addressed to modern Americans, James Patterson and Peter Kim (1992) found that one in seven of their respondents acknowledged a history of sexual abuse in childhood. However, the investigators also found that these individuals were also secretive about their abuse histories. Almost half stated that prior to the survey, they had never told anyone about their abuse. Given this level of reluctance to talk about sexual abuse, one has to wonder if these researchers may have also missed detecting some actual survivors of sexual abuse. Even if their data do not underreport the frequency of childhood sexual abuse, their data point to the enormity of this problem in our culture. More recent studies support Patterson and Kim's findings. According to the National Center for Victims of Crime, research by David Finkelhor of the Crimes against Children Research Center has shown that:

- One in five girls and 1 in 20 boys is a victim of child sexual abuse;
- Self-report studies show that 20% of adult females and 5–10% of adult males recall a childhood sexual assault or sexual abuse incident;
- During a one-year period in the United States, 16% of youth aged 14–17 had been sexually victimized;
- Over the course of their lifetime, 28% of U.S. youth aged 14–17 had been sexually victimized; and
- Children are most vulnerable to childhood sexual assault between the ages of 7 and 13.[17]

History demonstrates that heinous acts can and do occur. There is no shame in our ability to recognize that human beings are capable of committing atrocities. It is, however, shameful when we ignore the outcries of the victims, many of whom not only describe past abuses, but also present threats and dangers. We cannot know how many of the outcries are accurate unless we properly and individually investigate them.

CHAPTER 15

The Politics of Psychotherapy

By 1990, my practice had increasingly attracted individuals with multiple personality disorder (MPD)/dissociative identity disorder (DID) and people who were, by their own accounts, survivors of ritual abuse. As this was evolving, I also found myself with an increasing caseload of marginally functioning patients with little or no funding for their psychological treatment. As previously explained, this client population included a large number of individuals who were unemployed or underemployed because of the severity of their psychiatric symptoms.

As a consequence of their periodic risk of self-harm and occasional danger of harm to others, these patients often required close supervision and sometimes hospitalization. In Dallas, Texas, in the early 1990s, there were no fewer than eight dedicated, free-standing psychiatric hospitals, both privately owned and franchises of health care conglomerates, including Psychiatric Institute of America (PIA) that was owned by National Medical Enterprises, Inc., Health Corporation of America (HCA), Tenet Healthcare Corporation, and Charter Behavioral Healthcare Systems. Additionally, every medical surgical hospital had a psychiatric unit or track to accommodate long-term psychiatric patients. Several of these facilities developed a specialized unit or track specifically to treat individuals with dissociative disorders.

Patients could often be hospitalized for several months at a time, depending on their financial circumstances or health insurance benefits. Competing for the dollars generated by long-term hospital stays, private hospitals boasted gourmet meals, swimming pools, and resort-style amenities. Patients insured by Medicare were eligible for hospitalization at these free-standing psychiatric hospitals as well. However, because of Medicare's rules, Medicare patients were only entitled to 180 lifetime psychiatric hospitalization days in free-standing psychiatric facilities. When they reached their maximum number of hospital days, they were only able to obtain admission to psychiatric units associated with medical-surgical hospitals based on a Medicare formula.

Health insurers retaliated against the costs generated under these and other circumstances, and managed care was the result. Managed care has been used by insurers to provide an additional level of scrutiny and control over health care–related expenses. "Gatekeepers" are instituted to approve hospitalizations, treatment, providers, and length of stay. Unfortunately, these gatekeepers are generally unfamiliar with the level of incapacity and risk for self-harm among these patients. Their priority is to protect the profits of the insurance companies and not to seek the best solutions for the patients' needs. Admissions were often arbitrarily denied. On more than one occasion, my office was advised that a patient with a severe risk for suicide was not eligible for hospital admission until there was an actual suicide attempt.

Psychiatric hospitalization was frequently justified by a low global assessment of functioning (GAF)[1] score. Intake interviews, generally conducted by hospital employees who were not always licensed mental health care professionals, would routinely estimate a GAF of 25–35[2] for new admissions. Their job was essentially to fill hospital beds and they learned that a low GAF was generally key to the process. Often the patient would benefit from hospitalization and all that it provided, including a safe environment, intensive individual and group therapy, structure, and attention to medical problems. However, regardless of the progress made, their GAFs would miraculously rise at about the same time their insurance benefits were exhausted. Thus, patients were often discharged without the capacity to engage in appropriate aftercare, and so they looked to county and state facilities for further treatment. Unfortunately, help through the public sector was inconsistent and unreliable. The county and state facilities were unprepared to cope with, and effectively treat, these individuals, and commitment typically resulted in sedating and temporarily warehousing them, not in treating their disabling symptoms.

Although some of my patients periodically required the protective environment of a hospital setting, they didn't often have the financial or emotional resources to be hospitalized. Inpatient psychiatric treatment was expensive and could deplete even generous insurance policies in a short time. Additionally, hospitalization was stressful and often frightening. Not only did it disrupt the individual’s day-to-day routine, the hospital politics often interfered with the patient care by introducing conflicts in philosophies within the treatment team as well. It was not uncommon for patients to report that other members of the treatment team expressed disbelief in their diagnosis of MPD/DID and history of ritual abuse, and patients were sometimes told that their recollections were fantasies. Ritual abuse survivors often reported that their perpetrators said similar things to them when they were children (e.g., “you just had a bad dream”) in order to prevent them from describing their abuse to others. Psychiatrists unfamiliar with the psychopharmacology of DID sometimes prescribed medications or other procedures that were contraindicated and counterproductive. Furthermore, some hospital staff punished patients for involuntary dissociation or for identifying themselves as alter personalities or not responding to the name of the host personality.

Unfortunately, there were often no alternatives to hospitalization when these patients posed a risk of harm to themselves or others. Some of the hospitals provided day treatment or partial hospitalization, but such programs typically had no effective measures in place to insure the patients’ safety. The hospitals’ argument was that if a patient could not ensure his or her own safety outside the partial program, then he or she should be in an inpatient facility. Additionally, the expense of partial hospitalization, physician fees, psychotherapy, and other related charges were still outside the reach of many of these patients. Many insurance policies and managed health care programs not only imposed limitations on the dollars spent on psychiatric services, including hospitalization; they often limited the length of treatment.[3]

In response to this dilemma, we developed a day treatment program within my office, and as far as I know, it was the first such nonhospital-affiliated day treatment program specifically for dissociative clients in the United States. In order to participate in this program, clients were required to have a safe living situation established. This was possible for some who had existing relationships with spouses or other persons who were familiar with their capacity for self-harm and who were, as far as we were able to ascertain, psychiatrically symptom free or no danger to the patient. For patients who did not have any such relationship already established, we encouraged a roommate or “buddy” system, whereby compatible individuals shared the expenses and responsibilities for their food and shelter while providing one another with appropriate emotional support, nurturance, and occasional monitoring for their safety. This situation worked out well for several of the patients, providing them with reduced living expenses, often in a safer environment than they previously had, and with the benefit of another person available to support and assist in insuring their safety from periodic real or perceived external threats. By having patients reside with other “safe” individuals when they were not in the day treatment program, it was possible to reduce or even avoid hospitalization for many of these patients when they otherwise felt self-destructive.

Patients enrolled in the day treatment program were also required to be under the care of a psychiatrist, and they were required to attend various groups, including a life skills group in order to achieve optimal functioning and autonomy. Another requirement was that they had to participate in regular individual therapy in my practice. My practice adopted a form of team treatment. Each client’s team included the primary individual therapist, the therapists the client saw in groups, and the client herself. Also invited to be part of the team were the client’s psychiatrist and primary care physician, although they seldom participated. This treatment strategy eliminated conflicting information and therapeutic techniques that might be at cross purposes. It also improved clients’ safety and sharply reduced incidents of splitting or episodes of noncompliance. The clients were a part of the team, and they recognized that the treatment team was united in its goal to improve their functioning.

My staff assisted patients in utilizing the state rehabilitation commission and other city, county, state, and federal agencies and programs designed to facilitate their integration into society, job training and placement, and access to appropriate social services. At the same time, it was possible to minimize the expense of treatment by eliminating many of the standard costs of hospital-affiliated programs such as nursing staff and daily fees for the attending psychiatrist.[4] This program operated successfully until 2000.

Despite the fact that there were several psychiatric hospitals and psychiatric programs locally available, it became increasingly difficult to find appropriate placement for these clients. Many of them had inadequate insurance benefits to support long-term hospitalization that, in freestanding psychiatric hospitals, could cost well over a thousand dollars a day, exclusive of the fees of the attending physician, individual therapist, medications, and other special needs. Some hospitals were not interested in treating those patients who were violent or uncooperative. Some of the hospitals were ill-equipped to deal with those who were at substantial risk for self-harm or who frequently attempted to elope from the hospital before appropriate discharge. Few hospital staff and fewer psychiatrists had either experience or a willingness to develop the necessary skills to prepare themselves for the treatment of these difficult patients.

In spite of the fact that this was not a particularly profitable patient population, there were, at one time, several different hospital programs in the Dallas area that specialized in dissociative disorders. I was most familiar with three of these. Gary Lefkof founded the first such program at the Cedars Hospital in De Soto, Texas. In 1992 Dr. Lefkof moved his program to Brookhaven Psychiatric Pavilion, a facility more conveniently located in the heart of North Dallas. However, when the scandal[5] involving the PIA and its parent company, National Medical Enterprises, erupted, Brookhaven, a franchise of that company, failed and folded. Dr. Lefkof was invited to move his program to Brookhaven after the events that resulted in civil and criminal charges against the facility but before they had become public knowledge. Dr. Lefkof, his program, and the patients he served became collateral damage to the fallout from Brookhaven's legal troubles.

The second and third programs were established almost simultaneously at Charter Behavioral Health of Dallas and Bedford Meadows Hospital near Fort Worth. For the dedication of the Bedford Meadows program, Bennett Braun and Trudy Chase, author of When Rabbit Howls, were featured speakers. The program at Bedford Meadows was originally developed by Jerry Mungadze, a counselor who developed a program with a Christian orientation for the treatment of DID. When Bedford Meadows also fell victim to the PIA fallout, Dr. Mungadze moved his program to the Cedars Hospital.

I was most intimately familiar with the program offered by Charter Hospital of Dallas, having created the original in-service training and groups for patients with dissociative disorders. The nursing staff seemed not only willing to work with these patient's special needs, they appeared enthusiastic as well. I was often responsible for as many as six or seven inpatient admissions at any given time. None of the physicians on staff had much previous experience treating dissociative patients, and many of the psychiatrists were not interested in dealing with them.

In 1991 Charter invited me to chair a national symposium on MPD to coincide with the opening of their unit for the treatment of patients with DID. I recommended Colin Ross and Chris Sizemore, “Eve” of The Three Faces of Eve, to speak at the symposium. It has always been my belief that if the therapeutic community is to be successful in working with these patients, we must set aside our competitiveness and egos in order to share our knowledge and experience. It was in this spirit that I suggested to the Charter administration that clinicians representing other facilities and programs be invited to present, but they didn’t accept that recommendation. However, the conference appeared to be successful, establishing Charter as a viable facility for the treatment of dissociative disorders and providing for Colin Ross’s recruitment to the staff of Charter.

During this period, several area psychiatric facilities were aggressively marketing their services to me. Some of the hospitals gave me an opportunity to provide group therapy and other lucrative services such as psychological testing and staffing within their psychiatric units. At the time, I believed I was recruited to deliver these services because of my experience caring for patients who were typically problematic to the hospital staff and who created conflict on the unit. However, I eventually realized that my participation was often solicited for purely business reasons—because I specialized in treating high-risk patients who, despite my best efforts, had no alternative to hospitalization when they developed acute suicide or homicide risk.

This fact was brought home to me when on at least one occasion the groups I provided to a particular hospital were discontinued because I was unwilling to refer my patients exclusively to that particular facility. When there are choices between types of units and programs, referring exclusively to any one hospital in exchange for any consideration or benefit to the clinician is unethical. Referrals should always be made with the only consideration being the patient’s welfare and best interest (Pope & Vasquez, 2011). This questionable policy along with paying stipends and providing other benefits to psychiatrists and therapists in exchange for what was essentially referral brokering continued to be the modus operandi of many of the psychiatric hospitals. These facilities also engaged in other inappropriate and illegal practices, including paying “bounties” to referral sources, including juvenile court personnel, schoolteachers, counselors and private referral agencies. Hospitals frequently encouraged patients to apply to various state-funded victims' assistance programs in order to subsidize lengthy hospital stays. Patients were often hospitalized for unnecessarily long periods of time, and frequently they were subjected to inappropriate and excessive treatment modalities such as involuntary restraints. Patients were often hospitalized until their funds were exhausted, at which time they were discharged without the capacity to obtain appropriate continuing care. Ultimately, almost all of the private corporation–affiliated psychiatric hospitals in Texas closed following investigations by the state and federal governments that resulted in significant fines to the parent corporations for these and other serious infractions. The hospitals and the doctors affiliated with them were also subjected to numerous civil suits by former patients.

In the meantime, many of these patients were experiencing a struggle for survival. Public programs, at least in Texas, were poorly equipped to deal with the magnitude of their problems, lacking both the funding and training to adequately deal with their needs. Public services were so overwhelmed in Texas that there were frequent announcements of freezes on public mental health services.[6] It was not an uncommon event when patients who were so disturbed that police were called to subdue and transport them to a public inpatient facility were discharged within hours. Clinicians who were willing to treat them often encountered serious financial burdens as a consequence of their patients' inability to pay for necessary services. I personally knew psychiatrists and other mental health care professionals who were forced into bankruptcy by the combination of hospital failures and poor funding for needed mental health services. As a result of these inadequate circumstances, an atmosphere of mistrust and divisiveness emerged that precluded effective communication and collegiality within the professional community. At a time when we should have been working together to solve the enormous problems confronting us, many of us were isolated and divided in our resolve.[7]

The ordinary concerns of the mental health professionals were compounded for those treating the effects of cult and ritual abuse. A sense of paranoia was sometimes displaced toward those providing treatment to these survivors. Rumors ran rampant, and the standing joke was that if you hadn't been accused of being involved in a cult yourself, you probably weren't an effective therapist.

I was once distressed to hear such a rumor about myself. According to the story, I was alleged to be the high priest of a satanic coven. I addressed this issue in a daily group therapy session with my clients because it was always my policy to openly confront all relevant rumors and controversies. Attempting to add a touch a levity to what was actually an embarrassing and professionally damaging situation, I announced to the group: “You know, I’m really sort of offended that with all that I know about programming, I’m accused of being only a high priest.”[8] A client alleged to have been highly ranked within her cult put me in my place with, “You don’t know enough to be a high priest,” and the group erupted in laughter.

I was particularly disappointed to learn that this rumor had originated with a well-known mental health professional practicing in an area psychiatric hospital. When dealing with a patient population that engenders considerable controversy, the support of one’s peers is particularly important. Collegiality became an increasingly scarce commodity, and I heard many mental health providers say that they felt both personally and professionally isolated.

In communicating my concerns with other therapists working with these patients, I found that many of them encountered a pattern of increasing hostility. We concluded that the organizations in place to provide support, continuing education, and collegiality among mental health professionals were insufficient. As I conversed with individuals representing different professional disciplines working with people alleging ritual abuse, I heard many report a sense of abandonment by colleagues and their professions. Police officers recounted experiences of both subtle and overt ridicule by peers and supervisors. District attorneys pursuing prosecutions against perpetrators of ritual abuse and attorneys involved in the civil and criminal legal cases involving ritual abuse were confused as to how to convey factual information to judges and juries.

This dilemma led to the establishment of the Society for the Investigation, Treatment and Prevention of Ritual and Cult Abuse, an organization to promote communication, cooperation, and collegiality among professionals, survivors, and the lay public regarding the issue of cult and ritual abuse. We cofounded the group with other affiliated professionals in March 1993 to serve as a multidisciplinary association to address the concerns of clinicians, attorneys, law enforcement agents, social welfare caseworkers, clergy, media representatives, educators, survivors, and the public. Its goals were to facilitate the collection and distribution of data relevant to the diagnosis and treatment of ritual abuse; to establish investigatory, diagnostic, and treatment protocols; to provide continuing education; to foster communication among various organizations confronting problems related to cult and ritual abuse; and to provide support to survivors and their advocates. Its mission was to study the issue of ritual abuse from a scientific perspective in order to reduce the hysteria, paranoia, and sensationalism frequently associated with this subject. This organization grew steadily with members residing in many parts of the United States and abroad. Our first annual conference, Cult and Ritual Abuse, Mind Control, and Dissociation: A Multidisciplinary Dialogue, was presented to an audience of over 300 professionals, survivors, and members of the general public in March 1995 in Richardson, Texas. The speakers included many celebrities in the field, including Catherine Gould, Chrystine Oksana, Linda Blood, Gail Carr Feldman, Alan Scheflin, Walter Bowart, James Freisen, and others.

The Society for the Investigation, Treatment and Prevention of Ritual and Cult Abuse eventually morphed into a new organization, the International Council on Cult and Ritual Trauma, which continued until 2006. By that time, the Internet had become an increasingly important tool for connecting professionals, survivors, and advocates from around North America, Europe, and elsewhere and we were able to transfer our energies to other collaborative efforts on behalf of ritual abuse victims and survivors.

The Media

The mass media have had an important role in the unfolding story of ritual abuse. Unfortunately, the media have tended to focus on the sensational, or they have portrayed ritual abuse claims as absurd or even ridiculous. Such ventures have failed to provide what is needed—a fair and impartial, but serious, investigation of this subject. Nevertheless, my first experience with the national media exceeded my expectations for evenhandedness. At that time, in the early 1990s, I was invited to be a guest on Geraldo Rivera's talk show for a program depicting the complications of family life when one of the parents is diagnosed with dissociative identity disorder (DID). It occurred to me that if these clients were merely faking, then their dissimulation would probably be recognized by a family member who interacted with them and observed them daily. It was interesting to note that of the families present on the program, all believed and supported the family member diagnosed with DID. This particular program portrayed patients as believed, loved, and respected by their spouses and children in spite of the significant disruption of the family that periodically results from the disorder.

From time to time, we have seen television, newspaper, and magazine accounts of dissociation and ritual abuse. In some cases, we ourselves have been interviewed to provide background for them. Thus, we have had the opportunity to witness, sometimes as participant-observers, the inner workings of the media. What we saw was often disturbing, particularly when we found the journalist to be deliberately suppressing and distorting information in order to support a sensational story that appeared to have been concocted prior to completing the research.

This appears to have been the strategy for a cover story by Gary Cartwright in the regional magazine Texas Monthly. The article, allegedly an examination of the Fran's Day Care case, concluded that the case against the Kellers was the result of hysterical reactions by the community and the mental health professions. In late February 1994, I was contacted by a man who identified himself as David Mormon, a fact checker calling on behalf of Cartwright. He interviewed me over the telephone for more than an hour. He read those portions of the article that referred to me for comment and correction. When the article appeared in print two months later, I was surprised that most of the information I had provided, either in response to his questions or volunteered by me, was not included in the article. Additionally, others who recounted their solicitation for input in the article, including the parents of the young victims, reported that their information was misrepresented or disregarded in the published article. I wrote a letter to the editor of Texas Monthly to address my concerns that the case and my role in it had been misrepresented. My letter was not published.

Another example of opinion masquerading as journalism occurred after representatives of ABC's Prime Time Live attended one of the training seminars offered through my office on the subject of ritual abuse. We soon learned the meaning of the term, hatchet job. The production staff of Prime Time Live videotaped many hours for their segment reporting on the ritual abuse controversy. They taped an hour-and-a-half informal group with several patients,[1] my six-hour seminar, and a two-hour interview between correspondent Jay Schadler and myself. Additionally, producer Steve Reiner and Schadler spent several hours with a patient, "Vanessa," who also shared a videotape incorporating separate interview sessions between Vanessa and myself. Editing makes it possible to rearrange the sequencing of recorded events so that a very different meaning of an interviewee's statements is conveyed. Thus, because the segments were cut and rearranged, it gave a false impression that I made suggestions to a hypnotized patient that 13 people, or a coven, may have come to her door, and thus, she may have attended a cult meeting. However, this interpretation of the televised material was patently false. In fact, Vanessa and I were discussing the number of her alternate identities that had a particular function (i.e., the job of going to the door), not cultists. Making Monsters, by Ofshe and Waters (1994), cited these misquotes of me taken from this Prime Time Live program. Ofshe and Waters then used this misinformation to argue that therapists were brainwashing their patients into believing that they were sexually abused in satanic cults. Furthermore, neither Ofshe and Waters nor Prime Time Live mentioned the fact that the patient in question was aware of sexual abuse by her father and others before consulting any therapist or that her claims were validated by her sister who had endured similar experiences and corroborated Vanessa's recollections. These memories could not have been implanted by a therapist because the memories existed prior to seeing a mental health professional. Both Prime Time Live and Making Monsters erroneously implied that this patient considered herself a survivor of satanic ritual abuse. In fact when I saw her, she described ritual abuse but made no statements about satanic ritual abuse.

In addition to a general misrepresentation of professionals who treat survivors, the ABC newsmagazine contained a number of more specific fallacies. One example was the assertion that a seven-year Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) study revealed no evidence of organized cult or ritual activity in the United States. In reality, there is no such study. Following the ABC program, my office contacted the FBI and requested a copy of the alleged study. The bureau responded in writing, indicating that no such study existed (see Appendix B). Rather, the document featured on the program and to which the correspondent referred is the Investigator's Guide to Allegations of "Ritual" Child Abuse and contains no data or research methodology whatsoever. This monograph by Special Agent Ken Lanning (1992) is merely a guide for those who may investigate this phenomenon, as the title indicates, and not a study. The author is a well-known critic of cult and ritual abuse allegations who has consulted on a number of cases but to our knowledge has not personally investigated the majority of these cases, some of which have produced convictions.[2] Agent Lanning retired from the FBI in 2000 and is last known to have been a consultant in the area of crimes against children for Academy Group, Inc., a forensic behavioral science company. As recently as July 24, 2010, in an interview conducted for the CBS television news magazine program 48 Hours, Lanning referred to allegations of ritual abuse of children as the product of mass hysteria that he implied promoted significant opportunism by those who purported that ritual abuse does exist.

During my conversations with the Prime Time Live staff, Reiner and Schadler, I referenced several criminal and civil cases in which allegations of cult and ritual abuse were prominent, including instances in which convictions had been obtained. I went into specific detail regarding the case of Fran’s Day Care because of my involvement as an expert witness. My office informed Reiner of the outcome of the Fran’s Day Care case, convictions and 48-year sentences for both Fran and Dan Keller, prior to the airing of the segment on Prime Time Live. However, the producer of the program chose to omit this information and to misrepresent or misinterpret Lanning’s monograph as an FBI study.

Prime Time Live also demonstrated faulty logic and a biased perspective in their depiction of the case of Gloria Grady. Grady, a Dallas-area resident, had sought professional counseling because of a severe eating disorder. During the course of her therapy with two local therapists, Grady began to reveal a history of ritual abuse perpetrated against her by her father, a Baptist minister. Grady and her plight was the subject of two articles that appeared in D Magazine. The perspective of both articles was that Grady and her parents were the victims of unethical therapists who deliberately and maliciously implanted Gloria Grady with false memories of abuse. However, Gloria Grady continued to stand by her story and maintain that she was a victim of abuse at the hands of her parents from whom, to our knowledge, she has been estranged since recalling that abuse. Three other patients who were in therapy at the same time and with the same therapists as Grady and who also reported having recollections of ritual abuse perpetrated by their parents recanted their stories and subsequently sued their therapists. The therapists’ malpractice carrier settled one of the complaints out of court over the objections of the therapists. However, their malpractice insurance carriers believed a settlement to be less costly than a trial and ordered their legal team to resolve the matter before it went to trial. A condition of settlement was that the patient not discuss the case, not reveal the therapists’ names or the locations where they practiced. Most of these conditions appear to have been violated over time. The second case went to trial, and although the jury awarded a verdict in the patient’s favor, the judge attributed 60% of the responsibility to the therapist and 40% responsibility to the patient.[3] Both of these women have subsequently appeared on several talk shows, usually accompanied by attorneys or mental health professionals representing the False Memory Syndrome Foundation’s (FMSF’s) point of view. One of the women was already promoting her soon-to-be published book. The third case was still pending at the time we published the second edition of this book, and we have not been able to obtain updated information on its status. Although one of the therapists involved was absolved of any wrongdoing by his licensing board, his malpractice carrier canceled his coverage, which limited his ability to practice. The disruption to his practice caused by the notoriety of the cases as well as the loss of his liability insurance resulted in lost hospital privileges. Eventually, he was forced into bankruptcy and left the field.

In the course of the Prime Time Live segment, Schadler appeared to be implying that Grady sued her parents and that her parents prevailed. The only court action involving Grady and her parents of which we are aware is Grady's request that her parents be restrained from attempting to communicate with her. The judge apparently denied her request because Grady could not demonstrate to the court's satisfaction that her parents' pursuit of her constituted harassment.

A curiosity about the ABC program was a peculiar comment made by Schadler in reference to Reverend and Mrs. Grady. Schadler asserted that neither Reverend nor Mrs. Grady could be guilty of their daughter's allegations because "she is a Sunday school teacher," and he is "a minister." This comment was particularly inappropriate because, in fact, Schadler had no direct knowledge of Reverend or Mrs. Grady's guilt or innocence. Yet, Schadler made this observation while litigation related to this matter was ongoing and could have been affected by his unwarranted pronouncement. This statement also showed considerable naiveté on Schadler's part if he believes that innocent people may correctly be identified by their appearance or professions. In recent years, there have been numerous documented cases of sexual abuse by clergy.[4] In her research on survivors of ritual abuse, Margaret Smith (1993) reported that clergymen are frequently identified as perpetrators of ritual abuse. Many of those who responded to the Extreme Abuse Survey (Becker et al., 2013; Rutz et al., 2008) reported abuse by Catholic priests and nuns, Protestant ministers, rabbis, and other religious leaders. Guilty people do not typically wear scarlet letters or other external or overt signs of their guilt. A clergyperson is no less likely to be a perpetrator than a plumber, or policeman, or lawyer, or mental health care professional.

Although Prime Time Live did not televise the material we provided regarding the outcomes of several cases, another television program did document some legal findings relevant to allegations of ritual abuse. The American Justice series, which aired on the Arts and Entertainment (A&E) channel, produced a program, Satan, Rituals and Abuse, documenting the Fran’s Day Care and the Country Day Walk cases, both of which were resolved by successful prosecutions. Additionally, and perhaps more significantly, both cases featured confessions by one of the defendants.

Why is the media sometimes invested in distorting facts in order to present one particular point of view? We continue to be puzzled by ABC’s decision to slant the perspective of the segment on ritual abuse. Why was it important to represent individuals who could have been perpetrators as victims?[5] For whatever reason, ABC has not been alone in its prejudicial stance regarding ritual abuse.

The Jane Whitney Show contacted my office asking if any of my patients would be willing to appear on her nationally syndicated talk show. The producer specifically asked for patients who were originally from the East Coast, perhaps hoping that a free round trip would entice them to accept her invitation. None of my patients expressed any interest in appearing, and when the program aired, I was relieved that none of my patients participated. Two patients and a therapist were pitted against individuals representing the FMSF. The results appeared to be exploitative and abusive for the unfortunate patient participants.

Maury Povich invited children who had made allegations of ritual abuse while enrolled at the McMartin Preschool in Manhattan Beach, California, to appear on his program along with their parents. One of the points made in the program was that excavations had been conducted that had revealed the presence of the underground tunnels the children had reported to authorities as the site of some of their abuse. Povich also invited Paul and Shirley Eberle, authors of The Abuse of Innocence (1993), to appear on the same program. The Eberles’ book argued that the children were not ritually abused at the McMartin School, but that they had been victimized by their therapists and “the system,” which the Eberles accused of encouraging children to make false allegations. Two of the mothers of the abused children present for the program, Marymae Cioffi and Jackie MacGauley, became particularly frustrated when Povich refused to allow them to present information regarding the Eberles’ history and dubious qualifications to address child abuse. The Eberles were publishers of sexually explicit periodicals, including Finger, a Los Angeles tabloid containing pornographic photographs, drawings, and stories about sexual exploits with children. When Povich refused to allow this material to be presented, Cioffi and MacGauley left the stage and distributed examples of the Eberles' work to the studio audience.[6]

The McMartin case was also the subject of the cable movie Indictment, produced for Home Box Office (HBO). Several children's advocacy groups expressed concern that the film's focus appeared to be slanted in favor of the accused perpetrators. The newsletter for the organization Believe the Children contained an impassioned plea to its readers to cancel their subscriptions to HBO in protest of this film's airing. An article featured in the newsletter "Sex Abuse, Lies and Videotape" (1995) described the genesis of the program and voiced its concerns that the true victims of the McMartin case, the children, might be harmed by the perspective of the film's author, Abby Mann. According to the article, Mann and his wife, Myra, became advocates of the operators and staff of the McMartin preschool during the course of their trial. Because of the Manns' involvement in the case and their relationship to the accused perpetrators, the article expressed concern that the film might reflect an unbalanced portrait of accused and accusers such that roles might be reversed in the eyes of the viewing public. This was proven to be a correct assumption. Reviews of the cable movie featured in magazines such as Time (Bellafante, 1995) and TV Guide (McDougal, 1995) on the film's depiction of an overzealous prosecuting attorney, a mentally unbalanced parent of a child victim, and a punitive therapist all lend themselves to the perpetuation of the idea that the true victims are the alleged perpetrators. Ironically, this film also cast the media in an unfavorable light, implying that the media's over-the-top reporting of the event led to a veritable witch hunt.

Television has not been the only medium providing a slanted, biased, or otherwise incomplete or inaccurate depiction of material relevant to this social problem. Several regional and national magazines published articles that, with few exceptions, portrayed ritual abuse as a fantasy and a fraud (the exceptions being articles appearing in Vanity Fair[7] and MS Magazine[8]). The first publication provided a discussion with both sides of the controversy represented. The second accurately represented the experience of a ritual abuse survivor. On the other hand, the lurid articles that appeared in Mirabella[9] and in two consecutive issues of The New Yorker[10] served to further depict an extreme and sensational point of view. In The New Yorker article in particular, the author failed to accurately represent the claims of survivors, and he omitted the substantiating evidence for their reports. This was particularly disheartening to us because we had spoken at some length to the author, Larry Wright, while he was researching ritual abuse for his article. We later learned that other individuals well acquainted with ritual abuse issues had also provided factual information intended to produce an article that fairly represented the issues. Instead, Wright elected to focus on a particular case where he argued that the evaluation of an alleged perpetrator[11] might have been corrupted by poor interviewing techniques. Wright portrayed this scenario as typical of cases involving ritual abuse claims and omitted factual information that was inconsistent with this theme. In 1994 Wright's articles were expanded to book length and published as Remembering Satan (1994).

While there was some isolated reporting on a large-scale investigation of child abuse and the as-yet unsolved disappearance of a teen in Gilmer, Texas, for the most part the national media ignored the story. This case had all the elements the media has generally found to be red meat for its readers and viewers, and involved allegations of widespread child abuse, ritual abuse, police and governmental corruption, kidnapping, murder, and cannibalism in a small East Texas community. In 1992, 15 children in Gilmer, Texas, were removed from their extended families of origin and placed in protective, therapeutic foster care after investigations by child protective services (CPS) revealed their sadistic sexual abuse and victimization by parents, grandparents, aunts, uncles, and others. A special prosecutor was appointed to bring the alleged perpetrators to justice. Scott Lyford, a Galveston attorney, and his investigative team were able to accumulate sufficient evidence to gain indictments and convictions against the eight defendants.

As the children became increasingly secure in their foster care environment and in their therapeutic relationship with mental health professionals, they began to reveal details of their victimization that included elements of ritualistic abuse such as being forced to ingest blood, urine, and feces, and being forced to participate in deviant sex practices and other behaviors indicative of ritual activities. One of the abused children disclosed details regarding the disappearance of an area teenager, Kelly Wilson. This child implicated his sexual abuse perpetrators and an area police officer in the abduction, rape, torture, and murder of Wilson, a 17-year-old Gilmer resident who disappeared on January 5, 1992.

When confronted with the child's testimony, two of the accused adults confessed to the offenses, and one of the adults directed the investigative team to a property owned by the paternal grandparents of some of the children where the adult alleged some ritual activities had taken place, including the murder of Wilson. The two adults subsequently recanted their confessions and later confessed again. One of the adults plea-bargained to a lesser offense for which she was convicted but not sentenced. Both adults submitted to polygraph evaluations with the results supporting their confessions.

After the disclosures of ritual abuse, the allegations regarding the murder of Wilson, and the implications by some of the victims and some of the perpetrators that others, including a Gilmer police officer were involved in the crimes, the Texas Attorney General's Office replaced the special prosecutor and his investigative team. Assistant Attorney General Shane Phelps reportedly directed the grand jury to "no bill" the defendants. However, the grand jury apparently ignored this direction and instead dismissed the indictment without prejudice, allowing the state to reconsider the case at a future date.

The special prosecutor, his investigative team, and the CPS caseworkers continued to advocate on behalf of the 15 children. They alleged that the Attorney General's Office lost evidence, misinterpreted their investigation, failed to proceed with its own investigation, interfered with the children's psychotherapy, and removed the children from their therapeutic foster care without concern for their well-being. These individuals further alleged that the State of Texas, via the Attorney General's Office, retraumatized the children by forcibly removing them from their foster mother and by engaging in punitive and damaging strategies in order to gain the children's cooperation. The state attorney general, Dan Morales, continued to be unresponsive to residents of Gilmer and others who expressed concern for the welfare of the child victims. The request for a thorough public disclosure regarding the circumstances of the children's victimization was also ignored.

The special prosecutor, his investigative team, and the CPS caseworkers were sued by some of the accused child abuse perpetrators for malicious prosecution and other alleged improprieties. The State of Texas denied these individuals the option of state-funded independent legal counsel, despite evidence of a conflict of interest with the Attorney General's Office.

The children’s foster mother’s ability to visit with and nurture these children was reportedly made contingent on her assistance in soliciting the children’s cooperation with their new psychotherapeutic team. There was an implication that her failure to assist might result in the children’s return to their abusive families of origin. According to Bruce Perry,[12] the psychiatrist who headed the children’s treatment team, there were serious errors in judgment on the part of the Attorney General’s Office that resulted in the retraumatization of these severely abused children. Perry was specifically referring to the abrupt and distressing manner in which the children were removed from their therapeutic foster mother’s custody and placed in a facility in Waco, Texas. In a bizarre twist, on November 16, 1994, the Gilmer Police Department confirmed that on Halloween night, October 31, 1994, at least six boxes containing police records and evidence involving the Kelly Wilson case accumulated by the special prosecutor and his investigative team mysteriously disappeared from police headquarters.[13]

Despite the length of time this case was under active investigation and the huge number of victims and accused perpetrators, and the extraordinary nature of the allegations, there was little media coverage of the Gilmer events. The lack of local coverage is easy to explain but difficult to comprehend. The editor of the local newspaper, The Gilmer Mirror, was also on the Upshur County grand jury that heard the allegations. During her tenure on the grand jury, the editor published articles critical of the idea that ritual abuse exists. This appeared to be both a breach of her duty as a grand jury member and a serious conflict of interest. In the meantime, Dallas Morning News reporter Victoria Loe wrote articles about the Gilmer case that would be more accurately described as editorials. Several of the principals in the case, including the investigative team, Marie Kerr Gray and Donna Kerr Laney,[14] and members of the Justice for Kelly Wilson Committee, spoke at length and in great detail with Loe regarding specific incidents wherein the case had been contaminated through interference by the Texas Attorney General’s Office, the Gilmer police, and others. Loe never included this information in her articles. Loe was rewarded by being named a best reporter in 1994 by the Dallas Morning News. The Dallas Morning News did not, to our knowledge, publish anything about the missing Gilmer police files.[15]

In the Gilmer case, the media had complete access to the facts of the case and yet elected to ignore the story out of hand or to portray events in context with their preconceived notions of what constitutes abuse and who can be an abuser. However, the media is often denied access to information about crime that may include ritual abuse elements.

The 1990 murder of Mark Kilroy and others in Matamoros, Mexico, was a horrendous crime that was widely reported in the media. However, details involving the mutilation of the victims and actual testimony by the perpetrators were withheld from the media. The media deemphasized the ritual aspects of the crime and interpreted the murders as being more drug than cult-related. The co-author (PPN) viewed the recorded confessions of some of the accused perpetrators and their exhumation of the murder victim’s bodies videotaped by the Mexican Federales. Clear evidence of the ritual nature of the murders was apparent. Although accomplices to the murder of Kilroy confessed to additional sacrificial murders and indicated willingness to lead police to more burial sites, the Mexican police refused to investigate further and did not report these events to the media.

Frequently, police misrepresent details of particular crimes to the media in order to obscure facts that allude to the crimes having a ritual aspect. During the course of a training session for the Texas Council of Occult Crimes Investigators, police officers representing a variety of agencies discussed cases involving what they believed to be ritual crime. However, upon direction from their supervisors, they concealed the ritual elements when discussing the cases with media. One case, for example, involved a young female murder victim discovered roadside along a major highway in San Antonio, Texas. The media reports were limited to identifying the victim as a prostitute and suggesting her murder was drug-related. However, the autopsy film revealed that the victim had been horribly mutilated. The young woman had several tattoos with bizarre designs, some with cult connotations, adorning her body. Her eyes had been gouged out. She had been stabbed multiple times and her uterus had been torn from her body.

Why the police chose not to disclose the specifics of this case or similar ones is unknown. Some police officers speculated a variety of possibilities, including that police are suppressed by city, state, and county governments who fear a public relations backlash. Others postulated more sinister motivations. Regardless of law enforcement’s unwillingness to disclose information relevant to ritual crimes, the media that advocates an open and informed society could provide the investigative resources to report these events to the public.

What is needed is fair and balanced reporting of events, equal access to the media by proponents of disparate views, and open communication between law enforcement and the media. As of early 2014, it is clear that this goal is as yet unmet. A cursory review of current journalistic presentations of such topics as psychogenic amnesia, sexual abuse, and ritual abuse reveals an overrepresentation of publications and programming that reflect an anti-therapist, anti-victim perspective. As a consequence of sensationalized accounts of the cult and ritual abuse controversy, many survivors feel mischaracterized and misunderstood. Many perceive that the message to keep the silence is being reinforced by repeatedly biased, and sometimes inaccurate or untruthful, renderings of their stories. Frequent media portrayals of mental health professionals as villains, and accused perpetrators as victims leave survivors fearful that no justice will be forthcoming. Perhaps a better educated and more discriminating public will demand more of its media resources in the future.

Will “the System” Protect Them?

In the United States and most other democratic nations, there is a social contract between the citizens and their government. The people are expected to follow the laws and play by society’s rules with the presumption that in times of trouble their government will provide protection, security, support, and safety. These objectives may be accomplished through federal, state, county, and city programs that provide a range of services from law enforcement to child protection to access to health care through Medicare and Medicaid. Among the services most important to the security, safety, recovery and survival of victims of ritual trauma are child protective services (CPS), law enforcement agencies, victims’ assistance programs, Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI), and Supplemental Security Income (SSI) benefits.

When “Jane” first arrived in my office, she had just been discharged from a lengthy hospitalization in a dedicated dissociative disorders unit. She feared that because of her history of uncontrollable, violent acting-out, I would be unwilling to treat her. Indeed, she had been refused treatment by several local and national hospital programs and therapists. She was barely surviving financially and living in poverty. She was, literally and figuratively speaking, at the end of her rope. She was highly dysfunctional with uncontrolled dissociative episodes, suicidality, no social support, and inadequate financial resources.

On one occasion, Jane eloped from the office and made her way to the parking lot of the building. One of my mental health technicians followed Jane and attempted to calm her, but Jane grabbed an empty bottle from the curb and, holding it by the neck, in one deft movement she smashed it against the side of the building and held her weapon against the body of the tech. As the technician continued to try to reason with her, Jane abruptly turned the bottle against herself and cut her own arm. Fortunately for all of us, neither Jane nor staff was seriously injured. When Jane's destructiveness escalated in this manner, the only available option to us was to recommend hospitalization and hope that we could find a hospital that would take her. However, when I referred Jane for hospitalization, things were not much better. Once, she broke a wooden chair against the wall of a room where we were engaged in a therapy session and threatened me with the jagged leg that she wielded like a spear. It became increasingly difficult to find hospital programs willing to accept her. Jane was unresponsive to the prescribed medications, and hospitals were often unwilling to accept the responsibility of restraining her, even when she herself requested restraints.

Jane's ability to obtain appropriate medical and psychological treatment was not only impeded by her sometimes out-of-control behavior; she was also limited because she was destitute and wholly dependent on her small income from SSDI and SSI and health insurance through Medicare and Medicaid. These programs will be discussed in greater detail later.

Eventually in the course of our therapy sessions, Jane revealed that she had been highly placed in several cults[1] that had included satanic, African-derived, Native American, Masonic, and quasi-Masonic rituals. She had reportedly been a "programmer." Through a process of trial and error, I was able to isolate a number of the cult cues, or "triggers" to which her system responded with de-escalation of her violent behaviors. Once Jane was able to exert control over her behaviors such that she was able to minimize her self-destructive acting-out, she began to make significant progress in therapy. At those times when she felt unstable and dangerous, she entered the hospital, although her hospitalizations became increasingly briefer and more infrequent. In fact, she has not required psychiatric hospitalization in several years. Jane was able to reenter the workforce, something she had not been able to do in eight years. She also returned to college where she made excellent grades. Although she is no longer my patient, she maintains contact. She has remained employed by a national company and risen through the ranks to an administrative position. She is in a long-term stable relationship and reports that she is happy.

Prior to my meeting Jane, she moved to Texas secretly and lived anonymously under a pseudonym. She believed that she was at risk for being abducted by her “organization” and that if apprehended by them, she would be forced to return or she would be killed. It was impossible to objectively judge the accuracy of her claims or the extent to which her concerns represented genuine threats to her safety. However, on several occasions, Jane reported having been “accessed” by someone with an interest in hurting her or returning her to the cult.

One day, my office received an emergency call from Jane’s roommate requesting an immediate appointment for Jane. The secretary instructed the roommate to bring Jane in right away so that we could work her into the schedule. Upon arrival, the roommate explained that Jane had come to the roommate’s workplace complaining that her back was hurting. Jane’s roommate took her to the women’s restroom in order to inspect Jane’s back. When she lifted Jane’s shirt, the roommate said that she saw a sheet of paper stapled to the skin of Jane’s back. The roommate then removed the paper and the staples from Jane’s back. Jane was unable to account for the time between dropping her roommate at work and the time she returned to her roommate’s workplace.

As a male psychologist, it would not have been appropriate for me to examine Jane’s back to see whether it indeed been punctured; however, some female members of my staff did so and reported that it appeared as though staples had pierced Jane’s skin. What the staff members described was a fairly orderly, symmetrical placement of puncture wounds consistent in size with staple marks located in the center of Jane’s back between her shoulder blades. Jane was at that time a woman in her mid-30s who did not appear to have the agility to staple a piece of paper to her back in the manner in which it appeared to have been done. The paper that had purportedly been stapled to Jane’s back showed evidence of having been attached by staples to skin because it was bloodstained in a manner consistent with the description by Jane and her roommate. Two words were written in a childish scrawl across the paper, “Doctor Noblitt.”

As I questioned Jane regarding the meaning of the note and her recollection for the events, a child alter presented herself. She explained that Jane had been abducted, assaulted, abused, and threatened. According to the child alter, she had been directed to write a note saying, “Doctor Noblitt: Back Off.” The child alter agreed to write my name on the note but refused to write the message to me as it was dictated by her perpetrators. Eventually, the incomplete note was stapled to her back. I viewed this evidence of assault against Jane as being something concrete that should be further examined.

I was able to convince a local hospital to allow her to be admitted. Jane believed that she continued to be followed and feared for her life. Although I could not ascertain whether she was really under the threat of external perpetrators, I had no doubt that she believed she was, and given the incident of the stapled note, I was prepared to accept her concerns at least for the purpose of a working hypothesis.

Jane made good progress in her therapy. She elected to discharge from full hospitalization at Brookhaven dissociative disorders unit to their partial hospitalization program. Typically, Jane drove her roommate to work and then came to the partial hospital program. At the end of the day, she picked her roommate up on the way home.

One day, I was approached by one of the nurses from the inpatient unit. She asked me if I had Jane's patient chart, and I responded that I did not. The nurse said that the chart was missing, and no one could account for it. The hospital staff suggested that somehow Jane had pilfered her own chart. This notion seemed implausible. Hospital charts were kept in a locked nurses' station, on a locked unit separate from the unit where Jane was attending the partial hospitalization program. Jane did not have access to the unit, let alone the nurses' station. I believe the speculations leveled against Jane were conjectured by hospital staff in order to defer responsibility for the missing records.

A few days later, I was on the dissociative disorders unit seeing patients when I received an emergency page from the office of the partial hospitalization program. I made my way downstairs to find Jane curled up in a fetal position on a sofa in the hospital's day treatment program unit. As soon as she saw me, Jane jumped to her feet and, under the influence of a child alter, and before any of us could react, she lifted her shirt and revealed her naked back to me. Positioned directly between her shoulder blades was a burn, a brand, in the design of either a number "6" or "9" (depending upon one's vantage point).

One of Jane's child alters complained of significant gynecological pain and of having been sexually assaulted. I requested that the hospital examine Jane and provide any treatment that might be needed. The hospital staff declined, stating that if she had indeed been sexually assaulted, Jane would have to be evaluated in one of the county medical facilities where special forensic examination procedures were in place to accumulate evidence. Jane was subsequently transported to a neighboring county hospital in the area where she said that her assault had taken place.

The emergency room staff at the county hospital conducted a rape examination that revealed that papers had been forcibly inserted into Jane's vagina and rectum. Upon examination, it was determined that these papers were a part of her missing hospital chart. Coincidentally with Jane's examination, the cover and remainder of her hospital chart were left on the desk of a sheriff's deputy in still another city. According to the deputy's report, the chart was hand delivered and left on his desk by persons unknown. This deputy had been working with Jane to investigate some of her allegations of being stalked.

When a facsimile copy of the emergency room physician's report arrived at the psychiatric hospital where Jane was again an inpatient, it was totally illegible. Faint words were visible on the margins of the paper, but the middle section of the page was entirely blank. Upon retransmission, the results were still unreadable. The county hospital staff agreed to mail another copy of their report. When it did not arrive within a reasonable period of time, staff called and was informed that Jane's chart at the county hospital was missing. Days later, the chart was located.

Although the police appeared to take the attack on my patient seriously and attempted to investigate the incident, their efforts to prosecute the perpetrators were obstructed by uncooperative hospital staff from both the psychiatric hospital and the county hospital. We can only hypothesize that their concern for their liability and the reputations of their hospitals took precedence over the safety and recovery of their patient.

During the course of my work with individuals who allege ritual abuse, I have been asked to testify, sometimes as an expert witness, sometimes in my capacity as a therapist, as a fact witness in both civil and criminal cases.[2] In 1992 I was contacted by the district attorney's office of Travis County where Austin, the state capital, is located. Assistant District Attorney Judy Shipway asked if I would be willing to consult with her office regarding allegations of ritual abuse made by children who reported that they had been abused in a day care setting. I did not personally evaluate the children who had made the outcry, but I did examine all the data in the possession of the district attorney's office relating to the children's complaints, the setting in which the abuse allegedly occurred, information about the alleged perpetrators, and clinical data regarding the children's history, ongoing psychotherapy, and current functioning.

Upon my initial review of the information, I advised Shipway to focus her prosecution on the sexual abuse aspects of the case. In my opinion, the sexual abuse allegations were clear and easier for the jury to comprehend, and there was less likelihood for generating a sensational case that could confuse the important legal questions.[3] In reviewing the materials, I had no doubt that the alleged perpetrators were guilty of sexual and ritual abuse. I didn't want to see the state risk its opportunity for convictions by forcing the prosecutors to explain a concept as foreign as ritual abuse to the court. I was concerned that the issue at the core of the children's allegations, their sadistic, criminal abuse, might get lost amidst intellectual, philosophical, and religious arguments denying the existence of the ritualistic nature of the sexual assaults. I agreed to be available as a consultant to help develop a clearer case in the wake of the McMartin Day Care trail that ended with a hung jury and prosecution who were unwilling to retry the case. I also offered to serve as an expert witness in the event that the subject of ritual abuse was raised for any reason.

As the case unfolded in court, it was not the prosecution who introduced the subject of ritual abuse but the defense. The first of the alleged perpetrators to be tried were husband and wife, Dan and Fran Keller, the owners and operators of Fran's Day Care. The attorneys defending the Kellers used the children's reports of blood sacrifice, drinking blood, even murder, to cast doubt on their reliability as informants. The case against the Kellers floundered when the court forced one of the accusing children, a youngster barely five years old, to testify in open court in the presence of her alleged perpetrators. At that time, the child not only recanted her allegations but also denied that she had ever been subjected to any kind of abuse. She also denied ever having attended the day care facility.

Judy Shipway asked me to testify in order to explain to the jury how ritual abuse occurs and how it could account for the child's reaction in court. Not only was I called upon to explain ritual abuse, it was also necessary for me to refute the arguments of the defense's primary resource in supporting its contention that the children's allegations were untrue and were provoked by adults, including parents, therapists, and others.

The defense attorney introduced a book, Sex Abuse Hysteria: Salem Witch Trials Revisited, by Richard A. Gardner (1991), into evidence.

Gardner’s thesis was that allegations of child sexual abuse were the fabrications of adults who vicariously lived out their sexual fantasies through children. According to Gardner, many adults, including those who act in advocacy roles for abused children, were latent pedophiles who obtained sexual gratification through the sexual experiences, real or imagined, of children. As ridiculous as this argument may sound, it has been the foundation of many legal arguments in defense of alleged perpetrators of child sexual abuse. The district attorney’s office had wisely directed that the families involved not communicate with each other about the children’s allegations in order to reduce the possibility of the complainants being influenced by one another. The prosecutors were responding to the precedent of the McMartin case, in which the defendants’ legal counsel argued that the children in this ritual abuse case had been influenced by numerous sources. Although I know of no scientific evidence that would prove such an assumption,[4] it has been argued that children’s memories are often unstable and easily influenced by others. However, not all researchers agree with this hypothesis and, for the most part, see children as typically reliable and truthful respondents.

Regarding the case of Fran’s Day Care, the jury reached a guilty verdict, and Dan and Fran Keller were each sentenced to 48 years in prison. Although I was pleased that the children were believed and the Kellers were held responsible for their actions, I was disappointed at the outcome.

Prior to the sentencing, I sent a message to Shipway’s office recommending that the convicted couple be evaluated for dissociative identity disorder (DID) themselves. The reason for this recommendation is that ritual abuse is commonly transgenerational. Perpetrators may have such abuse histories in their own backgrounds. If they are to be rehabilitated, it is essential to know whether their perpetration was a result of their own experience resulting in their own dissociative states. Furthermore, they may have been entitled to use the insanity defense if they were sufficiently dissociated when the offenses occurred. I received no response. A third defendant in the Fran’s Day Care case, Doug Perry, confessed to sexual abuse of a child and was sentenced to a 10-year probated sentence. The two other accused perpetrators were deputy constables in the Travis County Sheriff’s Department. They were not brought to trial.

Over the years, a vocal contingent of supporters has actively advocated for the Kellers and sought an appeal of the verdict. In January 2013 an appeal was filed based on the testimony of the physician who examined one of the female victims in 1991. Michael Mouw, an emergency room physician, later testified at the Kellers' trial that in his opinion there was physical evidence of sexual abuse. In 2009, Dr. Mouw, by then a more seasoned physician, revealed that he had second thoughts based on experience over the intervening years that led him to conclude that what he had observed in 1991 and testified to in 1992 was possibly a variant of normal internal female anatomy. An appeal was filed asserting that the Kellers had received an unfair trial on the basis of Dr. Mouw's false testimony. In December 2013 the Kellers were released from prison on personal bond and are awaiting a decision from the Court of Criminal Appeals. Travis County district attorney Rosemary Lehmberg will determine whether to retry the Kellers. We have had no contact with the principals since the trial in 1992, but a 2009 article featuring a recap of the Kellers case included a comment that one of the victims, then 21 years old, continued to assert that he had been abused by the Kellers.[5]

As an interesting footnote to my participation in the Fran's Day Care trial, I received a call from an individual who identified himself as a television news reporter from Channel 7 in Austin. He called because he had observed one of the defendants, Mr. Keller, engaging in a brief series of bizarre hand movements that included what looked like American Sign Language. Some of these hand signals were captured on videotape. He asked if I would be willing to look at his film and comment on it for his television station. I agreed and the next day received a copy of the videotape of the mysterious hand signals. The following day, a reporter and camera crew from a local television station arrived at my office.

On camera, I explained how cult triggers are alleged to work and hypothesized that Dan Keller may have been signaling to someone in the court, possibly victims, jury members, or others. I retained a copy of the videotape from Austin showing Dan Keller's signaling. The consensus among patients and other therapists who have seen this film is that it is most probably a case of utilizing such signaling techniques.[6] Survivors report that unobtrusive signals are used in the court venue in civil and criminal cases. They are reportedly sometimes utilized in the jury selection process to stack the deck in cases that affect the interests of other cult members. There may be occasions when the presence of merely one or two friendly jurors may affect the outcome of a trial. Such signals are also allegedly used to intimidate susceptible witnesses, attorneys, and others. Obviously, not everyone would be influenced by such techniques—only people who had been trained to respond to such cues.

I encountered what may be a less subtle form of this signaling approximately a year previous to the Keller case when I appeared as an expert witness on behalf of a mother and her children involved in a custody dispute with the children's father. The children had alleged that their father had sexually and ritually abused them. The mother, herself allegedly a survivor of lifelong abuse, first in her family of origin and later via her ex-husband, had a history of psychiatric treatment, including hospitalizations. Her children, however, maintained that their mother had never been their perpetrator, and they all wished to be in her sole custody.

One morning I sat in the courtroom behind the mother's attorney, awaiting the commencement of the day's proceedings. The door to the courtroom opened and, to my surprise, and to the horror of the mother, the entire jury entered wearing red shirts. After an uncomfortable silence, the judge made a weak joke about there being no conspiracy. I asked the mother's attorney if he had ever seen such a display by a jury in his lengthy career in law, and he said that he had not.[7] Other ritually abused patients have told me that they had been sent messages that were conveyed through the color red, which they believed was intended to disrupt and cause the survivor to obsess or act on thoughts of self-cutting (i.e., producing blood). Although the father denied having ritually abused his children, he did admit that he had pointed a loaded gun at one of his children on one occasion. Of course, he may have made this admission because it was witnessed by neighbors. Nevertheless, the father was awarded full custody of the children.[8]

Custody cases are notoriously difficult venues in which to deal with ritual abuse allegations. There are invariably counterclaims by the accused that the plaintiff has created or encouraged false allegations to punish or control. In every custody case in which I have been involved, the defense has relied on various texts by Gardner, Underwager, and Wakefield and other apologists for the False Memory Syndrome Foundation's doctrine. Furthermore, in almost every instance, the mother is at an extreme financial disadvantage, and often cannot afford to hire a highly skilled lawyer or expensive, well-known experts. In addition, because the court systems are still overwhelmingly male dominated and bastions of the "good old boy" network, mothers are frequently put on the defensive and unfairly characterized as having ulterior motives when their children make allegations of sexual or ritual abuse. In fact, when mothers have come to me asserting that their children have made an outcry against their fathers, it has been necessary to first explore the possibility that such notions were deliberately insinuated in the children by their mother or others in order to prepare for this often used argument.

One such woman called me from another city. She identified herself as the divorced mother of two little girls. She described situations involving the children that had concerned her enough to consult with a child psychologist. The mother described precocious and bizarre sexual acting out by her three- and five-year-old daughters. The mother, a schoolteacher, attempted to deal with the situations in a gentle, nonjudgmental way. However, despite her attempts to discourage the children from acting out individually and with others, they were not deterred. As the children's behaviors became increasingly out of control, the mother sought advice from a therapist. The therapist told the mother that the children demonstrated emotional and behavioral evidence of sexual molestation. Devastated, the mother turned to CPS for additional assistance. A CPS caseworker informed the mother that based on her experience, she believed the children had been ritually abused. The caseworker referred the mother to a police officer who verified that based on the children's bizarre actions, he too believed that they had been ritually abused.

The mother sought a consultation with me in order to obtain a second opinion regarding the children's possible ritual abuse, and specifically, the identity of the children's perpetrator(s). When, over the course of several weeks the children began to divulge information indicating that their father had abused them, the mother reacted with shock and dismay. When this revelation occurred, I was obligated to notify CPS.

The mother requested that the court amend the visitation agreement such that the father was permitted only supervised visitation with their children. Among the children's complaints against their father had been his abuse of them utilizing an aerosol soap dispenser decorated with Disney cartoon characters. According to the girls' reports, their father had inserted the tip of the dispenser into their rectums and their vaginas. When the father arrived at the court-ordered supervised visits, he brought the children gifts of the same soap dispensers. The children were unusually silent and compliant during his visits and became highly agitated at home with their mother.

In spite of the favorable impression the mother made on me, the father made an even more favorable one on the court.[9] In a conversation with my assistant following my court appearance, the mother's own attorney exclaimed, “Maybe he [the father] might have done something he shouldn't have done with the little girls, but I don't think he hurt them. When he was on the witness stand, he was crying. He loves his children.” Such naiveté is commonly found in cases of sexual and ritual abuse where the alleged perpetrator appears as a sincere and caring individual who proclaims his or her innocence over the protestations of accusers. In some cases, the perpetrator may even pass a polygraph.[10] In many instances in retrospective assessment of the case, the perpetrator has dissociated the memories of the abuse and sincerely feels innocent.

I was referred an inpatient consultation some years ago. The patient, a young mother married to her second husband, was hospitalized after experiencing severe distress in response to her children's allegations of sexual abuse by her husband, the biological father of the two younger children and stepfather of the older children. I was asked to evaluate the patient and found her to be highly dissociative. In a dissociated state, the patient described a history of sexual and ritual abuse perpetrated against her by her family and others during her childhood, by her first husband, and by her current husband.

I reported my findings to the psychiatrist in charge of the children's case, and he requested that I also evaluate the children and the father, all of whom were hospitalized at the same facility. Before I was able to interview the children, their CPS caseworker overruled the physician's orders and removed the children to a distant psychiatric facility, where they remained until their insurance benefits were exhausted.

I spent quite a bit of time with the father. Curiously, the father admitted to some of the alleged abuses. However, he denied certain of the allegations with great sincerity. This aroused my curiosity. Why would he admit some of his guilt but not all? In fact, he pled guilty to the charges against him and subsequently served time in prison. I believe that he was amnestic for some of the episodes of abuse.[11] This is not to suggest that he should not be held accountable or that his children should not be protected from him. But I believe that this constituted another indication of significant psychological disturbance that is poorly addressed in a prison. I suggested to the father that he might be able to obtain psychological assistance if he were to plead insanity, something that he could justifiably claim if he was in a dissociated state when the crimes occurred. The patient discussed this option with his attorney, who advised against it. According to the attorney, such a plea would inevitably result in his being incarcerated (via forced psychiatric hospitalization) for even longer than his prison sentence.

Many persons who believe that they have been ritually abused also often think that they themselves have engaged in some acts of perpetration. A commonly reported feature of ritual abuse occurs when the individual is forced to perpetrate a criminal act, or a simulation is staged whereby the individual, often after being drugged and tortured, believes himself or herself to have engaged in some horrible act.[12] Such forced "perpetration" allegedly occurs to cause these individuals to acknowledge and fear the cult's ability to implicate them in real or simulated criminal acts. This results in the person feeling that escape from the cult is futile and that any efforts to resist or fight the authority of the cult leader will be severely punished.

Thus, survivors of ritual abuse often need tangible support and resources to escape this kind of control. However, the agencies that have the responsibility for providing support and advocacy for victims have often instead become serious obstacles to their safety and recovery. My personal experience with CPS has been unusual, yet I am not alone in my concerns in the significant problems CPS often has in managing these cases. Many other professionals with whom I have consulted have also had frustrating experiences with this agency. Because we cannot, as a profession, rely on CPS to consistently perform its mission to protect children, it is a complicating factor in trying to obtain appropriate services for children we suspect are abused.

On one occasion, CPS referred a family for evaluation. The family consisted of the father, mother, and three children ranging in age from 7 to 11 years. CPS was consulted when school authorities noted that the middle son had excessive absences from school. On investigation, CPS learned that the child was being evaluated by a number of different medical specialists; however, none of the physicians were able to diagnose any particular physical problem. The CPS caseworker determined that the child was the victim of the mother's symptomatology of Munchausen's syndrome by proxy and had all three children removed from the home and placed in three different foster care facilities. Munchausen's syndrome is a psychiatric diagnosis whereby an individual seeks and obtains medical treatment for nonexistent maladies. Munchausen's syndrome by proxy[13] consists of obtaining unnecessary treatment for someone else, typically a child. This is a rather obscure disorder, and I was curious how the CPS caseworker could have made this diagnosis on so little corroborating evidence.[14]

As I evaluated the parents and children, I discerned a pattern of abuse emanating from the father, not the mother. The children and their parents all acknowledged the father's emotional distance and aloofness from the children. The mother revealed that her husband exerted unusual control over her and their children. He was, by his own admission, a "control freak." They all agreed that the father had behaved violently and unpredictably from time to time and related an incident where the father fired a gun loaded with Teflon-coated bullets, "cop killers," in the house. The mother interacted as a warm and affectionate woman who had sustained a serious head injury in childhood that had resulted in some minor neuropsychological deficits. Because her son was undersized, she had taken him to a physician and, when that physician remarked that he could find no apparent problem but that a specialist might, the mother consulted with specialists.

I was unable to find any evidence that the mother was attempting to use the child's "poor health" as a means of satisfying her own needs. In fact, she consulted others and relied on their advice because she did not have confidence in her own judgment. The children all reported a close and loving relationship with their mother and a distant and unpredictable one with their father. The oldest son described physically abusive confrontations with his father. He reported that his father had come into his bedroom, awakening and beating him without provocation. The youngster's siblings and mother corroborated these claims that were denied by the father.

When I made my initial report to CPS, I indicated that the mother was an appropriate custodial parent, but that the father was unstable and posed a threat to the safety of the family. I recommended that the children be returned to the mother, that the father reside elsewhere, and that the family engage in individual and family therapy to work toward resolving the core problems that had resulted in their dysfunctional family relationships. In response, CPS inundated my office with copies of journal articles documenting various cases of Munchausen’s syndrome by proxy. Although I repeatedly explained that nothing in my evaluation or observation of this family or its members supported that diagnosis, the CPS caseworker and her supervisor persisted.

Eventually, CPS relented and followed my recommendations. However, it was made clear to me that I would receive no further referrals from that agency in the future. The children, once returned to their mother’s custody, thrived in the absence of their father. The mother learned to trust her instincts and live independently of the children’s father. The father did not seem interested in resolving his psychological problems or reuniting with his family. The parents ultimately divorced, and the mother retained sole custody. Although the father was granted usual visitation rights, he did not exercise them in the years after the divorce. The children are now all adults who remain close to their mother and estranged from their father.

On another occasion, I was contacted by CPS in a distant city. They were requesting evaluation of a six-year-old girl whom they suspected of having multiple personality disorder. The child arrived at my office accompanied by her foster mother and a CPS caseworker. While the child was in another room, I explained to the adults that when I evaluate for DID, I also evaluate for the presence of ritual abuse. I explained that I do not utilize hypnosis in my evaluation; rather, I unobtrusively incorporate what I am told are cult “triggers” into the clinical interview process and then observe the patient’s response. The CPS caseworker appeared very interested and asked numerous questions. When she was satisfied, the child was brought into the office.

With the caseworker and foster mother present, the interview with the child commenced. After a short while, the child responded to the unobtrusive triggers by falling into a trance state, during which alternate identities emerged. Surprisingly, these triggers apparently affected the caseworker, who entered into such a deep trance that her head lolled on her shoulders and she reclined limply against a sofa with her mouth agape and her eyes rolled up. The foster mother looked alarmed and puzzled, wondering what had happened. Because the caseworker was not my patient, I did not attempt to question or interview her. At the end of the session, I used the procedure for bringing the child out of the trance, and the caseworker simultaneously responded to the same technique.

The caseworker reacted with surprise when she woke and exclaimed that I must have hypnotized her, even though I had previously explained to her that I would use no hypnosis in the interview. The caseworker was evidently rattled by the experience. The foster mother, having observed the effects of the interview on both the girl and the caseworker, seemed perplexed regarding what she had witnessed.

In the course of another case in which a mother and her adolescent daughter were both under my care for treatment of DID and ritual abuse, the CPS caseworker visited the mother at her place of work. The caseworker reportedly asked the mother about the nature of our therapy sessions. The mother, “Ann,” explained that she often entered into a trance state during our sessions and could not account for much of what transpired. The caseworker reportedly told the mother that I might be sexually abusing both mother and daughter while they were in a trance state. Furthermore, the caseworker stated that the mother should keep a journal and recommended that it be divided into five parts delineated by colors with the following designations: “red is for blood, black is for death, green is for peace, blue is for running away, and white is for silence.”

The next morning, Ann arrived in my office in a highly agitated state. She reported that after hearing what the caseworker had said to her, she felt an overwhelming compulsion to either cut herself (“red is for blood”) or to engage in a cult ritual. She reported that she had done the latter in a private ceremony where no people were harmed but where she had allegedly sacrificed her pet cat and eaten its heart and burned its body.

She explained that although what the caseworker had told her was upsetting, she knew that no improper behavior had occurred in our sessions and she was amazed that her CPS caseworker would make such an inappropriate suggestion. Nevertheless, the caseworker had instilled new fears in the patient’s daughter. Prior to Ann’s appointment, the caseworker had again appeared at her workplace wearing a blue dress. Ann reported an almost irresistible urge to run away and abandon her child, her work, and her therapy.

Ann’s allegations about her caseworker necessitated a meeting of all the concerned parties. If Ann had misunderstood what her caseworker had said to her, then this misperception needed to be corrected. If Ann’s perception was accurate, then her caseworker was evidently behaving unprofessionally and interfering with Ann’s care as well as her safety. I requested a meeting between Ann, the caseworker, the caseworker's supervisor, myself, and another of my staff members.

As Ann and I addressed our concerns in the meeting, the supervisor had an opportunity to observe the highly inappropriate behavior of the caseworker. The caseworker spent the entire meeting looking at a pad in her lap and scribbling on it at a furious rate. She never looked me in the eye, never looked up from her pad, and never entered the conversation, even to respond to direct questions. The supervisor appeared confused and agreed to investigate further. Later, my office was informed that the caseworker had been reprimanded and removed from Ann's case. However, a short while later, the caseworker was reassigned to Ann.

There are other examples of inappropriate or potentially dangerous behavior by CPS. A year before the Branch Davidians made national news in Waco, their compound, Mount Carmel, was visited by CPS. Reports by former cult members and survivors indicated a pattern of physical and sexual abuses against the children in the compound. Reportedly, a CPS caseworker visited the compound and interviewed some of the children. She determined that abuse was occurring and requested that her agency remove the children from the compound. The caseworker's supervisor declined to follow the caseworker's recommendation. Some of those children later died when the compound was destroyed.

CPS acts as an arm of the justice system, making recommendations regarding the disposition of allegations of child abuse and advising the court as to appropriate custodial arrangements for minor children. Yet many caseworkers appear to be distinctly unqualified to discern some forms of child abuse and do not seem able to recognize perpetrators, even when the perpetrators identify themselves. Some caseworkers may be extreme abuse survivors themselves. When such individuals have made significant strides in their own recovery, they may be helpful protectors of children. However, some extreme abuse survivors who are not in recovery may be triggered to act in ways that are unhelpful to vulnerable children.

"Theresa" came to me with a history of ritual abuse allegedly perpetrated by her parents. Theresa's three children had been removed to the custody of CPS, which became involved with this family when the children were reportedly abducted from their home by a family acquaintance. While the children were in treatment, an investigation into Theresa's background revealed her to be a practicing Wiccan. Caseworkers from CPS expressed strong disapproval of her religious affiliation. While in CPS custody, the children described a history of abuse emanating not from Theresa but from their stepfather. The children reported that when Theresa discovered the abuse was occurring, she separated from her spouse in order to protect her children. The children begged to return to their mother. However, because she participated in a nontraditional religion, CPS recommended that the children be removed from her care. The three children were placed in three separate foster homes.

For months Theresa was denied visitation, despite her agreement to divorce her husband, renounce her religious affiliation, and embrace a traditional Christian orientation, maintain a proper home, and arrange alternate living arrangements. Theresa made excellent progress. She complied with every demand made by CPS and the courts. She attended parenting classes and therapy, determined to be reunited with her children. She was granted supervised visitation and never failed to take every opportunity to be with her children. Although monthly reports from my office kept CPS and the court appraised of Theresa's progress and recommended the children's return to her custody, new obstacles continually appeared in her path.

The most disturbing problem for Theresa was that while she was being denied the opportunity to visit with her own children, her parents, whom she had named as her own childhood abusers, and from whom she had been estranged for years were given unlimited, unsupervised access to Theresa's children. It was the view of CPS and the courts that because the parents embraced more overtly traditional and acceptable standards of behavior, they were more appropriate influences in the lives of the children. Although CPS was repeatedly advised that Theresa maintained that her parents were abusive, neither the court nor CPS responded to our concerns.

Examples of miscarried justice occurring during divorce proceedings are commonplace when allegations of sexual or ritual abuse are made. Whether the allegations are made at the time of the divorce or in subsequent custody hearings, the protective parent (usually, but not always, the mother) risks losing custody and sometimes even visitation when she supports her child's outcries of abuse. A scenario that we have seen repeated time and time again is exemplified by what happened to "Emma."

Emma was an elementary school teacher in a small town who had divorced her husband the year before. She had endured years of his alcoholism along with his disappearance from the home for extended periods, extramarital affairs, and the loss of his job. “John” was the son of a wealthy and prominent family in the community, and following his separation from Emma, he returned to his parents’ home. At the custody hearing, John was granted liberal visitation consisting of every Tuesday and Thursday, every other weekend, and a portion of holidays and summer vacations.

Emma’s two preschool-age daughters began acting out in sexually inappropriate ways following overnight visitation with their father. They began having nightmares and night terrors. They began wetting their beds and fearing sleep. They aggressively masturbated in the home and in public and engaged other children in sexually oriented play. They expressed unwillingness to attend visitation with their father; yet after visitation, they expressed anger and violent rage at their mother, hitting her and talking about killing her. At first, Emma believed that the girls were expressing normal feelings of confusion and anger following the emotional upheaval of the divorce. Emma took the girls to a counselor to help them sort through their conflicted feelings. In the counselor’s office, the children were allowed to go into a playroom, where the counselor observed the children’s activities. She noted that the children were engaged in aggressive, sexually driven play with the dolls in the playroom. The girls removed all the Barbie dolls from the shelf and undressed them. They manipulated the dolls into sexual positions emulating oral sex. They made stabbing motions with pencils and crayons in the vaginal and anal areas of the dolls. The girls repeated this type of play with the family of dolls in a dollhouse. They selected the “daddy” doll and the “children” dolls for their play.

When the counselor joined the girls, she asked what they were playing. They responded that they were playing with their daddy. The children began to speak about what was clearly sexual abuse. The counselor immediately called CPS and referred a shocked Emma to a physician to perform physical evaluations on the girls. The physician discovered signs of vaginal and anal penetration exemplified by scarring. Furthermore, these three- and four-year-old sisters had been diagnosed with a sexually transmitted disease. Emma called her lawyer and asked him to make immediate application to restrict her ex-husband’s visitation with the girls. Her lawyer argued with her and accused her of being “spiteful and vindictive.” He said that if she persisted in her plan to alter the visitation agreement, he could no longer represent her. Emma contacted every lawyer in her small community, and each one declined to represent her against her husband. Emma had to seek legal representation from an attorney in a neighboring city.

As the children continued in therapy, they made outcries of specific sexual and ritual abuses perpetrated by their father, their paternal grandparents, their aunts and uncles, and others whom they could not specifically identify by name. CPS reported that they could find no evidence that the children had been abused by their father; the CPS caseworker instead focused on Emma's fiancé and members of her family, none of whom had been named by the children or had any history of inappropriate or illegal activity or suspect behavior. The court ordered psychological evaluations of Emma and John. The court-appointed psychologist testified that John demonstrated no significant psychological problems. However, his interpretation of Emma's test results indicated that she has "high-strung, hysterical, and controlling," characteristics that neither the children's therapist, her colleagues at work, nor her social acquaintances had never observed.[15] The court-ordered psychologist also examined the children and reported to the court that she believed that the children were being used by the mother as a weapon against her ex-husband. According to the psychologist, the children were not victims of ritual abuse but of ritual abuse hysteria emanating from their mother and the children's therapy team.[16] Emma's quest to alter the visitation agreement failed. In reading his decision, the judge warned Emma that if she attempted to appeal his findings, he would terminate her parental rights and assign sole custody of the girls to John.

This outcome is not unusual. In case after case, protective mothers have lost custody, visitation, and even their parental rights. One of the most famous cases involved Elizabeth Morgan.[17] When Dr. Morgan's daughter, Hillary, made outcries that her father, also a health care provider, was sexually molesting her during court-ordered visitation, Dr. Morgan attempted to modify the visitation agreement. After she had exhausted all her legal options, Dr. Morgan arranged for her daughter to go into hiding in New Zealand with Dr. Morgan's parents, Hillary's maternal grandparents. Dr. Morgan spent two years in jail for contempt of court for refusing to reveal Hilary's location until she was released by congressional order. Dr. Morgan and Hillary remained in New Zealand until the passage of the Elizabeth Morgan Act that permitted their return to the United States. Hillary, who subsequently changed her name to Elena Mitrano, is a professional vocalist and songwriter who maintains that her father was abusive and credits her mother with saving her life.

How is our justice system to fairly address the issue of ritual abuse and protect vulnerable people who have been victimized? Our interactions with the justice system have thus far been discouraging. The punitive attitude sometimes seen in the criminal justice system may actually discourage arriving at an effective solution based on remediation. The more we can encourage perpetrators (or individuals who believe that they have participated in criminal activities) to divulge their secrets, the closer we may come to finding the answers to fundamental questions of how and why these criminal activities persist. It is important that we refrain from another modern version of witch-finding hysteria. Instead, we need a compassionate, but dedicated, search for constructive solutions.

How are individuals so wounded by past traumas able to survive and recover control over their own lives? Some are able to maintain such complete compartmentalization that they are able to support themselves by working. Frequently such individuals are either not aware of their past abuses or they choose not to explore them. Others may be fortunate to have supportive spouses, partners, or friends who are willing and able to provide the financial and social sustenance to facilitate survival and treatment. Others may be trapped in a symbiotic relationship with their perpetrators who provide financial resources in exchange for their victims' silence about past or ongoing abuse.

The unfortunate reality about the psychological consequences of ritual trauma is that symptoms can emerge at unpredictable times that can cause significant disruption to activities of daily living as well as school or work performance. These disruptions can be chronic with waxing and waning intensity affecting memory, concentration, orientation to reality, perception, judgment, insight, and self-regulation. Such unpredictable episodes of deteriorated functioning may be uncomfortable interpersonally and socially, but they are often intolerable in the workplace.

When individuals are unable to work as a consequence of medical or psychological conditions, they may be entitled to benefits under the Social Security Administration (SSA). Young people under the age of 18, disabled adults who worked but did not pay or pay enough into the Social Security system through the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA), or people over the age of 65 and who are impoverished can receive SSI benefits. This is a federal program that provides a monthly stipend along with Medicaid health insurance. Some states also provide additional funding for those entitled to SSI. SSDI benefits are available to individuals who contributed to FICA through their employment and who meet the SSA eligibility requirements. Benefits include Medicare health insurance and a monthly income based on past earnings. Individuals who earned little or whose earnings were sporadic may qualify for both SSDI and SSI. However, eligibility to receive benefits is contingent on the ability to prove the existence of a "medically determinable impairment" and demonstrate that as a consequence of that impairment or its treatment the person is incapable of performing not only his or her accustomed work but also any other jobs in the local or national economy. This represents an incredibly high hurdle for most people to meet, even when they become incapacitated by quite obvious problems such as amputations, heart failure, and cancer. Demonstrating disability due to psychological factors can be far more complicated and challenging.

One significant problem is that the Social Security regulations provide for the opinion of the treating clinician[18] to have "great if not controlling weight" in the disability determination process. Many clinicians are confused by the differing definitions of disability that are recognized by Social Security regulations in the Code of Federal Regulations and the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Americans with Disabilities Act was designed to protect disabled workers require special accommodations in order to perform their jobs. For example, an individual confined to a wheelchair would require ramps to maneuver over steps and curbs, and it is the employer's responsibility to provide for this. Obviously if an individual can work and is motivated to work, it is likely in his or her best interests to do so. People benefit from the structure, monetary rewards, social interactions, and self-esteem resulting from employment.

The SSA defines disability as a medically determinable condition that is so severe that it prevents the individual from engaging in any full-time competitive work. Thus, if a person who would otherwise be considered disabled were able to work part time or in a situation that was in a protective environment or circumstance (i.e., working in a family business with special allowances and consideration for the disabling condition), or with special accommodations not generally available to other workers, it would not be considered competitive and the SSA would still consider the claimant disabled.

The SSA's criteria for evidence of disability includes medical records demonstrating the claimant's treatment to reflect the level of impairment and compliance with treatment, the opinion of treating clinicians that the individual would be incapacitated from typical work duties in the competitive job market, and affirmation by the treating clinician or others that the claimant's disability is not caused nor worsened by substance abuse or dependence. There are several problems with this method. In order to obtain sufficient treatment records, one must be able to afford treatment. Many claimants for both SSDI and SSI are impoverished. They cannot work, they have exhausted any savings they may have accrued, and some are homeless. If they are receiving treatment, it is frequently through public facilities and hospital emergency rooms. Although there may be adequate records that substantiate that the claimant has sought treatment, there is typically no continuity of care, and oftentimes, there are disagreements among various providers such that diagnoses and treatment are repeatedly changed. This is especially true of psychological complaints. It is thus extremely difficult to obtain the needed documentation from a recognized treating source regarding the individual's capacity to function within a competitive work environment.

Furthermore, the SSA bureaucracy frequently associates medication with treatment, even when there is no evidence that the medication leads to improvement significant enough to support a return to work. Psychotropic medications frequently carry numerous side effects and specific health risks. Well-documented side effects of psychiatrically prescribed drugs include dry mouth, nausea, constipation, drowsiness, weight gain, impaired concentration, impaired memory, mania, psychosis, hallucinations, depersonalization, heart attack, diabetes, liver damage, involuntary movements, tremors, seizures, stroke, sudden death, and increased risk of suicide. In addition to the adverse effects that frequently occur in many psychiatric patients, these medications are often prohibitively expensive and unaffordable. Furthermore, individuals who have ritual abuse histories often respond to medications idiosyncratically, and even when prescription drugs offer some relief, there comes a point where they lose their value with increasing dosages failing to restore patients' previous levels of functioning.

Additionally, the process of applying for and obtaining benefits is arduous and lengthy. In 2009 only 25.4% of all applicants for SSDI and SSI were approved at the initial application level. An additional 6.5% were approved upon reconsideration. Those applicants who advanced to the hearing level and whose claims were heard by an Administrative Law Judge were awarded benefits 68.6% of the time. Obtaining a hearing date can take more than a year depending on the region where the applicant resides.[19]

Finally, even when ritual abuse survivors do meet the criteria and are eligible to receive benefits, the amount received is still generally near or below the poverty line. The federally defined poverty level for 2014 is an annual income of $11,670 for an individual, $15,730 for a couple, and $23,850 for a family of four.[20] As of January 2014, the monthly SSI payment was $721 a month for an individual, $1,082 for a couple. Some states contribute to SSI benefits but many do not. The SSA has established that substantial gainful activity for 2014 is $1,070 monthly ($14,040 annually). Individuals who receive less than $1,070 per month in SSDI benefits may also be eligible to receive SSI benefits up to that amount. For SSDI beneficiaries, the average monthly payment is $1,148 ($13,776 annually). Disabled people often incur additional expenses that dilute their disability benefits. They have additional transportation expenses for travel to and from medical appointments. They often require special diets or supplements that are not covered by medical insurance coverage. They may require additional services in the form of in-home assistance to complete activities of daily living. These expenses are not typically taken into account (with the exception of blind beneficiaries who are awarded a higher monetary benefit in recognition of their increased cost of living).

When the beneficiaries qualify for Medicare insurance (29 months from the onset of their disabling condition),[21] the monthly premium for this health insurance policy ($104.90 in 2014) is deducted from their Social Security benefit, resulting in a decreased annual income of $12,517.20 based on the previously described model. Medicaid health insurance provides very low reimbursement to physicians and hospitals and is thus not accepted by many providers. Medicare is considered to be superior to Medicaid, but an increasing number of clinicians, dissatisfied with its bureaucracy and level of reimbursement, are declining to accept it. Still, if an individual receives as little as $1 in SSI benefits, he is entitled to receive Medicaid in addition to Medicare, resulting in 100% health insurance coverage and making its acceptance by clinicians and facilities less onerous. Some individuals qualifying for both Medicare and Medicaid may also be eligible to participate in a program for Qualified Medicare Beneficiary that covers the cost of Medicare premiums and deductibles for prescription drugs. Nevertheless, even these programs do not adequately cover the real cost of survival and treatment for the beneficiaries.

So will the “system” protect survivors of ritual abuse? We find that the theory of a social safety net has only been partially realized. Those institutions designed to safeguard the public, protect children, and provide support are demonstrably inconsistent and often poor in their delivery of needed services. The public is not protected, children continue to be victimized, and resources available to those survivors able to prove eligibility for benefits are barely adequate to insure minimal survival, let alone reasonable opportunities for recovery.

Cult and Ritual Trauma Disorder

“Jean” was admitted to an inpatient chemical dependency unit in New Mexico, where she successfully became “clean and sober.” She had a long history of drug and alcohol abuse and finally decided to do something about her addictions. However, while in the process, she began to have flashbacks about satanic ritual abuse perpetrated by her father, the pastor of a large church. Jean was subsequently diagnosed with multiple personality disorder, and she sought treatment. After researching her options, she selected the inpatient dissociative disorders program under the direction of Gary Lefkof, which at the time was housed at the Cedars Hospital in De Soto, a suburb of Dallas, Texas.

Jean made considerable gains during her hospitalization, and when she was ready to be discharged, she was referred to me for outpatient care. Her inpatient therapist told me that Jean was highly placed in her cult. When I met Jean, she said she had no direct knowledge of her role in what she said was her father’s cult. Sometimes when we spoke, she dissociated and, while in alternate identity states, Jean would speak to me about her role as a high-ranking individual and a “programmer.”

I wanted to test Jean’s claims but initially had no idea how to do it. As we developed rapport, I asked Jean’s alters to tell me more. What was meant when she said that she was a “programmer”? At times, there was much resistance to this question. She was secretive and sometimes hostile as she dissociated as different alternates. She made it clear that the information was secret and that only a few of her alternates had enough knowledge about it to answer my question. She told me that she definitely could not impart this purportedly clandestine information to me. However, over time she would dissociate, and in some altered states, she would begin to provide fragmentary answers to my earlier questions. For example, she described techniques that could be used to access other alters in her system of dissociated identities. She described the experience frequently reported by other clients with dissociative identity disorder (DID) where she perceived herself as lacking a whole and unified self. Instead, she experienced herself as an aggregate of separate and disconnected identities. Some of the alters would not participate in therapy without the use of particular accessing methods.

These methods generally worked with Jean. However, I questioned the possibility that these cues and signals worked with Jean simply because she had suggested that they would work. Maybe she invented them in her own imagination. In order to test her claims that these were cult-created methods of access, I introduced some of these same cues into sessions with other clients, who also described histories consistent with having been ritually abused. Whenever possible, this was done unobtrusively so as to avoid producing results simply by suggestion (Noblitt, 2010; Noblitt, 2011; Noblitt & Perskin, 2000).

Many of the clients, but not all, responded in a predictable manner to these cues. Several would go into deep trance states, some of which were coma-like in that the client was entirely unresponsive to the external environment until brought back to consciousness using the correct technique or until the individual fell asleep and then would wake naturally. In other cases, alternate identities emerged and sometimes corrected the manner in which the accessing techniques were used. Sometimes a protector alter would present for the purpose of lambasting me verbally or even with threats of physical violence because I had intruded into the patients’ supposedly secret dissociated world. Curiously after such episodes, and when the usual identity returned, these clients were often amnestic for the events that had transpired. When given the opportunity to observe what had happened on videotape, many of them expressed surprise.

I later learned that many alleged cult survivors believe that some programming is general or generic and is used in the cult training of a wide variety of individuals—even in different cults and in different locales. Another frequently reported belief is that some cult programming is not generic but is specific to a particular cult, a particular programmer, or a particular person being programmed.

On one occasion, Jean was speaking and casually mentioned to me, “You know, since all multiples have been ritually abused . . .” I stopped her, “What do you mean all multiples have been ritually abused?” At that time, and even now, the prevailing theory is that dissociation of identity is caused by severe and prolonged childhood abuse, not necessarily ritual abuse alone. Jean looked at me, smiled, and said, “When I was in the Cedars, 80 percent of the patients were talking about ritual abuse. The others just haven’t gotten to those memories yet.” At first this idea seemed preposterous. I had many patients with DID who had never said anything about ritual abuse. But as time went by, I had some other cult survivors say the same thing. Curiously, the ones who believed this notion were, by their own self-report, high in rank and allegedly trained as programmers.

These alleged programmers also talked about having been involuntarily involved in what they called “the organization.” They appeared to be describing a variety of “organizations,” some of which they identified with right-wing or other radical political philosophies such as the Christian Identity movement, the Aryan Brotherhood, and Neo-Nazi groups.[1] Some of them described histories of exposure to satanic or Luciferian cults in childhood and later involvement in other “organizations,” some of which sounded similar to David Koresh’s Branch Davidian sect and other apocalyptic and militia-like groups.

Although I had not specifically worked with any survivors of Koresh’s religious cult, I was interviewed by several radio stations during the crisis involving the Branch Davidians because of my previous work with other cult survivors. During that time, I viewed an excerpt from a 1987 interview of Koresh that aired on March 2, 1993, on the syndicated television program A Current Affair.

The television interviewer asked Koresh if he was involved in a satanic cult, if he was a “warlock,” and if it was true that he had an upside down cross imprinted on the skin of his chest. Koresh denied that he was a member of a satanic cult or a warlock. He admitted to having an inverted cross-shaped scar on his chest, for which he offered a rather curious explanation. According to Koresh, he had purchased a cross at a five-and-dime store. While playing with the cross by passing it over a candle flame, he accidentally dropped the cross on his bare chest, resulting in a burn in the shape of an inverted cross. Of course, an alternative explanation is that Koresh had some earlier involvement in a demonic cult and had been branded with this mark. Cult survivors commonly report such experiences, and sometimes they show scars they say were caused by cutting, burning, or branding. However, in many cases, cult survivors provide alternative explanations for their scarification, or they simply report that they don't recall any details about the injury that produced the scar.

The word cult is a curious one, and its usage appears to be in a state of transition. Many dictionaries define cult simply as a religion or religious practice. In history and anthropology, we know that the term cult generally refers to the devotion of a particular god or spirit, often in the context of a polytheistic religion. However in modern usage, the word cult is increasingly being used to refer to groups that subjugate the rights and endanger the well-being of the individual for the benefit of a few members of the group through the use of coercive persuasion or other methods of mind control.[2] Some people use the expression destructive cults to specify that the cult in question is not merely a religion or a sect within a polytheistic spiritual system, but that additional malignant characteristics are involved.

Between the mass murders committed by the Charles Manson Family[3] in 1969 and deadly confrontation between the Branch Davidians and the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) personnel and later the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI),[4] the public became increasingly aware of the potential explosiveness associated with some modern cults. There have been many such groups, some of which were quite public and some that flew under the radar. The Church Universal and Triumphant (CUT),[5] a survivalist cult, was founded in 1975 by Elizabeth Clare Prophet, a self-proclaimed “messenger of the Great White Brotherhood.”[6] She claimed approximately 30,000 followers at the apex of her influence. Another off-shoot of the apocalyptic cult, the White Brotherhood,[7] was founded in Russia by Ukrainian Marina Tsvigun-Krivonogova-Kovalchuk, known to her followers as Mother of the World, Maria Devi Christ and her husband, Yury Krivonogov. Krivonogov, a microelectronics specialist, was reportedly employed by the KGB, where he was attached to a secret institute charged with studying techniques for influencing the mind. In October 1993 Maria Devi Christ announced that the end of the world would occur on October 24, resulting in thousands of Ukrainians traveling on foot to Kiev to prepare for mass suicide. According to news reports, the trek was accompanied by hysteria and suicides among the followers. The promised mass suicide was averted when the doomsday was recalculated and the sect's hierarchy was arrested on November 10, 1993, for conspiring to stage a pogrom against Orthodox sanctuaries. In October 1994, deaths in Canada and Switzerland were attributed to the mass suicide and/or homicide of members of the Order of the Solar Temple (Serrill & Crumley, 1994). In 1978, 913 deaths were attributed to the People's Temple,[8] when cult leader Jim Jones ordered his followers to drink Kool-Aid laced with cyanide (Kilduff & Javers, 1978; Wooden, 1981). In March 1995, a Japanese cult[9] was responsible for releasing poisonous gas in the subway system, resulting in multiple deaths and injuries. Self-proclaimed messiah Wayne Bent[10] founded an apocalyptic church, the Lord Our Righteousness (LOR), in the late 1990s. In 2008, he was convicted of child molestation.

Currently, al-Qaeda has demonstrated the power to control suicide bombers who engage in mass killings that require sacrificing their own lives. Jihadists are reportedly trained to detonate explosive devices attached to their bodies for the rewards of an eternal afterlife. According to Yoeli and Prattos (2008), terrorism achieved cult status in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, destruction of the World Trade Center.

Shortly after the September 11 terrorist attacks, panellists at a convention session on hatred asked the American Psychological Association to form a task force to investigate mind control among destructive cults. From there, the new category of the cult of terrorism was derived. Terrorist organizations are now being equated with destructive cults (Dittmann, 2002; F.A.C.T.net, 2001, 2004). Becker (2008) furthers this argument with his own observations and conclusions:

> The pilots of 9-11 were not a hermetic group practicing their worship in closed settings. Members of this terrorist cell had lived by their own rules which likely incorporated Lifton's (1961) key criteria for mind control: dispensing of existence, doctrine over person, loading the language, sacred science, confession, demand for purity, mystical manipulation, and milieu (environment) control. They lived within the Islamic community in Hamburg, Germany and on their way to their mosque in the central train station area were confronted with the daily life of a multi-cultural society. Because of their ability to live in two contradictory worlds, to live as law-biding members of society until called upon by their leaders to commit ideologically motivated crimes, they have been called "sleeper agents." Their behavior was consistent with Lifton's (1986) concept of doubling. (p. 258)

This also reflects the experience reported by ritual abuse survivors. At an unconscious level of functioning, they were trained to incorporate the ideals and values of the cult while ostensibly living more conventional lives in a split or divided existence. However, some were trained to react destructively toward their normative culture on command. Fortunately, many survivors are able to resist their destructive impulses; others are not.

In addition to these wide-ranging organizations with grandiose goals and huge numbers of followers, instances of familial groups identified as cults or cult-like were made public. On June 17, 2005, Marcus Wesson[11] was sentenced to death for the mass murders of nine of his daughters and their children fathered by Wesson. According to his surviving children, Wesson was psychotic, delusional, and narcissistic but was able to exert absolute control over his wife, children, and grandchildren. In a similar case, Winnifred Wright[12] oversaw his own self-styled cult referred to as "The Family" and over whom he exerted absolute control. Following the death of his 19-month-old son from starvation, Wright and the mothers of his 12 children were arrested and eventually convicted for felony child abuse. Two of the women requested "deprogramming," claiming that "mind control is a reality" and that Wright had "brainwashed them."

There have been several polygamy-based groups associated with the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (FLDS), most notably those headed by Rulon Jeffs and his son Warren Jeffs,[13] who proclaimed themselves prophets. Warren Jeffs was convicted of rape in Utah in 2007. His conviction was overturned in 2010, and he was extradited to Texas in November 2010. On August 10, 2011, he was convicted of two felony counts of child sexual assault and sentenced to life plus 20 years in prison.[14] The FLDS group was established after the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (LDS) reversed its policy on people of color and admitted them to the LDS church. These groups also took on an apocalyptic perspective and predicted the end of the world on several occasions (Buchanan, 2005). The public became acutely aware of the FLDS way of life in 2008, when the Yearning for Zion[15] compound was investigated by Texas state authorities after child protective services was alerted that children were being exploited with underage girls being married to church elders, while young men were expelled from the group to protect the supply of young women. Although hundreds of children were taken into custody, ultimately there were no charges and the children were returned to their families. According to an ABC News report, Warren Jeffs continues to control the Yearning for Zion group from prison, ordering them to restrict their diet to beans and rice in order to conserve the group's financial resources.[16]

As religious cults proliferated, some writers complained that an anti-cult movement had arisen that was prejudicial toward new religious movements.[17] Some anti-cult zealots themselves may have violated the law in cases where they have allegedly forcibly abducted cult members for involuntary "deprogramming."[18] It is obviously wrong and presumably illegal to physically force a person into or out of a cult without some due process of law. However, it may not always be clear whether any given cultist is participating as a result of a freely made choice. Some ex-cultists alleged that they were kept in the cult by threats of harm to themselves or their families. Others reported they were the victims of mind control as the result of cult indoctrination or trauma-based training.

Many ex-cultists and survivors alleged that they were held enthralled by their leaders who exerted extreme control over them. In some cases, followers were recruited into the group; in others, they were born into it. Regardless, their money, property, lives, and even their thoughts and values were subject to the rigorous control of the group leaders. Control was established through various means, including starvation, physical abuse, drugs, sexual abuse, and coercive persuasion, all delivered within the context of rituals peculiar to the orientation of the group leader. Some of these rituals are based on existing rites such as the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church or concepts from the Kabbalah. Others seem to be the idiosyncratic creation of the group or its leader. These rituals are often used to emphasize the group's power and the unusual supernatural elements incorporated into the ceremonies often increase the victim's sense of isolation from normal life and dependence on the group.

The concept of mind control is an important feature of all of the destructive cults herein described. Where does one draw the line between abusive mind control and normal persuasion? A distinction may be made where normal persuasion is defined as communication in an atmosphere characterized by compromise, negotiation, and mutual respect for the needs of the various parties involved. Coercive persuasion may be construed as the use of harm, threats of harm, or manipulation in order to motivate a person to do the bidding of another. Coercive persuasion with traumagenic dissociation may be used to describe situations where there is not only harm, threats of harm, or manipulation, but that these methods have been carried out to an extent that the targeted victim has developed inner dissociated identities or other dissociated mental states that may then be further manipulated (e.g., through the use of triggering cues), often without the victim’s conscious awareness. Groups that use methods based on coercive persuasion with dissociation or trauma-induced dissociation with programming should always be classified as destructive cults in the sense that they are clearly using abusive methods of mind control. Thus, we have come to define ritual abuse as trauma-based exploitation of individuals in a ceremonial or circumscribed context designed for the purpose of creating or manipulating already created altered mental states. This abuse generally occurs within destructive cults or other organized groups that share similar philosophies or intent. Given the variety of destructive cults, it may be helpful to have a method for categorizing them.[19] For this reason, we have formulated a system for categorizing possible destructive cults. These groupings are not meant to be mutually exclusive, and some destructive cults may have characteristics of more than one of them. The system that we are currently using is as follows:

1. Destructive religious cults are associated with a particular religious practice, belief, or system of rituals, and may be further subdivided as follows:
    a. Destructive apocalyptic cults promote fear and paranoia along with unfounded predictions that the world is about to end. Destructive apocalyptic cults may be distinguished from apocalyptic religions in that the former utilizes abuse, exploitation, and mind control methods. Examples would include the Branch Davidians, Order of the Solar Temple, and Aum Supreme Truth.
    b. Destructive preindustrial cults meet the criteria for destructive cults and also embody the traditions of pre-industrial cultures (e.g., some African and New World vodoun and Santeria sects). Although some such religions may be considered destructive cults, one should not automatically assume that all are. Again, the criteria of abuse, exploitation, and mind control are essential to defining a cult as destructive.

    c. Destructive demonic cults meet the criteria for destructive cults and also promote the worship or reverence toward a malevolent deity, spirit, or principle (e.g., Satanism, Luciferianism) or those cults that use others' fears of demons to manipulate or control them.

2. Fraternal organizations that meet the criteria for destructive cults. These groups are often secret and may also espouse particular philosophic, religious, or sociopolitical ideals (e.g., the Bizango of Haiti, the Egbo, or Leopard Society of West Africa, and various subgroups within Masonry and other quasi-Masonic groups may meet these criteria).
3. Destructive sociopolitical cults would include the Ku Klux Klan, Aryan Brotherhood, and Neo-Nazi groups. We would include the Christian Identity movement here, even though technically it is a religion-related. However, it is not clear that the religious aspects of the Christian Identity movement are as cultish as are their racist values and politics.[20]
4. Organized crime groups that function as destructive cults exist for the primary purpose of supporting criminal activities where there is a need for utilizing mind control procedures because of the nature of the crime (e.g., child prostitution and pornography may require such mind control procedures if the perpetrators are to produce children who appear to be enthusiastic about the sexual activity that would normally be aversive to them). Even though coercion is presumably commonly used in criminal groups, we don't think it would be appropriate to categorize all crime organizations as cults. However, when there is evidence of trauma-induced dissociation and programming, we would classify such a group as a destructive cult.
5. Government and intelligence-related destructive cults refer to the alleged organized use of cult mind control procedures surreptitiously conducted by individuals within government agencies (e.g., the CIA) to further their purposes of intelligence gathering and the facilitation of other secret operations.[21] Unfortunately, the U.S. government has allowed extensive compartmentalization of secret information and procedures that sometimes provide a cover for unethical or illegal activities to occur without the knowledge of the general public (e.g., the Iran–Contra affair, the Watergate break-in, the use of U.S. citizens as guinea pigs for radiation research). Furthermore, because of the existence of sensitive compartmented information[22] within the various national security and intelligence agencies, it is possible to have secret information and operations to which other individuals with top secret security clearances have neither access nor the capacity to scrutinize. Essentially the intelligence community is "dissociated" from the mainstream populace because of the way in which secret information has been compartmented. Given this network of government-enforced secrecy, it may be difficult or impossible to fully or accurately assess many of the complaints of abuse made by survivors. Nevertheless, these reports should be seriously investigated.

6. Experimental destructive cults are groups that conduct coercive mind control research, typically without the victim's consent. An example would be the work of Donald Ewen Cameron, a past president of the American Psychiatric Association. He conducted experimental mind control research on unsuspecting psychiatric patients in Canada that was funded by the CIA.[23]

For the previously mentioned purposes, we have defined cult abuse simply as any maltreatment perpetrated by a cult (using the previously stated definition of cult). Cult abuse is thus similar, but not identical, to ritual abuse, which we define as trauma-based exploitation of individuals in a ceremonial or circumscribed context designed for the purpose of creating or manipulating already-created altered mental states. The differences between these two definitions are that cult abuse does not necessarily cause dissociation, and ritual abuse is not necessarily always carried out in a cult. Combined, the term cult and ritual trauma disorder is proposed as a diagnostic category to be included in a future revision of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders.[24] Such a diagnosis would promote scientific and professional attention to this often-neglected problem and would aid in providing clarity for forensic evaluations.

Ritual abuse, like other forms of victimization, has been slow in being recognized. As with child abuse,[25] the abuse of women,[26] and political torture,[27] our culture has been reluctant to confront such problems directly or promptly. We all have a duty to respond to reports of human suffering. That is not to say that all such reports should be judged, a priori, to be true. Nevertheless, all such allegations should be given a fair hearing. Those of us who are social scientists should be willing to consider all the evidence and all possible interpretations of the phenomena in question. On the other hand, we cannot simply deny this possibility on an a priori basis. To do that could render abuse victims vulnerable to continued harm.

The process of making a psychiatric diagnosis follows a similar kind of logic. The clinician observes the client's physical appearance, verbal report, history, and observable behaviors, and considers all the possible diagnoses in an attempt to determine which best defines the client's problems. On March 17, 1993, I wrote to the Work Group to Revise the DSM, requesting that they consider an additional diagnosis that would account for ritual abuse to include in the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, fourth edition (DSM-IV).[28] In my letter, I cited empirical research on the subject. I received a polite letter in response indicating that such a category would not be included because of a lack of empirical evidence. In my letter, I pointed out that both DSM-III and DSM-III-R have acknowledged "dissociated states that may occur in people who have been subjected to periods of prolonged and intense coercive persuasion (i.e., brainwashing, thought reform, or indoctrination, while the captive of terrorists or cultists)" (e.g., DSM III-R, p. 277). The diagnoses of atypical dissociative disorder and dissociative disorder not otherwise specified found in DSM-III and DSM-III-R, respectively, include the previously mentioned statements about captivity by "cultists." So did the draft of the DSM-IV. However, when the final DSM-IV (American Psychiatric Association, 1994) was published, not only was there not a category for ritual abuse, but even the term "cultists" had been deleted. The language of the DSM-5 includes mention of "recruitment by sects/cults" (p. 306) as one of several possible descriptors for the new diagnosis, other specified dissociative disorder (formerly dissociative disorder not otherwise specified).

Given that (1) a significant percentage of mental health professionals perceive ritual abuse to be a genuine problem experienced by some patients,

(2) these patients exhibit many common characteristics, and (3) there is external corroboration for at least some of the patient’s allegations (Noblitt & Perskin, 2000), a relevant diagnostic category should be formulated. But there are other reasons to justify a diagnostic category for ritual abuse. It should be noted that although the phenomenon of ritual abuse shares features and characteristics with other established diagnoses, no single DSM category or any combination of DSM labels completely accounts for it. In order to provide reliable clinical diagnoses and advance clear research outcomes, objective diagnostic criteria are needed. Some skeptics claim that allegations of ritual abuse are fabrications reflecting the fantasies of therapists and patients, that they are delusional material, or are the result of manipulative or attention-seeking interactions. If this is the case, then clear diagnostic criteria will aid in determining the extent to which ritual abuse claims are in fact genuine phenomena versus features of factitious disorders or delusions or other problems. Such distinctions are not only important for appropriate clinical diagnosis and treatment but also are needed to provide further clarity to the growing number of legal cases where mental health professionals are asked to provide forensic evaluations. The lack of clear, empirically validated criteria for distinguishing genuine ritual abuse from other diagnoses could result in courts failing to remove children from abusive environments or in innocent defendants going to prison in misdirected criminal cases.

CHAPTER 19

Where Do We Go from Here?

In this book we propose that allegations of ritual abuse should be assessed on a case-by-case basis by competent professionals. It would be unprofessional to make clinical judgments about extreme abuse survivors on an a priori basis, to say that all such allegations are either true or false. The details of each case should be carefully reviewed before any conclusions are rendered. Further, professionals should be competent in terms of their training and experience to make such determinations.[1]

These goals are hampered by a widespread lack of general awareness and disseminated scholarly knowledge about ritual abuse and the effects of a backlash claiming that the problem has no basis in reality. Allegations of ritual abuse were first identified in North America in 1980, but these reports have a much older history extending to antiquity having been described in many diverse cultures. We have elaborated the details of this history, reviewed the contemporary clinical and forensic findings, and the empirical research. The theory that this is merely a moral panic does not account for the facts. This is no moral panic. Moral panics appear during circumscribed periods of time in specific locations. This phenomenon exists across the span of history and the reach of individual cultures. Malevolent witchcraft, sorcery, and traumatic rituals have been historically described not only in New England, England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Germany, Italy, and all the other nations of Christendom but also in Asia, Africa, the Pacific Rim, the Arctic, and among Native Americans in both North and South America. These traditions have appeared in Christian and non-Christian cultures. These narratives are not merely the product of speculation or fantasy by religious zealots; they transcend history and the boundaries of specific societies.

If some of these accounts are true, it is difficult to understand why anyone would perpetrate such abuses. The best evidence indicates that ritual trauma creates in its victims extreme psychological vulnerability and multiple identities that can be manipulated by those who know how. This end result appears magical and can be exploited by people who want extensive control over others who were trained this way. The perpetrators are also typically dissociated themselves, and they experience and enact the behaviors of entities created in previous traumatic rituals that they themselves endured. Ritual abuse is characteristically multigenerational and is passed down in families. There is a hierarchy of power in these ritualistic subcultures where those in command bring to bear near absolute control over others in more submissive roles. Perpetrators feel invulnerable, confident that their misdeeds are invisible, because many of us cannot, or will not apprehend what they are doing, even when we are directly and explicitly told about it. On a more prosaic level, the perpetrators of ritual abuse are also free to engage in intrafamilial sexual abuse that is typically undetected because their victims were trained in rituals to experience amnesia to these transgressions.

Many prefer to deny the truth about these allegations. When there is collateral evidence, it is often dismissed as irrelevant. Meanwhile, these narratives continue to be told. Those who disclose these stories typically have the same pattern of posttraumatic and dissociative functioning described throughout this book. Sometimes there is other corroborating evidence from other witnesses. Often survivors also show predictable dissociative responses to specific triggering stimuli. I have seen over 300 such individuals who respond in the same or similar ways to these cues with trance, automatisms, or dissociation of identity. When they are psychologically treated for trauma, they usually make progress, sometimes achieving complete recovery. Those who fully recover report that they believe the accuracy of their trauma narratives even when their therapists have taken a neutral position about the historical truth of their stories. How is it that individuals can recover from a severe psychological disorder by addressing their traumatic memories in therapy if these are indeed what the backlash calls false memories? The moral panic and false memory theories don’t account for the facts associated with ritual abuse.

Where do we go from here? There is a need for education and awareness among the public and training for professionals who are responsible for meeting the health and law enforcement–related needs of these survivors. Some crime victims and some individuals with psychological disorders are ritual abuse survivors. We cannot assist or protect them if we fail to understand their actual problems and when we lack the skill to do competent assessments. In the United States, all 50 states require child abuse reporting. How can we be generally effective in protecting children when we are unfamiliar this particular kind of child abuse? The dynamics that result in underreporting of incest and other intrafamilial child abuse are heightened among ritual abuse victims, whose claims are regularly discredited, ignored, or otherwise disregarded.

As we have seen, most of those who have found no evidence of ritual abuse are investigators like former FBI agent Ken Lanning who never actually investigated any ritual abuse allegations, clinicians who approached such allegations from a position of extreme bias, journalists who had already formed a perspective that may be inconsistent with reality, and others who appear to have an agenda that takes precedence over the facts. When the second author (PPN) participated with the Texas Occult Crimes Investigators network, these sheriffs, sheriffs' deputies, Texas Rangers, highway patrol officers, and other law enforcement agents accepted that ritual crimes were a fact because they saw firsthand the evidence and the consequences to the victims. As described earlier, many ritual abuse survivors exist in poverty, and unless clinicians are willing to see patients who are uninsured or have no means to pay for treatment, they won't be aware of them or of their status. Journalists and other media representatives have, in our experience, exhibited commitment to a particular point of view and reported only on those facets of a story that supported their preconceived conclusions. The False Memory Syndrome Foundation, despite having no scientific or empirical evidence to support its position and a membership composed of significant numbers of individuals accused, and sometimes convicted, of crimes against children, has been masterful in generating public support. The result of all of these component features has been to assume that these factions represent mainstream thinking.

So where do we go from here? Most mental health professionals are required to be licensed and maintain licensure or certification by their state professional boards. We propose that professionals who diagnose or treat ritual trauma survivors should have demonstrated competence in this area.

How do they achieve competence? Just as in any area of training, they should enroll in relevant continuing education programs and seek supervision from qualified professionals. Some graduate programs in psychology are offering courses that address these issues, including my campus where I teach a year-long course titled Trauma and Dissociation. Mental health professionals who don't seek appropriate education and supervision may be opening themselves up to the risk of malpractice and ethical violations.

As the mental health care community gains a greater understanding of the role of ritual trauma in the development of some of their clients' maladaptive behaviors and functioning, it may become easier to develop more effective, cost-efficient, and safer treatments. Increased understanding of the effects of ritual trauma may improve communication between health care providers and reduce the influence of the backlash, which has constructed obstacles to recognition of ritual abuse. A more cohesive mental health care network of better educated and more competent providers will likely have a positive influence over criminal and civil investigations into ritual abuse allegations and inspire development of empirically based forensic techniques to support law enforcement. This may also result in a resurgence of legislative efforts to develop more effective laws for the protection of children and the detection of perpetrators of such abuses. The media may follow suit by adopting a more balanced approach to their reporting.

Finally, we believe that recognition of ritual abuse as a contributing factor in the development of maladaptive thinking, behaviors, and functioning may facilitate a fresh understanding of the mental health care system, therapeutic strategies, and reinvigorate the debate between organic and acquired psychological disorders. If indeed ritual abuse accounts for even a small portion of significant symptoms consistent with dissociative disorders, posttraumatic stress disorder, bipolar disorder, borderline personality disorder, or a range of other chronic psychological problems and mental health care professionals utilize some of the techniques found to benefit such clients, they may facilitate more expeditious and accurate diagnosis, engage in more productive treatment strategies, reduce vulnerability to retraumatization, and better screen for self- or other-directed destructive ideation or impulses. Adopting what we have learned about recognizing ritual abuse may improve risk management for providers by improving their competency skills in adherence with their ethical responsibilities. Furthermore, as more mental health care providers become increasingly familiar with the residuals of ritual abuse and document their findings in their medical and psychotherapy records, health insurance documentation, reports to child protective and law enforcement agencies, and in professional publications, there will be greater transparency that will reflect more accurate numbers of ritual abuse survivors that will better inform both relevant professionals and the public. These efforts will hopefully result in the means to effectively predict and protect against some disruptive or dangerous consequences posed by some ritual abuse victims and their perpetrators. At the least, it may help prevent at least some ongoing or future abuses. Regardless of the motivating factors, we have a moral, ethical, and legal responsibility to fully investigate all allegations of ritual abuse. How we respond to this challenge is a measure of our commitment to vulnerable abuse survivors and to a scientific interpretation of the historical and contemporaneous evidence.

Cult and Ritual Trauma Disorder: A Proposed Diagnosis in DSM Format

309.82 CULT AND RITUAL TRAUMA DISORDER

DIAGNOSTIC FEATURES

The essential feature of cult and ritual trauma disorder is clinically significant distress or functional impairment with either (1) disturbing or intrusive recollections of abuse or (2) the presence of involuntary dissociated mental states, either or both of which are the result of ritual (circumscribed or ceremonial) abuse. Dissociated mental states may take the form of unwanted or intrusive dissociated alter identities, trance states, automatisms, catalepsy, stupor, or coma or coma-like states. These dissociated mental states may appear in a spontaneous manner, or they may be triggered by particular stimuli or cues or by the individual's experience of distress.

Ritual abuse consists of traumatizing procedures that are conducted in a circumscribed or ceremonial manner. Such abuse may include the actual or simulated killing or mutilation of an animal; the actual or simulated killing or mutilation of a person; forced ingestion of real or simulated human body fluids, excrement, or flesh; forced sexual activity; as well as acts involving severe physical pain or humiliation. Frequently, these abusive experiences employ real or staged features of deviant occult or religious practices, but this is not always the case. Some reports of this phenomenon indicate that the abuse may occur outdoors, in a residence, day care, laboratory or hospital setting as well as other locations. Ritual abuse is often reported in group settings, but sometimes it is perpetrated by an individual.

ASSOCIATED FEATURES AND DISORDERS

Associated descriptive features and mental disorders. Evidence of psychological trauma is usually present, and many individuals with cult and ritual trauma disorder also exhibit some symptoms of posttraumatic stress disorder, if not actually meeting the criteria for this diagnosis as well. Intrusive, and often fragmentary, memories of abuse, alternating terror and emotional numbing, nightmares, amnesia, anxiety, panic, flashbacks, phobic avoidance, and signs of increased arousal are often present. These individuals typically report chronic depression, often with cyclical characteristics. Dissociation of identity is a feature of cult and ritual trauma disorder, and dissociative identity disorder or dissociative disorder not otherwise specified are frequently concurrently diagnosed.

Features of borderline personality disorder may also often be exhibited, and occasionally individuals with cult and ritual trauma disorder will also experience brief psychotic episodes, sometimes with auditory or visual hallucinations. More commonly, these individuals experience or act out strong self-destructive urges, including attempted or actual suicide and self-mutilation. Frequently, there is a desire to injure oneself in a manner that produces blood (e.g., “I have to see blood”). Sometimes the individual will report a desire to taste, touch, or smell their own blood. Chronic and unmodulated anger and sometimes rage alternate with other moods and affects to create the impression that the individual is unpredictable in mood and unable to manage anger. Strong feelings of interpersonal dependency alternate with detached social aloofness. Narcissism and self-hatred are frequently experienced separately and together.

In children (in addition to the ones mentioned earlier) motoric hyperactivity, impulsivity, and problems in attention and concentration are seen at a rate that exceeds the baseline for children without psychiatric disorders.

Associated laboratory findings. Individuals with cult and ritual trauma disorder typically show evidence of psychological trauma and dissociation on psychological testing.

Associated physical examination findings and general medical conditions. There may be scars from self-inflicted injuries or physical abuse. Somatic symptoms with or without objective medical findings typically include headaches, gastrointestinal, and genitourinary complaints, but other reports of physical pain may be present. In some cases, physical pain will not reflect a current injury but will be a psychological component of implicit memories (e.g., “body memories”) associated with previous abuse. These individuals also frequently show evidence of mild neuropsychological impairment, which, in some cases, may result from a history of head trauma. Others have argued that psychological trauma in childhood may cause mild neuropsychological deficits in some individuals (e.g., van der Kolk, 1987) but further research is needed to clarify this question.

Prevalence

The prevalence of cult and ritual trauma disorder is unknown due to a lack of reliable information. The alleged secrecy associated with ritual abuse may make the accurate tabulation of such statistics difficult or impossible.

Course

The clinical course of these individuals is typically chronic with periodic exacerbations and sometimes partial remission of symptoms. Some of these individuals report that they continue to participate in ritual abuse either as a victim, a perpetrator, or both, typically while in a dissociated state.

Familial Pattern

A history of sexual or ritual abuse is frequently reported among family members. In particular, transgenerational victimization is a commonly indicated pattern, consistent with the familial trends associated with non-ritual sexual abuse of children. However, the extent to which ritual abuse is a transgenerational phenomenon is presently unknown. Features of dissociation are also frequently seen in family members.

Differential Diagnosis

Cult and ritual trauma disorder must be distinguished from delusional disorder and other psychotic disorders where delusional beliefs are account better for the reports of abuse, particularly when it can be demonstrated that the allegations of abuse are false. However, there are also cases where these diagnoses can exist concurrently with cult and ritual trauma disorder, particularly when corroborating evidence of such abuse exists in an individual who is also exhibiting delusional or other psychotic symptoms. Cult and ritual trauma disorder must be distinguished from malingering in situations where there may be forensic or financial gain and from factitious disorder where there may be a maladaptive pattern of help-seeking behavior. The possibility of suggestibility should also be evaluated and ruled out as a possible alternative explanation for the individual's reports of ritual abuse.

Proposed Diagnostic Criteria for 309.82 Cult and Ritual Trauma Disorder

A. The presence of clinically significant distress or functional impairment with either (1) or (2):

    (1) disturbing or intrusive recollections of abuse.
    (2) involuntary dissociated mental states consisting of at least one of the following:

        (a) dissociated alter identities
        (b) involuntary trance states
        (c) automatisms
        (d) catalepsy
        (e) stupor, coma, or coma-like states.

B. The disturbance described in A is the result of ritual (circumscribed or ceremonial) abuse.
C. The disturbance described in A cannot be better accounted for by delusional disorder or another psychotic disorder in which delusions are present, malingering or factitious disorder, or as a consequence of the patient's suggestibility.

Dear Dr. Noblitt:

Reference is made to your letter of January 8th regarding a study of satanic ritual abuse.

The National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime has not been conducting a formal study into satanic ritual abuse. I am not aware of the exact quote on the ABC television show you are referring to, but perhaps the show indicated that Special Agent Kenneth Lanning of our staff has been dealing with cases of 'ritual' child abuse since about 1983 or 1984.

Enclosed is Special Agent Lanning's monograph on 'ritual' child abuse, and the history of his personal "study" is described in the Introduction.

I hope this publication is helpful to you.

Sincerely yours,

Cynthia J. Lent

INTRODUCTION

1. See Cohen (2008).

2. Ammons (1996), Barrett (1997), Coomaraswamy (1996), Fletcher (2001), Herrmann-Pfandt (2002), Robbins (1997), Saliba (1998), Schmuttermaier (2001).

3. Dissociation of identity is the expression that we prefer to describe the experience and enactments of people with multiple identities that typically also include dissociation of memory (e.g., psychogenic amnesia) and dissociation of volition (e.g., automatisms). We use this term often in preference to the conventional diagnostic terminology because not everyone with dissociation of identity warrants a diagnosis (Noblitt, 1998; Noblitt & Perskin, 1995, 2000). We are also concerned about the tendency of health care providers to unnecessarily conceptualize problems in human suffering as illnesses. In a recent publication, Moskowitz, Read, Farelly, Rudegeair, and Williams (2009) stated their preference of the term dissociated identity over Steinberg's (1995) identity alteration.

4. I wasn't aware until recently that Harold Pepinsky, professor emeritus and a scholar-advocate for ritual abuse survivors, had also invited survivors to speak at the classes that he taught at Indiana University (Pepinsky, 2005; Sullivan, 2008). Like us, he was initially a skeptic until he met survivors and began to familiarize himself with the literature.

5. The American Psychiatric Association (APA) publishes a diagnostic manual that categorizes the various psychiatric disorders recognized by the APA. Periodically the APA revises this listing of diagnoses. The latest revision of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, fifth edition (DSM-5) was published in May 2013. Earlier, the DSM-IV changed the name of its previously labeled diagnosis multiple personality disorder (MPD) to dissociative identity disorder (DID). Another psychiatric diagnostic system, the ICD-10 Classification of Mental and Behavioural Disorders, published by the World Health Organization (1992), uses multiple personality disorder as their preferred term with dissociative identity disorder as an alternate label for the same diagnosis. In our book, both terms are used, although we generally prefer the term dissociation of identity, which is described in more detail in Chapter 4. The expression DID will refer primarily to the more recent redefinition of MPD by the APA in DSM-IV and subsequent editions of the DSM.

6. Many Westerners view such altered states of consciousness as exotic and possibly mythical phenomena that rarely occur in actuality. However, in an anthropological study reported by Bourguinon the investigators found that 90% of a sample of 488 societies worldwide demonstrated “one or more institutionalized, culturally patterned forms of altered states of consciousness” (Bourguinon, 1973, p. 11). Furthermore, in 51% of these societies, there was evidence of spirit possession phenomena.

7. Richard Noll (1992) also made the point that the so-called possession disorders or, as he terms it, possession syndrome, may in fact be multiple personality disorder. However, as Craig Lockwood observed, Noll has been skeptical and critical of the idea that ritual abuse actually occurs (1993, p. 17). More recently, some authors have written about the need to further expand the contemporary way of defining DID to include possession (see Spiegel et al., 2011, 2013) and the newly published DSM-5 reflects the incorporation of the concept of possession into the new definition of DID (American Psychiatric Association, 2013).

In a case described by Dandan and Cecchi (2000), the court determined that two sisters had ritually murdered their father, but they were found to be not guilty by reason of insanity.

16. A study by Perry (1992) showed that 88% of the members of the International Society for the Study of Multiple Personality and Dissociation who responded to her questionnaire indicated “belief in ritual abuse involving mind control and programming” (p. 3). In a survey by Bottoms, Shaver, and Goodman (1991), the authors found that 30% of their national sample of members of the American Psychological Association had seen at least one case involving alleged ritualistic or religion-related abuse. Of these, 93% believed that their patients had actually been harmed.

CHAPTER 1

1. As I was later to learn, the Star of David, or Magen David, was not in use as a symbol of Judaism until a later time—long after the building of the Abbey Gate. At that time in history, the hexagram was an occult symbol (see Walker, 1983, pp. 401–403).

2. See Marshall (2009).

3. At that time, I was not aware of the controversy associated with the Hell Fire Clubs' notoriety, notably the club made infamous by Sir Francis Dashwood more accurately known as the Friars of Medmenham. Some authors interpreted Dashwood's enterprise merely as a group that provided an opportunity for sexual license (e.g., King, 1991). Others considered it to be a truly diabolical organization (e.g., Raschke, 1990). Howard (1989) argued that the Friars of Medmenham were associated with Freemasonry and other occult but not strictly satanic groups. Certainly, some combination of these various interpretations could also be true. See also Ashe (1974), Bloy (2002), Chancellor (1925), Colquhoun (1975), Lord (2008), Mannix (1959), McCormick (1958), Towers (1986).

4. Dashwood himself was a member of Parliament and chancellor of the exchequer. Some of the other members were also highly placed in the British government, reputedly with connections to the royal family. See Crenshaw (2012) for more information about the Hell Fire Clubs, including pictures of the hand-dug underground caves of Medmenham Abbey.

1. Some scholars have recently expressed greater optimism for people with this diagnosis. See Schulz and Nelson (2012) and Zanarini (2012).

2. Unfortunately, as previously mentioned, current trends in health care insurance are increasingly limiting sufficient coverage to adequately treat individuals with chronic psychiatric disorders. Hopefully, newly enacted legislation in the United States will make more mental health care services available to greater numbers of people. On November 8, 2013, the Departments of Health and Human Services, Labor, and the Treasury issued the final rule to implement the Paul Wellstone and Pete Domenici Mental Health Parity and Addiction Equity Act of 2008 (MHPAEA).

3. Although borderline personality disorder is a common contemporary diagnosis, it was only in 1980 that the DSM-III listed it as an independent category (American Psychiatric Association, 1980). Borderline personality disorder in the DSM-5 has been discussed in the literature (Samuel et al., 2012; Sarkis, 2011). Also see Miller, Morse, Nolf, Stepp, and Pilkonis (2012) regarding the dimensional conceptualization of the diagnosis in the DSM-5. Some have suggested that subtypes of borderline personality disorder can be identified (Critchfield, Clarkin, Levy, & Kernberg, 2008).

4. See Kopala-Sibley, Zuroff, Russell, Moskowitz, and Paris (2012).

5. At that time the expression emotional lability was commonly used to describe such powerful, rapid changes in emotion. The concept of emotion dysregulation is more often used in the recent literature, although Berking and Wupperman (2012) note: “Although emotion regulation has become a popular scientific concept, the quest for conceptual clarity, valid assessment, and accurate conclusion about implications has only begun” (p. 132).

6. See Bandelow, Schmahl, Falkai, and Wedekind (2010), Magerl, Burkart, Fernandez, Schmidt, and Treede (2012), Niedtfeld et al. (2010), and Reitz et al. (2012).

7. See Rogers and Acton (2012).

8. Also see Brunet (2009).

9. Weissman’s (1993) book, Of Two Minds: Poets Who Hear Voices, provides an interesting discussion of Homer, Virgil, Shakespeare, Milton, Smart, Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Tennyson, Arnold, Bronte, Browning, Rossetti, Dickinson, and Yeats, with regard to the notion of poetic inspiration by way of hearing voices.

10. The term psychodynamic is often used to refer to psychological approaches that assume that psychological functioning involves mental processes that interact among themselves in predictable ways, just as in engineering and physics the term thermodynamics refers to the interactive properties of heat, temperature, work, and energy. Not all psychological treatment methods are psychodynamic in nature. Some are more behavioral and focus on external observable features of psychological functioning.

11. For example, Marsha Linehan (1993) has developed a primarily behavioral treatment approach for individuals with borderline personality disorder.

12. Also see Schmahl et al. (2009).

13. The phenomenon of childhood trauma by primary caregiver with resulting affect dysregulation was discussed by van Dijke, Ford, van Son, Frank, and van der Hart (2012). However, see Bornovalova et al. (2012). Distel et al. (2012) found trait anger to significantly covary with borderline personality disorder with trait anger identified as genetic (54%) and due to environmental influences (46%). Hopwood, Thomas, and Zanarini (2012) also theorized about borderline personality disorder being associated with a trait that they call hyperbolic temperament that is presumably both genetically and environmentally determined.

14. See Patterson and Kim (1992) who reported that in their national survey, which inquired about sexual abuse, “almost half ” (p. 125) of their respondents who admitted to being sexually abused in childhood also indicated that they had never before told anyone about the abuse.

15. Unfortunately, the recent studies on child abuse seem to indicate that it is more prevalent than most of us have previously recognized.

16. I sometimes use the expression inner world to refer to a state or states of subjective experience. A person's inner world consists of thoughts, sensations, emotions, and so on. For some people, their inner world also consists of internalized images and conceptualizations of other people. In some cases, these internalized entities give the appearance of exerting influence or control over the person. Nevertheless, when I use this kind of language it is meant to be metaphorical.

17. See Benner and Joscelyne (1984), Bliss (1980), Buck (1983), Clary et al. (1984), Horevitz and Braun (1984), and Zanarini and Jager-Hyman (2009). Additionally, dissociation is increasingly associated with the diagnosis of borderline personality disorder as a moderating variable (Barnow et al., 2012) as well as one of the criteria for that diagnosis (American Psychiatric Association, 1994, 2000, 2013).

18. The idea that DID is underdiagnosed occurs because few mental health professionals know how to make the diagnosis and because the patients with DID frequently cope with it through denial. This argument is similar to the point of view of many alcohol treatment specialists, who explain that alcoholism is frequently underdiagnosed because professionals do not typically know how to correctly make the diagnosis and because most alcoholics are in denial and they underreport their use of alcohol. See Howell (2011).

19. U.S. v. Greene, 1999. Also see Farmer, Middleton, and Devereux (2008).

CHAPTER 3

1. Many clients are said to show some signs or symptoms of borderline personality disorder but not enough to accurately make that diagnosis. Many of these borderline-like patients are conceptualized within a “borderline spectrum.”

2. For a more recent discussion of this problem, see Caruso et al. (2013) and Lynch and Lobo (2012).

3. Also known as Occam’s (or Ockham’s) razor. One application of parsimony in comparative psychology is called Lloyd Morgan’s canon, the idea that we should not attribute human characteristics in interpreting the motivation and behavior of lower animals. Many psychological theories are unparsimonious and make multiple unnecessary assumptions.

4. See Blackmore, Tantam, Parry, and Chambers (2012) and Wilberg et al. (1998).

5. See Jacob et al. (2010).

6. In role-playing, the patient plays the role of someone else in a group exercise organized and presented somewhat like a skit. For example, a shy person might play the role of a more extroverted individual in order to examine internal processes (e.g., thoughts and feelings) related to introversion-extroversion. In role reversal, the participants are paired together and asked to reverse their roles. One person plays the role of another person and vice versa. This exercise helps people empathize with others and see different points of view (which naturally result when playing the role of another person and while experiencing that other person acting out one’s own style of behavior).

7. Although the DSM-III-R, published in 1987, listed the term hysterical neurosis in parentheses along with the diagnostic labels conversion disorder and dissociative disorder, the DSM-IV, published in 1994, no longer uses references to hysteria in context with these diagnoses. The ICD-10 (1994), another diagnostic nomenclature published by the World Health Organization, no longer uses the diagnosis hysteria as a general category under which conversion disorder and a variety of dissociative disorders were listed. The questions of whether conversion disorder should continue to be listed in the DSM-5 was debated, and according to Reynolds (2012) would be best resolved in a multidisciplinary dialog that is consistent for both the ICD-10 and DSM.

8. Conversion disorder is listed under the somatic symptoms disorder category (formerly somatoform disorders) in the DSM-5. In the ICD-10, conversion disorder is listed under the dissociative disorders. Spiegel, Loewenstein, Lewis-Fernández, Sar, Simeon, Vermetten, Cardeña, and Dell (2011) make a compelling case for the listing of conversion disorder under dissociative disorders in a future revision of the DSM.

9. In the DSM-IV-TR, dissociative disorders included dissociative amnesia, dissociative fugue, dissociative identity disorder, and depersonalization disorder along with a miscellaneous category for dissociative disorders not listed elsewhere as dissociative disorder not otherwise specified. According to the DSM-IV: “The essential feature of these disorders is a disruption in the normally integrated functions of consciousness, memory, identity, or perception of the environment” (American Psychiatric Association, 1994, p. 477).

10. One can refer to the DSM-5 for the details about the two new miscellaneous categories (formerly DDNOS). Psychiatric diagnoses do not represent universal or unchanging categories. They are constructs that are periodically revisited and revised. The criteria whereby the various diagnoses are included and defined in the diagnostic manual are based on the opinions of the members of the American Psychiatric Association’s task force and individual work groups assigned to revise the manual. Obviously, these opinions vary depending who is assigned to the task force and work groups. The approved diagnoses may be subject to a variety of potential biases and political influence and their authors are not infallible. Even with regard to the most recent revision, the DSM-5, there are selective, but significant, demonstrated problems with reliability, and thus also validity (Regier et al.,

2013). There is also a continued concern that many task force and work group members have financial interests associated with various pharmaceutical companies (Ledford, 2013) and this may introduce additional bias to the process. For additional general criticism of the DSM, see Anand and Malhi (2011).

1. Horevitz writes: “Little evidence exists of a causal relationship between hypnotizability and dissociative disorders” (1994, p. 438).

2. Another alternative explanation for what appears to be spontaneous trance is trance that results from some unidentified triggering stimulus. Often both the therapist and client are unaware when a client dissociates to a triggering stimulus. Many ordinary stimuli such as common words, phrases, sounds, music, and so on, can be triggering (Noblitt, 1998).

3. Additionally, note Weitzenhoffer’s (1989, p. 161) critical comments regarding the scientific credibility of Spiegel’s hypnotic induction profile. Also see Barnier and Council (2010), Goodman (2008), and Sutcher (2008).

4. See also Braun (1984).

5. The term host is used by some to refer to persons with dissociation of identity when they are experiencing and enacting their usual identity. From our perspective, this term is metaphorical.

6. The concept of resistance in therapy is not a new one. Psychoanalysis traditionally includes what is called the interpretation of resistances.

7. That is, the host, or usually the presenting personality, was criticized. The “Evil One” was quite happy with “himself ” in both cases.

8. Obviously a real baby could not spell. Alter personalities are not literally what they sometimes believe or present themselves to be.

9. Dr. Lefkof developed an inpatient psychiatric program largely limited to patients with dissociative disorders. Patients came from all over the United States to attend his inpatient program housed in a local psychiatric facility. The demand was great, and although the program occupied two separate units in the hospital, there was almost always a waiting list for admission. His work received national recognition when it was featured on CBS television’s news program 48 Hours.

10. The ISSMP&D has changed its name and is now the International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation (ISSTD).

11. The journal Dissociation was discontinued in 1997. The ISSTD now publishes The Journal of Trauma & Dissociation.

12. In their recent book, Dissociation and the Dissociative Disorders: DSM-V and Beyond (Dell & O’Neil, 2009a), members of the ISSTD were charged with developing a consensus definition of dissociation. They were unable to do this because of their divergence of opinions (see Dell & O’Neil, 2009b). It was curious that this book of more than 864 pages did not discuss ritual abuse—neither the evidence for it nor against it.

13. For a contemporary review of the history of the concept of dissociation, see van der Hart and Dorahy (2009).

14. Although Janet is sometimes credited with coining the term dissociation, it had been used earlier in France. See van der Hart and Dorahy (2006).

15. The concept of hypnoid states was Breuer’s. Sigmund Freud (1910) later discounted the importance of this phenomenon.

16. Although dissociation is commonly conceptualized as a defense mechanism, not all in the field of mental health would agree with this view, which may be overly simplistic. Dissociation may represent a variety of different psychological processes. Although dissociation typically disrupts conscious awareness of the events or knowledge dissociated, the process of dissociation is not necessarily itself an unconscious act of psychological defense. Many patients report that they consciously dissociate when they feel overwhelmed. To some extent, dissociation may represent the normal breaks of consciousness that occur periodically as well as normal reactions to trauma (e.g., shock).

17. Those empirical studies of defense mechanisms that have been conducted do not always support the assumption that the presumed defense mechanism is indeed a defense mechanism (see Baumeister, Dale, & Sommer, 1998).

18. Radical behaviorists would go even further than this, arguing that mental states can never be studied in a truly scientific manner and that psychology should limit itself to observations of the behavior of organisms.

19. In a study by Putnam et al. (1986), the authors found that it had taken an average of 6.8 years from the time when the patients first entered treatment before the diagnosis of MPD had been made.

20. See Laurence and Weinhouse (1994, pp. 282–283) for further discussion of ECT. Zaidner, Sewell, Murray, Schiller, Price, and Cunningham (2010) describe the onset of a dissociative disorder after treatment with ECT.

21. The artwork produced by the clients ran the gamut of what appeared to be “doodles” to very sophisticated, and sometimes graphic, representations.

22. The process of asking dissociated clients to free-associate to drawings of geometric figures has often resulted in dramatic trance and other dissociative reactions. Because of the significant responses to such stimuli, I constructed an assessment device based on this principle called the picture association method (PAM).

23. Many dissociated individuals have alter personalities that are sometimes construed to be “blockers.” Many of these blocker alters seem to have the ability to induce a confused state in the patient, especially when the therapy session is to begin. The patient may feel that she is in great distress and needs help, but her mind is blank.

24. In one of the major textbooks on the subject of hallucinations is a chapter by anthropologist Weston La Barre (1975) in which the author describes some of the ritual uses of trance and hallucinatory experiences among a variety of preindustrial cults.

25. See Zingrone, Alvarado, and Agee (2009) regarding “aura viewers.” The experience of seeing auras was significantly correlated with dissociation as measured by the DES.

26. More about shamanism can be found in Chapter 9.

27. According to the “Guidelines for Treating Dissociative Identity Disorder in Adults, Third Revision” of the International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation (2011): “Integration is a broad, longitudinal process referring to all work on dissociated mental processes throughout treatment” (p. 133). Further, this publication states: “Fusion refers to a point in time when two or more alternate identities experience themselves as joining together with a complete loss of subjective separateness” (p. 133). An excellent paper describing this process and its characteristics was published by Greaves (1989). This therapeutic procedure may be distinguished from the religious rite of exorcism, wherein inner entities that are considered demonic are ostensibly eliminated through exorcism (see Chapter 5). Integration and fusion, on the other hand, are conceptualized as serving to unite, rather than discarding the various unhelpful or unhealthy dissociated entities.

CHAPTER 5

1. A Gallup Poll conducted in 2007 showed that 21% of the U.S. population do not believe, 8% are not sure, and 79% believe in the existence of the devil (Newport, 2007). In a Harris Poll, 62% reported they believed in the devil and hell (Stoddard, 2007).

2. See Euteneuer (2010) and Zeddies (2000). For more background regarding adolescent involvement in satanism and occult practices, see Dumont and Altesman (1989), Johnston (1989), Larson (1989b), Mercer (1991), Moriarity (1992), Moriarity and Story (1990), and Simandl (1997).

3. We respect Daniel Ryder (pseudonym) and his work, but I have encountered some complaints from ritual abuse survivors regarding their experiences in 12-step programs. Although some survivors are able to successfully work the 12 steps, some report feeling "triggered" by some of the traditional elements of the program (e.g., standing in a circle and saying the Lord's prayer). We need to further explore ways of modifying the traditional 12 steps and formulate alternative approaches so that survivors can effectively use these and other support groups.

4. Some alter personalities consider themselves to be on "the dark side" and bear the names of demons from Christian writings, for example, Satan, Lucifer, Beelzebub, Belial, Leviathan. Some "dark" alters also have the names of other demonic entities, for example, Asmodeus, Astaroth, Baal, Kali, Lilith. Others have the names of Christian vices, for example, Envy, Hatred, Lust. Some of these malevolent alters are identified simply by ordinary human names, for example, Sarah, Elizabeth. Some of these also consider themselves to be demons. Some consider themselves to be the "souls of dead people." Some alters "on the dark side" consider themselves to be merely under the control of an evil internal or external force.

5. I had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Friesen at the First Annual Christian Conference on DID and Satanic Ritual Abuse, where he and I were both presenters. Additionally, I felt particularly honored to be invited to speak at this conference because it is well known that I am a secular therapist. Perhaps Christians and secular professionals will learn to work together in the interest of survivors.

6. I have never witnessed anything that I recognized as supernatural in my thousands of hours of work with ritually abused clients. To me it is more parsimonious scientifically to consider all the inner entities as alter identities (or as some prefer, to use the terms alter personalities—as distinguished from less developed entities that some call alter fragments). I have never observed any miraculous events or demonstrations of supernatural power whatsoever. Nevertheless, this is a fascinating question. Are we observing in these DID patients the same kind of phenomenon described in the New Testament Christian gospels regarding possessed people who were said to have been cured by Jesus and his apostles? In his book Jesus: The Evidence, author and scholar Ian Wilson (1988) presents the argument that many of the people that Jesus was said to have cured may have had DID. North et al. (1993) cite Miller's (1989) observation that the biblical passage Mark 5:1–3 may be such an example (i.e., "My name is Legion; for we are many").

7. I admire his courage in presenting his point of view, which does not appear to be a popular one in the secular intellectual climate. Unfortunately, some individuals have chosen to ridicule him for his beliefs under the pretense that their theories are more "scientifically" acceptable. This is a kind of intellectual snobbery and has no place in science. Scientists have no special insight into "ultimate truths" and to say otherwise is deceptive or naive.

8. The rites of exorcism are not limited to the Catholic Church. Exorcism has been practiced by Protestants as well as Jews, Muslims, and a variety of pagan sects. Some Protestants prefer what they call deliverance, a spiritual act that is briefer and less ritualized than exorcism. Friesen's work (previously cited) directly advocates deliverance and other modes of spiritual healing. Tom Ball is professor emeritus at Spring Arbor University and a pastoral counselor in Spring Arbor, Michigan, and has written about the importance of prayer for inner healing and deliverance for ritual abuse survivors (Ball, 2008). However, some authors are skeptical about the long-lasting benefits of exorcism. Crapanzo (1977) cites Oesterreich (1966) and Huxley (1952) regarding their observations that the effects of exorcism are not often of long or lasting duration. Anthropologist Felicitas Goodman (1988) appears more optimistic about the effectiveness of exorcism. Bowman (1993) reported data on 15 DID patients and Frazer (1993) described seven case studies of patients who had undergone exorcism. Both authors conclude that exorcism may be harmful to DID patients. Also see Crabtree (1985, 1993b).

9. Also, Thomas B. Allen (1993) provided a fascinating and detailed case study of exorcism in his book Possessed. The author stated that he has tried to describe his findings in an objective manner rather than as an attempt to persuade or convert the reader. He wrote that he is an agnostic who was raised as a Roman Catholic.

10. Hawkins used the term demonization to refer to demon possession.

11. However, glossolalia has sometimes been viewed as a psychiatric symptom (e.g., Campbell, 1989, p. 307). See Pattison (1974) for a psychiatric interpretation of individuals with glossolalia that is related to their religious beliefs. Also see Maloney and Lovekin (1985) and Venkatachalam (2011). Semenyna and Schmaltz (2012) offer a skeptical psychological interpretation of glossolalia.

12. Many charismatic and Pentecostal Christian congregations espouse a belief in various religious experiences that could be accurately labeled as possession states and possession trances (Goodman, 1973). However, such phenomena are not limited to speaking in tongues. The Anastenaria ritual of northern Greece reportedly invokes possession by St. Constantine and is described by Danforth (1989). The participants walk on burning coals, sometimes, they say, without injury. Similar practices have occurred in the United States according to Danforth’s account. Another Christian sect with possession-like features involved in its rituals are Shaker sects such as the Indian Shaker cult described by Barnett (1972) and the Shakers of St. Vincent (Henney, 1973). Also worthy of note are the altered states of consciousness associated with the Christian snake-handling cults of the southern United States described by La Barre (1962) and Galanter (1989).

32. Curiously in the DSM-IV, possession was listed as a diagnostic condition, but under the diagnosis dissociative disorder, not otherwise specified. Even more peculiar was the identification of "possession" in the DSM-IV specifically with India. Possession is not limited to India; it is a worldwide phenomenon (e.g., see Bourguinon, 1973, 1974; Cohen, 2008; Crapanzo, 1977; Yap, 1960). Furthermore, the DSM-IV-TR did not seem to recognize the difference between possession states that resemble DID versus those that resemble other varieties of DDNOS (e.g., possession trance). The term multiple personality disorder was changed to dissociative identity disorder in 1994. I personally welcomed this particular change because it helps diminish the sensationalism associated with the term MPD and because it may not be appropriate to consider all the inner entities of DID patients to be actual personalities. On the other hand, this DSM-IV-TR taxonomy did not provide a clear rationale for distinguishing dissociative identity disorder from dissociative disorder, not otherwise specified, and it did not address the contemporary phenomenon of ritual abuse that is being reported internationally. See Appendix A, "Cult and Ritual Trauma Disorder: A Proposed Diagnosis in DSM Format." I have come to use the term dissociation of identity because it seems to more clearly delineate the characteristics I see in my clients and in those with whom I consult who meet the DSM criteria for dissociative disorders and borderline personality disorder (where the criterion "severe dissociative symptoms" is met may in fact be examples of dissociation of identity). The inclusion of possession in the definition of DID in the DSM-5 is a step in the right direction.

36. Many individuals with DID report that some of their alternates do not experience pain. Furthermore, some alters report special abilities that the host personality does not have or does not recognize having. For example, some alters reportedly do not need to wear prescription glasses. I am unqualified to say whether this allegation is true, but it is clear that when some individuals are dissociated as some alters they believe this. My attempts at explaining these phenomena rely on no supernatural assumptions. I hypothesize that this occurs due to the mistaken belief of the alters that their vision is different or that there is some other physical explanation accounts for this.

37. See Raiswell and Dendle (2008).

38. See Braude (1991) and Ross (1989).

39. See Noblitt and Perskin (2000).

40. A number of individuals with dissociation of identity have been determined to be psychologically disabled by the Social Security Administration. Those who were once able to work and who meet the requirements may be entitled to Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI) benefits and receive Medicare health insurance in addition to a monthly income. Those who may not have been able to work sufficiently to qualify for SSDI may be entitled to Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and receive Medicaid in addition to a small monthly income. These individuals are more likely to be identified with other psychiatric diagnoses such as schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and posttraumatic stress. However, a review of the medical records of many such identified individuals reveals the same pattern of traumatic child abuse as well as lifelong victimization and dissociative experiences that are consistent with individuals experiencing dissociation of identity.

41. In her recent book Healing the Unimaginable: Treating Ritual Abuse and Mind Control, Alison Miller (2012) wrote that we attribute all instances of dissociative disorders to ritual abuse, but in actuality we only use ritual abuse as a causal explanation for involuntary dissociation of identity and possession. Our understanding is that other kinds of dissociation including trance and amnesia may be caused by a variety of factors.

42. Morton (1977) has described a similar phenomenon anthropologically. Ethiopian participants in the wuqabi cult are "forced to rely increasingly on the other members of the cult group, and especially the leader around whom the group is organized" (p. 198). This occurs because of the devotees' desperate need of assistance in managing the harmful effects of the possessing "spirits" and the tendency of the family and community to abandon these individuals.

43. In an informative report by Gould and Cozolino (1992) the authors explained how self-destructive actions of alters may have the purpose of motivating the ritual abuse survivor to stay in communication with the given cult.

44. This was copied verbatim from the patient's journal, with no corrections in spelling, punctuation, or grammar. The only change is the name, Sheila, which is a pseudonym for this individual's alter personality who took responsibility for writing the note. As in all other discussions of individual client histories appearing in this book, I did not use the correct name of the alter or of the patient in order to protect that individual's privacy.

45. This may in part explain the commonly reported self-abuse involving bloodletting among these patients. The other common reason for such self-abuse is reportedly enforcement of the cult rules, for example, as punishment designed to enforce the secrecy. Curiously, the community of psychiatrists seems to be largely unaware of the reported relationship between self-mutilation and ritual abuse. In December 1992, the American Journal of Psychiatry published two letters discussing a previous article about self-mutilation. Although they both made reference to the reported bloodletting in ceremonies associated with the ancient Mediterranean mystery cult of Cybele, neither made any comment about the current allegations of mutilation in contemporary cults. See Novello and Primavera (1992) and Winchell and Stanley (1992).

46. See for example, Cervantes (1994).

CHAPTER 6

1. An earlier version of this chapter was adapted from Accessing Dissociated Mental States (Noblitt, 1998a).

2. Also see Faller (2003).

3. Curiously, some of these authors have written commentaries that are skeptical that ritual abuse occurs very often and blame therapists for many of these “false memories.” This position is taken even though there are no objective data in existence to warrant such statements that are potentially damaging toward therapists who are currently being threatened by civil lawsuits for treating individuals who allege that they are survivors of ritual abuse. In some instances, these patients will recant and they or their families will blame the therapist for the memories of trauma. This has occurred even in cases where the trauma memories predated any treatment by the therapist in question. More curious is the failure of these researchers to integrate their own and others’ research findings with these speculations. Their citation of other studies appears to be highly selective and their interpretation of their own outcomes is inconsistent. See Bottoms, Shaver, and Goodman (1996) and Bottoms and Davis (1997).

4. We are not claiming that this is impossible. We do believe that it is possible. We simply know of no proven cases after having exhaustively searched the literature. Therefore, this hypothesis is speculative.

5. Hudson (1994) updated her original sample to 27 children.

6. Adapted from Hudson (1991, pp. 11–21).

7. For more information about this case, see Associated Press (2005).

8. One reported case was from Wales.

CHAPTER 7

1. Many individuals with dissociation of identity experience strong attachments to dolls and stuffed animals. See Barlow, Cromer, Caron, and Freyd (2012).

2. Biofeedback therapy is a procedure in which the patient is attached to a device that monitors one or more physical functions (e.g., skin temperature, muscle tension). The patient is given instructions regarding how to change that particular function while observing the change on the monitor device. Biofeedback therapy has been found to have a limited degree of effectiveness with some pain patients and patients with certain vascular and musculoskeletal disorders. Some researchers and clinicians have questioned whether biofeedback's effectiveness is due to "nonspecific factors" such as the placebo effect.

3. Classical conditioning is a term that describes reflexive or spontaneous learning that occurs when certain stimuli are paired together in the presence of the person or the animal expected to do the learning. The original work was done by Ivan Pavlov. Razran (1971) has presented an interesting theory describing a variety of similar forms of conditioning or learning that he believes may occur in different organisms with differing levels of neural complexity. In any case, there may be a variety of different techniques for instilling learning, and these techniques do not all require the voluntary cooperation of the subject exposed to those techniques. Kroger and Fezler (1976) have described a combination of hypnosis and conditioning techniques for clinical use that they call "imagery conditioning."

4. This is my explanation for how dissociation of identity is learned. It requires a capacity for deep trance. Perpetrators use psychological trauma to produce psychological shock in the victim. Psychological shock results in dissociation of consciousness or trance. Perpetrators typically pair the psychological state of shock with a neutral stimulus that can be a word, a phrase, a touch, the visual image of an object, music, and so on. Later when this stimulus is presented to the survivor, he or she enters a trance state. If the stimulus is repeatedly paired with trauma, the stimulus produces an increasingly deeper trance. Why would anyone do this to another person? The ability to create a deep trance state on command renders victims vulnerable in a variety of ways. For one, these victims are vulnerable to repeated sexual abuse by predators who know how to access such states of amnestic immobility. With additional training, the survivors can learn to take on the roles of alter identities where specific tasks are enacted on command in trance with amnesia. Many of these tasks involve nonconsensual sex, including incestuous relations. Thus, ritual abuse is a way to make incest safer for the predator. Ritual abusers reportedly share children with one another or sell them to others for sexual purposes.

5. This incident was not unique. Quite a few of these patients have had alter personalities emerge in therapy reporting that it was their job to sexually please the person who had accessed them. A near universal observation by psychotherapists is that they encounter psychotherapy patients who sometimes become overtly seductive during therapy sessions. Freud noted this phenomenon and he invented the term transference to explain it. However, we also need to consider the possibility that some patients are behaving seductively because they have programmed mental states that were trained to interact seductively, and these states are sometimes inadvertently accessed in therapy.

6. See Smith (1993).

7. I presented a paper on the subject of programming at the annual 40th Annual Meeting of the American Society of Clinical Hypnosis (Noblitt, 1998b) and in more detail in a monograph (Noblitt, 1998a)

8. Declassified CIA documents show that the Manchurian Candidate phenomenon was considered as a possible explanation for the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Because all the relevant investigatory documents have not been declassified, we cannot be sure precisely what the CIA concluded about this question.

9. I have had several patients who have described similar scenarios. They recall being raped or sexually abused by an individual who incapacitates them after saying a certain word, phrase, or other similar signal, including hand grips and facial touching. When exploring this phenomenon in therapy, these patients are initially unable to explain the event or the apparent power of these signaling stimuli. With further interviewing, however, it frequently happens that an alter personality is able to emerge and explain the process and even give an accounting as to how the programming was originally established, for example, as Karen's alter, "Kathy," did. In other cases, as in Jenny's, alters emerge and explain their sense of obligation to be a sex object for the male.

10. Flashing lights and other illuminated images and figures are frequently used as accessing stimuli according to ritual abuse survivors. These stimuli reportedly acquire the ability to incapacitate the victim after the stimuli have been paired with trauma in the same manner as has been explained in this book regarding other such programming.

11. According to Ashe (1974), Aleister Crowley, the British occultist, "had hypnotic powers which he used freely for seduction" (p. 235).

12. Unless they also know how to use this technology of programming and accessing.

13. This was copied verbatim from the patient's journal notes. Although I frequently attempt to test such alleged accessing procedures, I did not in this case, in part because it involved blood and a drug that should only be used by prescription. I have found that some accessing procedures are generic, that is, the procedure seems to affect survivors from different backgrounds, cults, and geographical regions. Other access procedures appear to be more idiosyncratic or specific to a particular survivor. The effects of such signals can be tested by introducing them unobtrusively (and testing to see that the signal was in fact unobtrusive to the person witnessing it).

14. Although it is often helpful to introduce these stimuli unobtrusively, it is not necessary to do so on all occasions. In some instances, the examiner will want to observe how the patient responds when there is no effort to disguise the procedure.

15. Similar threats have been described by other therapists (see Miller, 2012).

16. Some patients report they experienced abuse in cults that forcibly involved them in training violent behaviors (e.g., martial arts) because the cult wanted "warriors." In order to provide for the safety of the "trainers," those being trained under such conditions would often learn to cease violent behavior on the command of a particular cue or triggering word.

17. Some survivors have alters who purport a sincere devotion toward a demonic entity such as Satan or Lucifer. These alters sometimes claim that they have voluntarily endured horrible rituals as a means of expressing their profound commitment to these "demons," whom they sometimes revere as gods. However, in the majority of the cases I have encountered, there is a more agnostic and skeptical view of these demons' existence or status as gods.

18. Margaret Smith (1993) also makes this point.

19. For ethical reasons (e.g., possible conflict of interest, confidentiality required in the professional relationship), these survivors who spoke with my students were not my psychotherapy clients.

CHAPTER 8

1. Free association is a psychotherapy technique with a long history. It is also the basis for the Rorschach technique and word association test. I will often ask clients to “tell me what is in your mind” or to free associate using imagery, “What do you see in your mind?”

2. Previously we described alter identities created by cult programming. Many clients also believe that they are capable of producing alter personalities when under great duress. From a scientific point of view, we do not really know the details about how alter personalities are formed because it would be unethical to torture someone to find out empirically how this works. We think it is safe to say, however, that lasting alter personalities cannot be created merely by suggestion or hypnosis.

3. Morey (2005) discussed David Winnicott’s review of Memory Dreams and Reflections and Winnicott’s erroneous conclusion that Carl Jung evidenced childhood schizophrenia. According to Morey, Jung had a “split personality.” Jung’s own autobiography seems to indicate that he, his mother, and his cousin, Helene Preiswerk, experienced dissociation of identity.

4. As I was later to learn, a variety of different psychologists thought that it was normal to experience dissociated “inner people.” Morton Prince called them sides (Prince, 1925). John and Helen Wakins identified them as ego states (Lemke, 2007; Frederick, 2005). David Lester used the term subselves (Lester, 2007). Jay Noricks wrote about parts and parts therapy (Noricks, 2011).

5. Although we agree that people normally assume many roles, we do not believe that these sometimes disparate roles exist in a state of dissociation or amnesia without a history of repeated circumscribed and profound trauma.

6. The mental health professions traditionally interpreted voice hearing as a sign of psychosis, although some professionals make distinctions about contextual or content factors of the heard voices. Psychotherapists working with clients with dissociation of identity have found that the experience of hearing voices is common among those in this population. There is also a growing body of literature about voice hearers that seems to reflect a more dissociative explanation. See Beavan and Read (2010), Connor and Birchwood (2012), Dillon (2010), Fenekou and Georgaca (2010), Hammersley, Read, Woodall, and Dillon (2007), Lawrence, Jones, and Cooper (2010), Longden, Madill, and Waterman (2012), and Moskowitz (2012).

7. This is ironic. During the time that Carl Jung was engaged in his own psychological self-exploration after a “confrontation with his unconscious,” he recorded his own thoughts and mental images in a set of Black Books that were collated as his Red Book. It was never published during his lifetime and only was shared among a select group of confidants. This remarkable volume was kept essentially hidden by the Jung family after his death until it was published in 2009 as The Red Book: Liber Novus. On page 290 of The Red Book, there is a heading titled “The Sacrificial Murder,” referring to a ritual where a child was killed. In this scene, Jung described himself eating a piece of the dead child’s liver after being commanded to do so. Jung acknowledged that in this horrific act he was also sacrificed. His statements are consistent with contemporary survivors’ narratives of ritual abuse. Was Jung, himself, a ritual abuse survivor? As a previous note indicates, Jung’s own autobiography portrayed him, his mother, and his cousin, Helene Preiswerk, as having experiences of dissociation of identity. He writes about an ultimate god, called Abraxas, the integration of the Christian G-d and Satan (Jung, 1992). In his book Answer to Job, Jung criticizes the Creator for allowing Job and his family to be tormented at the behest of Satan as per the story in the Book of Job in the Old Testament (Jung 1952/1973). According to Terry Melanson (2009), one of Jung’s ancestors, Johann Sigmund Jung, was a member of the Bavarian illuminati.

8. In part, “Damon’s” role was that of an enforcer.

9. There are a variety of different spellings for vodoun, a term that is preferred by authors such as Wade Davis (1985, 1988), Maya Deren (1991), and Rosemary Guiley (1989). Sometimes the terms voodoo and voodooism are more commonly used in Louisiana and East Texas, respectively.

10. We use the term sorcery religion or sorcery-oriented religion to refer to religious belief systems and practices in which sorcery or witchcraft plays an important role. To modern Westerners, the notion of syncretizing magical practices with religion may seem nonsensical, but many historians of religion have argued that magical beliefs are common, especially in the early stages of the more traditional Western religions including Judaism and Christianity (e.g., see Neusner, Frerichs, & Flesher, 1989; Thomas, 1971; Vetter, 1973). However, the notion of combining religion with evil magic is even more difficult for modern Westerners to grasp but it is important to understand that the Western notion that sacredness is exclusively associated with goodness is not universally accepted within all world religions.

11. According to Gersi (1991) who lived for five years in Haiti studying and participating in vodoun ceremonies, Haitian vodoun has also been influenced by the occult practices of the indigenous Arawak Indians and a variety of traditions from Europe, including “many aspects of Freemasonry, as well as esoterism, the Cabala, occultism, alchemy, astrology, metaphysics and Theosophy” (p. 127).

12. Juju is has been shown to be a common method of control in the trafficking of African girls and women to Europe for sexual purposes. Juju rituals are used to instill fear and possible dissociative responses in these individuals. See Anti-Slavery International (2011), Guillemaut (2008), and Martin (2012).

13. Although Walter B. Cannon did not mention it, it is certainly possible that some vodoun deaths have been self-inflicted by alters who were signaled to do so by the “bone pointing” or other ritual acts.

14. Gersi (1991) provided a similar, but supplementary description, regarding the creation of zombies. He also argued that zombies are drugged to reinforce the illusion that they have died and that they are later revived by the bokor, or sorcerer. In the process of their revival, Gersi describes severe abuse and what he calls “brainwashing” of the revived individual.

15. Gersi (1991) describes it thus: “Ninety percent of Haitians are Voodoo worshippers; the great majority of them are also devout Catholics” (p. 128). Metraux (1959) stated that the vodoun follower thinks “of himself as a good Catholic” (p. 323).

16. Wade Davis (1985, 1988) described what he calls the secret societies within the general community of vodoun worshippers, which Haitians generically and interchangeably call Bizango or Sans Poel (i.e., “those without skin”). According to Davis (1988), the initiation into one of the Bizango secret societies leaves “the clothes on your back in shreds” (p. 262).

17. See “Three Busted” (2013).

18. Compare this with M. Smith’s (1993) citation of the British occultist Aleister Crowley’s observation that “behind the exterior of the church is an interior church, the most hidden of all communities” (p. 19). See Crowley (1979, p. 16) for the original source cited by Smith.

19. It is noteworthy that although AIDS has been a significant problem in the nation of Haiti, it has not been prevalent in the adjacent nation of the Dominican Republic, both of which share the same island of Hispaniola in the Caribbean. See Cantwell (1988, p. 129).

20. And, as previously mentioned, the alters who inflict the harm are often called enforcers.

21. The point that programming is based on classical conditioning has also been made by Gould (1993a, 1993b) and Gould and Cozolino (1992).

22. Orisha is the Yoruban term for their gods or spirit representations of god. This term is used in Yoruban Juju and New World Santeria that is influenced by the Yoruban culture. In Macumba, which is roughly the Brazilian variant of Santeria, the word Orixa is often used to refer to these spiritual entities.

[23] However, one should note that Gonzalez-Wippler (1992) acknowledged that there is secrecy associated with Santeria, and as a result, she did not describe it in its entirety. In this same publication, the author related an incident that occurred when she was a child. She was taken to the seashore by her caretaker and stripped of her clothing in a manner that was so frightening that it caused her to cry. The author was apparently being introduced to the Santero ocean goddess Yemanya (also identified as Iemanja in discussions of the Macumba cult). Gonzalea-Wippler also states that the Santeros drink the blood of their sacrificial animals while possessed by the Orishas.

[24] Although the term Brujeria is normally reserved for malevolent witchcraft, especially incorporating Aztec traditions, the term is occasionally but rarely used to denote “white” witchcraft as well (e.g., see Devine, 1992).

[25] During the excavation of the burial site accomplished under police guard by Constanzo’s accomplices, they volunteered information that there were other burial sites on the property. The police already feared the ramifications of their discovery and decided to abandon their search for more victims.

[26] The notion that Quimbanda represents the dark side of Macumba practice is also expressed by anthropologist Esther Pressel (1973, 1977).

[27] Earlier in this chapter, the concept of enforcer alter personalities was mentioned. Enforcers punish the host person when the “secrets” are divulged or when other infractions of inner “rules” occur.

CHAPTER 9

1. Also see Simmons (1980), Witchcraft in the Southwest, for additional information about Native American witchcraft along the U.S. Rio Grande Valley along with discussion of possible Spanish and European influences on Indian beliefs.

2. See Bowden (2007), Burkert (1983), and Davies (1981).

3. Couliano (1991) argued that the distinctions are often blurred in reality.

4. As an interesting aside, Michael Harner was also a founding member of the Church of Satan (Barton, 2003).

5. See Eliade (1964, p. 65).

6. The placebo effect is a nonspecific treatment response presumably due to the expectation by the client that he or she will get well.

7. E. Fuller Torrey (1972) made an interesting comparison between witch doctors and psychiatrists.

8. In most shamanistic cures, it is the shaman, rather than the client, who is drugged or otherwise in an altered state of consciousness.

9. The "spirit slave" is merely a dissociated mental state, comparable to an alter personality. The "spirit slave" was originally created by the witch or sorcerer in a traumatizing ritual most likely during the childhood of the victim, who was also amnestic for the ordeal and for the existence of the spirit slave. Such a process could occur in the same manner in which MPD clients are typically amnestic for the abuse that created their dissociation and initially unaware of their alter personalities

10. This is why the individuals who were triggered in group therapy described in Chapter 7 were unable to identify the cause of their disorientation.

11. However, Musopole (1993) indicated that the terminology used by Africans to describe practices associated with magic, witchcraft, and sorcery may not completely coincide with Western notions, and there may be misunderstandings as a result.

12. Anthropologists, historians, and other scholars sometimes distinguish witchcraft from sorcery. According to Keith Thomas (1971), witches are often falsely believed to possess psychic powers by which they are able to harm others, whereas sorcery simply involves the knowledge and use of spells or incantations. The distinction made by Thomas is essentially a restatement of Evans-Pritchard's (1980) Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande. In an earlier article, Evans-Pritchard (1931) differentiated witchcraft, magic, and sorcery. However, Macfarlane (1970) argued that distinctions such as sorcery versus witchcraft and "white" versus "black" witchcraft should take into consideration both the means and ends of these practices in an effort to understand how they are different. Occult historian Colin Wilson (1971) distinguished witchcraft and sorcery by characterizing witchcraft as based on a passive approach to using psychic abilities from an enlightened or benign frame of reference. Sorcery, according to Wilson, is more active, systematized, and self-serving. Wilson's distinction would probably be welcomed by Wiccans, white witches who view their craft as essentially an enlightened and humane nature-worshipping religion. See Chapter 12 for more about Wicca. Hoyt (1989) argued that the distinctions made by scholars between witchcraft and sorcery are not particularly meaningful and that the terms are essentially identical.

13. As per the distinction between witchcraft and sorcery made by Robbins (1981).

14. For example, Mulhern (1991) cited Gibbal, who compared the relatively peaceful prepossession experiences of some Brazilian possession cults in comparison with a cult in Mali in which the possession experience resulted in significant physical damage to the person possessed. Gibbal noted that the latter cult commonly subjected girls to the traumatizing practice of infibulation. Is it possible that the potential for violence in a dissociated state is somehow related to the degree or extent of violence perpetrated on the victim during the "training" rituals? Within the field of psychiatry, many professionals believe that there is a relationship between self-mutilation and a history of child abuse. In fact, in a study by Walsh and Rosen (1988), the authors found that the presence of child abuse was among the most highly correlated with self-mutilating behavior in comparison with five childhood conditions that they investigated.

15. See Kluckhohn (1962), Mair (1971), and Marwick (1982).

16. This coincides with the research findings that show child abuse often has a mutigenerational pattern. See Belsky (1993) for a review of the literature and critical analysis.

17. Larner (1974) argued that what is called modern Western witchcraft does not resemble historical and anthropological accounts of witchcraft.

18. See Piggott (1987).

CHAPTER 10

1. Also see Smith (1993, p. 60).

2. See Sinason (2011).

3. Some observant Jews use this particular spelling (G-d) because the accurate depiction of “the Name” is considered disrespectful. In an effort to be sensitive to their traditions, we are using this spelling as well. However, in instances where we a quoting a different author, we use that author’s spelling.

4. For example, regarding the Branch Davidians, the Solar Temple Lodge, or Aum Supreme Truth. Televised reports of the Japanese cult Aum Supreme Truth indicate that this cult had an Armageddon date of 1997 and like the cult survivors that I have talked with in the United States, they planned a military-style revolution with genocide of those who were not useful to them.

5. I used the expression “cultists” here, but the original author used the term “satanists” at this point in the article. I wanted to make the point that not all cultists or all devil worshippers are necessarily satanic. Some cult survivors describe “organizations” in which apparently demonic rituals transpire but in which no particular reverence or regard for Satan is shown (e.g., in some Luciferian-inspired fraternal organizations and secret societies).

6. See previous note (5).

7. Masson’s quotation of Freud leaves out a sentence. It is as follows: “Do you remember how I always said that the medieval theory of possession, held by the ecclesiastical courts, was identical with our theory of a foreign body and a splitting of consciousness?” (Freud, 1966a, p. 242).

CHAPTER 11

1. See Faraone (2009), Gilchrist (2008), Herva, Nordqvist, Herva, and Ikaheimo (2010), Nakamura (2004), and Tong Enzheng, and Von Falkenhausen (2002). Ironically, David Frankfurter (2006b) wrote about archeological evidence of ancient occult ritual practices that are also reported by contemporary ritual abuse survivors while denying that ritual abuse actually occurs.

2. See Couliano (1991).

3. Some authors have emphasized other aspects of Livy’s report such as the brutal suppression of the cult by mass executions (see Burkert, 1987).

4. I have had clients report abuse in cults that engaged in Bacchic revelry, ceremonial magic, and abuse.

5. See Burkert (1987), Da Costa (1964), and Howard (1989).

13. However, the authenticity of Simon Magus as a Gnostic founder is debated. See Couliano (1990, pp. 59–62), Filoramo (1990, pp. 142–152), and Rudolph (1987).

14. See Pagels (1981).

[15] See Kertzer (1993, pp. 120–121).

[16] However, some later Gnostics (e.g., Bogomils, Cathari) simply argued that the devil created the material universe.

[17] See The Hypostasis of the Archons, in Robinson (1988, pp. 162–163); On the Origin of the World, in Robinson (1988, pp. 173–175).

[18] However, some medieval Gnostics were said to have believed that the souls of humans were really the spirits of "fallen angels" who had been ousted from heaven by G-d. See Couliano (1990, pp. 207–208).

[19] See Pagels (1981, p. 35).

[20] See The Testimony of Truth, in Robinson (1988, p. 455).

[21] See The Gospel of Phillip, in Robinson (1988), p. 159; The Testimony of Truth, in Robinson (1988, pp. 450).

[22] See MacGregor (1979, pp. 38–39).

[23] Also see Matthew 13:11 for a similar verse.

[24] See Rudolph (1987, pp. 214).

[25] This is described in Hill and Goodwin (1989) in the mental health literature and Filoramo (1990) and Rudolph (1987) in the literature of the history of Gnosticism.

[26] See Filoramo (1990) and Lyons (1988).

[27] Paul Tice (1994) writes about the Bogomils from a sympathetic point of view, yet noting that they were influenced by Messalians who "indulged in sexual excesses" (p. 59). The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology (1974) explicitly describes the Gnostics as predecessors to satanists in their philosophy and rituals (pp. 170, 191–192).

[28] See Mather and Nichols (1993, p. 177) and Steffon (1992, p. 205).

[29] See Blavatsky (1877/1988), vol. 1, p. 299; Walker (1983, pp. 553, 818).

[30] Jewish people sometimes note that the Kabbalah as it is cited in occult literature does not reflect a genuine or legitimate understanding of their traditions. There are prohibitions against teaching Kabbalah to non-Jews and those who lack the necessary spiritual maturity.

[31] See Faerstein (2013) and Lachter (2010).

[32] See Brenner (1999).

[33] Also spelled Caballa, Qabalah, Kabala, and others. The word Caballa is often intended to represent the Christian version of the Kabbalah literature. Qabalah refers to the Hermetic or occult interpretation.

[34] This name is sometimes spelled Ain Soph. Spellings differ partly because of the inexact and variable transliterations from Hebrew.

[35] See Couliano (1991).

[36] Carl Jung was also significantly influenced by the Caballa (Hoeller, 2012; Joseph, 2007). For further reading regarding the Kabbalah and its variant interpretations from a scholarly (philosophic and historical) perspective, see Idel (1988) and Jacobs (1990). See Fielding (1989) and Fortune (1984) for explanations of the Kabbalah within the context of modern Western occultism.

[37] Nitzsche (1975) described other variants of homunculi and related internalized "entities" that have appeared in Classical and Medieval Europe, including the genius, daemon, and so on. These entities were often perceived to be spiritual and capable of influencing or actually exerting possession over some people. Magical rituals and ceremonies were sometimes conducted in an effort to placate or negotiate with these perceived entities.

[38] Some of the details of Margaret Murray's theory do not seem plausible, nor supported by evidence (Simpson, 1994), although her general notion of a witch cult extending to pre-Christian times is possible (Roberts, 2000), but for many it is unproven. Our own thesis is that there has been a long history of ritual abuse used for the purposes of creating dissociation of identity, a method of psychological functioning that could be misinterpreted as spirit possession. We believe that ritual abuse is passed down in families intergenerationally. In some cases, these practices are labeled witchcraft, but other attributions are also used. Are all people who practice witchcraft ritual abuse survivors? Not according to our theory—only those who have been traumatized in rituals that are used to create or control dissociated identities and other dissociated mental states.

39. See Blavatsky (1877/1988, vol. 2, p. A52).

40. Also see Robertson (1991, pp. 183–185).

41. This point was discussed by Lilith Mahmud (2012), although she also mentioned the Masonic lodge, Propaganda Due (P2), that was under the jurisdiction of the Grand Orient of Italy until its charter was revoked. P2 was found to have numerous associations with organized crime and political intrigue in Italy.

42. See Knight (1986), Larson (1989a), Shaw and McKenney (1988), Short (1989), and Smith (1993).

43. Numerous Christian writings directed against Gnostic practices in the ancient and medieval periods point out that Gnostics sometimes participated in orthodox church activities and "pretended" to be "good Christians" or otherwise appropriately integrated into the Christian community. See Moore (1975). This apparent syncretism parallels vodoun and Santero sects, where the cult members are also encouraged to practice Christianity concurrent with their cultic activities. Regarding Haitian vodoun, see Gersi (1991, p. 128) and Metraux (1959, p. 323) illustrating the symbiosis between cultic and church activities among these cult practitioners.

44. See Ataç (2005).

45. This position can also be found in Robinson's (1989) Born in Blood: The Lost Secrets of Freemasonry. Although the author is not a Mason, he is clearly sympathetic toward the Masonic point of view.

46. See also Stanton (1992, p. 37).

47. See The Apocalypse of Adam in Robinson (1988, p. 280); The Gospel of Phillip in Robinson (1988, p. 146); The Hypostasis of the Archons in Robinson (1988, p. 165). Also see Rasimus (2005).

48. See Charles (1917). The Book of Enoch is not accepted as canonical in Judaism or Christianity, except for the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo and Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Churches. However, the book of Genesis, which is canonical both to Judaism and Christianity, does describe a part of the story also found in the Book of Enoch that includes the angels' mating with mortal women, their producing offspring, the Nephilim, and G-d's decision to destroy all living things except for Noah and his arc (and presumably those fish who were not harmed by flooding) by way of the flood. The Book of Enoch is nonetheless quoted as an authoritative in the New Testament canonical Epistle of Jude.

49. However, Sir Francis was expelled from the Druid Order in 1743.

50. Even Warnke (1991) took this position.

51. Also see Chapter 1.

52. According to Macoy (1989, pp. 170–171), a Masonic writer, the Illuminati were a moral and worthwhile organization who were unfairly maligned.

53. The O.T.O. are one such tradition. Also see L. Bathurst IX° (1990, p. 153).

54. As I indicated earlier, Hermeticism is a form of pagan Gnosticism. In fact, among the Christian Gnostic documents recovered at Nag Hammadi, some Hermetic writings were also found. The term hermetic refers to Hermes Trismegistes, or, in other words, Hermes, thrice blessed.

55. Some say Crowley was not a satanist; others say he was. King (1989b, p. 221) discussed this controversy.

56. See Crowley (1988, pp. 365–384; 1990; 1991, pp. 345–361).

57. Crowley (1991) alleged having performed human ritual sacrifice on average of approximately 150 times every year between 1912 and 1928 (p. 95n). Some writers doubt the literal truth of this allegation but interpret this claim in the light of ritual magic exercises that Crowley engaged in involving masturbation. Such a ritual would not literally consist in the murder of living persons but from a Gnostic point of view would mean killing potential babies. Such behavior would not be sinful to such a Gnostic but in this spiritual tradition was regarded as holy. Such a ritual was thought to release the fragmented particles of the ultimate god (whom the followers of Basilides called Abrasax or Abraxas) from their imprisonment in matter. Such practices were also similar to some of the claims made by Epiphanius mentioned earlier. Preventing souls from becoming trapped in material bodies through conception was a virtuous act to many Gnostics.

59. See Noblitt (1998a) and Short (1989, pp. 96–97).

61. Linda Blood (1994) wrote that Eldred Flowers was second in command in Michael Aquino's Temple of Set.

62. L. Ron Hubbard was intimately involved in the life of Jack Parsons, an eminent California rocket scientist and onetime head of the O.T.O. in Pasadena, California.

63. See also Bainbridge (1978) and Parfrey (2009).

CHAPTER 12

1. It is interesting to note the number of patients diagnosed with both MPD or DID and multiple sclerosis (MS) (and other physical diagnoses including chronic fatigue syndrome, lupus, and other disease processes with sometimes nonspecific etiology). One patient alleged to be a high-level programmer once responded to my observation with the statement, “MS comes from too much electricity.”

2. Guiley (1989) uses the term wizard, which she says is etymologically similar to wise man or woman to describe these magical folk healers.

3. The fact that such folk healers have existed in England as they have all over the world is not evidence that they constitute the remnants of an ancient western European pagan nature-worshipping cult. For example, in Haining’s (1975, p. 92) book An Illustrated History of Witchcraft, he provided a photograph of one of the pages of the book of spells and conjurations of the famous English cunning man James Murrell of Essex (1780–1860). The page shows Hebrew characters, geometric figures, a Seal of Solomon, and two inverted pentagrams, suggesting Kaballistic influence (also possibly a satanic, Luciferian, or other diabolical magical style) rather than true indigenous paganism.

4. See Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology (1974, back cover), and Haining (1975, pp. 18–19, 114).

5. Sanders was considered the founder of the Alexandrian covens, a major faction within Wicca.

6. The word tetragrammaton refers to the Hebrew four-letter word for G-d. Because Hebrew does not write out its vowels, the pronunciation cannot be precisely determined from these four letters. The exact pronunciation of the name of G-d was considered sacred and not to be used by rank-and-file membership. The word tetragrammaton is commonly used in occult rituals that may derive from unauthorized Kaballistic sources and interpretations.

7. The Hebrew word Elohim is plural and is sometimes translated literally as “the gods.” This term is a curiosity because it is found in the beginning of Genesis, although it was usually translated simply as “G-d” rather than “gods.” However, the Gnostics may have used this fact to illustrate their case that the universe had not been created by the ultimate unknowable god but merely by the demiurge and his assisting Archons (who were often construed to be the angels mentioned in the Bible and noncanonical scriptures). For some Gnostics, these Archons, along with the Demiurge (often considered an Archon, himself), may have been the Elohim.

8. However, it is only fair to note that some authors have expressed skepticism, or at least uncertainty, about the claims of Aleister Crowley’s involvement in the origins of Wicca (e.g., Adler, 1986).

9. The term coven derives from the word convent. It is curious that there are so many alleged parallels between occultism and monasticism (e.g., the Knights Templar, the Friars of Medmenham). The number 13 may be significant because there are 13 lunar cycles in a year, or, in other cases, among cults that aim to mock Christianity the number 13 may represent Jesus and his 12 apostles. Curiously, the Friars of Medmenham (i.e., the Hell Fire Club) also utilized rituals where members dressed as monks, and the women who participated in their orgies presented as nuns. Also, the inner circle of the Hell Fire Club consisted of 13 members.

10. Jungian views, along with the concept of subpersonalities, were discussed earlier, in Chapter 8.

1. Survivor Margaret Smith (1993, pp. 78–79) also made this point.

2. However, some Christians might maintain that Satan is the primary representation of evil in the world, regardless of whether other cultures recognize him as such.

3. In The History of the Devil and the Idea of Evil, first published in 1900, Paul Carus (1974) provided a secular and scholarly account of demonology in a variety of cultures, mostly European, many of which were pagan.

4. Moody appears to have inaccurately used the phrase Church of the Trapezoid in referring to the Church of Satan, Order of the Trapezoid.

5. In Linda Blood's book The New Satanists (1994), the author wrote she had a personal relationship with Michael Aquino and wrote a relatively detailed description of the Presidio case.

6. See Guest (1987).

7. For example, by Anton LaVey.

8. A cowl is a more tight-fitting hood-like article of apparel. The one brought to me was made of fabric that was somewhat stretchable and when it was worn it looked something like a ski mask with one opening exposing the wearer's two eyes.

9. See Golston (1992).

10. Symonds, a biographer of Aleister Crowley, and one of the editors of Crowley's autobiography, The Confessions of Aleister Crowley, notes Crowley's conception of himself as a god (Symonds, 1979, p. 21).

11. Notice that the patient often uses the plural term "we" in making reference to herself. This is one of the frequently observed features of multiple personality disorder.

12. In some cases, perhaps many cases, the "gods" described by ritual abuse survivors may reflect not so much satanism as other varieties of occultism, for example, as described in Chapter 11.

13. Although some claim that there is actually a psychic or spiritual power to be achieved in such cults, I have never observed any evidence of that. Instead, the power that can be obtained is (1) the license to inflict harm on others during such ritual activities and (2) the opportunity to learn programming skills to influence or control others by using programming cues (often outside the context of the ritual activities).

14. See, for example, McShane (1993, p. 207).

15. Certain very high-ranking positions are held exclusively by certain individuals. However, in the tradition of some Gnostics (see Pagels, 1981), a variety of individuals may have some rotating roles of relative importance (e.g., priestess or high priestess).

16. Some authors have argued that the Cathari (whose name means "pure ones") could never have engaged in the horrible rituals identical or similar to satanists. However, the process of dissociation works best when there are markedly different (e.g., religious) views present in the same individual. I have previously explained that some vodoun cults specifically require that their members also be Roman Catholics. Additionally, one might argue that one (misguided) method of achieving the strict kind of purity followed by the "perfect" of the Cathari, which included absolute celibacy, would be to occasionally dissociate as some other "person" or "spirit" who could act out the unacceptable sexual and aggressive urges of the "perfect one," who would later be amnestic for the transgressions committed by his or her alters. Additionally, the "perfect one," in part satiated and, to some degree, traumatized, became adverse to further sexual and aggressive stimulation or gratification. Girard (1972) argued that the violent rituals sometimes found in religions and cults were devised to provide a way of controlling and redirecting socially deviant behaviors. Also, from a point of view more sympathetic to the Cathari, Guirdham (1977) argued that not all Cathari were expected to live a pure life. The priestly parfait were expected to live an ascetic life but the croyants, or rank-and-file believers, had no such duty.

17. According to Michelet (1992), some medieval folk were driven toward satanism and witchcraft out of a sense of desperation. Such extreme feelings were in responses to the deprivations and horrors of medieval life, including the evils inherent in the feudal system.

18. It may be interesting to note that the word discipline derives from the word disciple.

19. See also Chavez (1974) and Weigle (1976).

20. See Flint (1991) and Thomas (1971).

21. That is, not assigned to a particular parish and thus not under any close supervision.

22. See Frazer (1963, pp. 61–62).

23. See Hyatte (1984).

24. These historical events have been interpreted from several different perspectives. See King (1989b, 1991), Lyons (1988), Mossiker (1969), Robbins (1981), Russell (1988, 1991), Stevens (1991), and Summers (1992).

25. The inverted cross so often equated with satanism may have actually been a Gnostic symbol. The Gnostics viewed the cross with contempt, as a Roman Catholic symbol of the material instrument used to create the illusion that the spiritual Jesus had been killed.

26. For a recent English translation, see J. K. Huysmans (1986).

27. The word Palladian has several meanings. In architecture, it refers to a style developed from the work of Andrea Palladio, a celebrated architect of the 16th century, who began his career as a skilled mason. In occultism, the term has referred to the Palladium, which in Greco-Roman mythology and religion was “the scepter of Priam, in the likeness of a male sex organ” (Graves, 1955, p. 266). According to Walker (1983), this instrument was used in a ritual to “marry” the Vestal Virgins to the phallic god of the Palladium in Rome. The expression Palladian also refers to an allegedly Luciferian-Masonic sect in Charleston, South Carolina, which was described by Leo Taxil and later denied by him (See Howard, 1989; King, 1991; Waite, 1970; Webb, 1974). It is also unclear whether the alleged Palladian cult in Charleston is related to the Order of Palladium, also called the Sovereign-Council of Wisdom established in Paris on May 20, 1737, and described by Ragou (see Spence, 1993, p. 314), which according to Macoy (1989) first appeared in Douay, France.

28. See Summers (1992, pp. 152–153).

CHAPTER 14

1. However, if we restate the argument to say that allegations have been made that some destructive cults operate at a national or international level, then, at least, we have articulated a problem that is easier to test.

2. California came later. See Ad Veritatem IX (1990, pp. 95−97).

3. See http://oto-usa.org/wordpress/.

4. Although Crowley's writings refer to child sacrifice, O.T.O. members deny that Crowley, or their organization, have engaged in such rituals. In one of their newsletters, an article appears that describes the legal duty to report any suspected child abuse (see http://lib.oto-usa.org/agape/agape.7.2.pdf).

5. Ironically, the book in which this misinformed chapter appears is highly recommended by Ken Lanning (1992).

6. See also Deborah Lipstadt's works, Beyond Belief (1986) and Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (1993). These books attested to the significant denial that accompanied the murder of six million Jews and the current revisionist efforts to rewrite history in this spirit of denial. This illustrates the tendency that many of us have to deny crimes of humanity, including ritual abuse.

7. See Christopher Simpson's (1993) The Splendid Blond Beast. He cites the Office of the United States Chief Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (1946, p. 753).

8. In Parkin's (1987) book Memory and Amnesia, he wrote that amnesia for crime "has been widely documented" (p. 162), although citing a study by Taylor and Kopelman (1984): "Amnesia was not observed in any person charged with a non-violent crime" (Parkin, 1987, p. 162).

9. Wasil-Grimm relies almost exclusively on the testimony of recanters who appear to have a self-serving agenda, members of the FMSF, and other known supporters of the FMSF philosophy, to support her thesis. Her book is notable for its lack of a critical and impartial examination of the arguments.

10. Pamela Freyd's "anonymous" story was cited in Goldstein (1992). Her daughter Jennifer Freyd objected because there was sufficient biographical information released by her mother that her privacy had been compromised.

11. Additional information regarding Underwager may be found in Michael Newton's book Raising Hell.

12. See Geraci (1993, p. 12).

13. See Crook, and Dean (1999) and Pope (1997).

14. See Dallam (2001).

15. By Ganaway's own report, featured on ABC's Primetime, he was engaged by a number of insurance companies to review claims for services rendered by mental health professionals to individuals who alleged histories of child abuse.

16. Even Michael Yapko acknowledged in his book Suggestions of Abuse (1994, p. 91) that "therapists and researchers have no reliable means to distinguish authentic from false memories." It is not surprising that this book is an indictment against therapists who respect their patient's reports of child abuse memories. He noted the support and assistance of many of the members of the FMSF advisory board and thoughtfully provided the address and telephone number of the FMSF headquarters (p. 213) in a chapter subheading titled "Some Therapy Guidelines for the Falsely Accused."

CHAPTER 15

1. A GAF of 21–30 indicates behavior that is considerably influenced by delusions or hallucinations or serious impairment in communication or judgment (e.g., sometimes incoherent, acts grossly inappropriately, suicidal preoccupation) or inability to function in almost all areas (e.g., stays in bed all day, no job, no home, or friends). A GAF of 31–40 indicates some impairment in reality testing or communication (e.g., speech is at times illogical, obscure, or irrelevant) or major impairments in several areas, such as work or school, family relations, judgment, thinking, or mood (e.g., depressed man avoids friends, neglects family, and is unable to work; child frequently beats up younger children, is defiant at home, and is failing at school). See Quick Reference to the Diagnostic Criteria from Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-IV, p. 48).

2. Ibid.

3. Although the Mental Health Parity Act of 1996 (effective January 1998) was designed to ensure that benefits for psychiatric services were available on a par with other health services, “loopholes” in the law have created additional problems for the insured. Previously, insurers were allowed to limit psychiatric services within policies such that they could provide a policy that allowed $1,000,000 in benefits exclusive of psychiatric services, and limited psychiatric services to $50,000 per lifetime. With the Mental Health Parity Act, many insurers are limiting the number of visits a patient can have with a mental health professional. This is clearly not in the best interests of individuals suffering from chronic and debilitating psychiatric symptoms. Under the new Affordable Health Care law, all such caps have been removed along with restrictions based on preexisting conditions.

4. While one of my staff was visiting a psychiatric inpatient unit at the nearby medical surgical hospital to pick up paperwork for newly admitted patients, one of the nurses commented to her that one of the psychiatrists was conducting “wave” therapy. When my assistant asked what that meant, the nurse explained that when the doctor walked through the unit and waved at the patient, he charged $300 a day. This was evidently a widely known practice among many of the psychiatry staff.

5. Allegations of patient brokering, unjustified lengthy hospitalizations, use of physical restraints, and malpractice resulted in state and federal investigations and ultimately resulted in a multimillion dollar settlement to former patients as well as substantial fines against the facility, its parent company, and its medical staff. See http://www.businessweek.com/stories/1993–10–17/put-the-head-in-the-bed-and-keep-it-there.

6. The Texas Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation (MHMR) merged with other specialty state health agencies in 2003 and became part of the Texas Department of State Health Services. At the time we wrote the second edition of Cult and Ritual Abuse (2000), it was estimated that there were in excess of 40,000 people awaiting services through MHMR. Things have not improved much since the current governor, Rick Perry, and the Republican-dominated state legislature has made deep cuts to social welfare programs and have thus far refused to participate in the Affordable Healthcare law’s insurance exchange that would provide states with additional federal dollars to pay for Medicaid health insurance for its impoverished citizens.

7. In spite of the divisiveness in the community of mental health professionals, there seems to be much agreement among those who work with dissociative disorders that ritual abuse is a genuine, rather than imaginary, problem (see Perry, 1992).

8. The term “high priest” is not necessarily indicative of a high rank in many cultic organizations.

CHAPTER 16

1. These patients volunteered in exchange for assurances that their images and voices would be digitally obscured to prevent identification.

2. In Lessons in Evil, Lessons from the Light, Ken Lanning was described as obstructive and unhelpful in the investigation of this particular patient's allegations of abuse (Feldman, 1993, pp. 297–298).

3. The court did not find the therapist guilty of implanting false memories of abuse in the patient's mind. However, the therapist was ascribed a portion of responsibility in the case because he kept insufficient patient records to demonstrate the appropriateness of his therapy strategy. This exemplifies a common ethical dilemma among therapists who frequently must choose between documenting allegations by patients that may be self-incriminating and could cause considerable hardship to the patient in the event of their release via subpoena in legal proceedings such as divorce or custody hearings, or by keeping more cryptic, less informative notes that protect the patient's confidentiality but which may leave the therapist at risk.

4. The case of Father William Porter, convicted of sexually molesting many children over the course of his career, comes immediately to mind. Other instances include scandals involving Father Rudy Kos, and Reverends Jim Bakker and Jimmy Swaggart.

5. Given that it is impossible to know whether the accused were innocent or guilty, do we not have a moral obligation to refrain from making assertions one way or the other?

6. We visited with Marymae Cioffi in Los Angeles and she provided us with copies of the Eberle's work. Until actually seeing these publications, we were somewhat skeptical of this story. It is still incredible to us that a national television talk show host would allow child pornographers to critique a case of ritual abuse while suppressing the history of the authors' previous work in child pornography. Eberle's book is cited as one of various "sources by reliable authors and researchers" by Hans Sebald (1995, p. 245) after a warning that "a lot of utter nonsense and distorted information has been published on the topic" (p. 245) in Sebald's book Witch-Children: From Salem Witch-Hunts to Modern Courtrooms.

7. See Bennetts (1993).

8. See Rose (1993).

9. See Harrison (1993).

10. See Wright (1993a, 1993b).

11. Now a convicted perpetrator.

12. Dr. Perry's name may be familiar to those who have read Maury Terry's book The Ultimate Evil. He is the husband of ritual murder victim Arlis Perry. Not only did Dr. Perry supervise the care of the Gilmer children, he also headed the treatment team charged with the care of the child survivors of the Branch Davidian compound.

13. According to a report in The Gilmer Mirror, the disappearance was originally reported by the newspaper on November 9, 1995, but was not confirmed by the Gilmer Police Department until November 16, 1995. See Overton (1994).

14. These sisters who are the aunts of some of the child victims supported the allegations made by the children alleging abuse. They reported that they had been victimized in much the same way and by the same perpetrators identified by the children in the Gilmer case.

15. It is interesting to note that the Dallas Morning News is the only daily newspaper in Dallas and is owned by the same parent company that owns Channel 8, the local ABC television affiliate.

CHAPTER 17

1. For some of these groups, she preferred the term “organization” rather than “cult.”

2. See Chapter 16, where the Fran’s Day Care case was introduced.

3. At that time, Texas did not have a law in the penal code criminalizing ritual abuse. A law was introduced into the penal code by the Texas legislature a short while later, only to be removed by Texas attorney general Dan Morales on the basis that the terms were vague and poorly defined, thereby making the law unenforceable. However, other states have enacted laws criminalizing ritual abuse, including: California Penal Code Section 667.83 (1995), Idaho Code Vol. 4, Crimes Section 18–1506A, Illinois Revised Statute 5/12–33, Louisiana Revised Statute Section 14:107–1, and Montana Code Annotated Section 27–2-217 and 45–5-627.

4. Although analog studies have investigated isolated effects of influence on children’s statements, there have been insufficient investigations of the influence of children when the following factors are involved: actual psychological treatment circumstances, allegations of ritual abuse (or other equally bizarre claims), and the effects of suggestion on implicit memories.

5. J. Smith, “Believing the Children,” The Austin Chronicle, March 27, 2009. http://www.austinchronicle.com/news/2009–03–27/759086/.

6. As mentioned earlier, I had been invited to speak at the First Annual Christian Conference on MPD and SRA. I presented on the subject of ethical and forensic concerns regarding the evaluation and treatment of ritual abuse. During my presentation, I played a videotape of a patient explaining how some cults are able to confound jury trials by signaling both during the jury selection process (in order to stack the deck) and during the trial itself. I also played a videotape of the signaling that appeared to be occurring during the Keller trial.

7. Another author who has described personal experiences involving irregularities in the judicial process regarding allegations of ritual abuse is former state senator John DeCamp (1992) of Nebraska.

8. Following the judge’s decision, the children were placed in his chambers to await the completion of documents to transfer custody. The children went on a destructive rampage in the chambers and had to be hospitalized. Upon their discharge, they were removed to their father’s home but were so uncontrollable, their father voluntarily relinquished his parental rights, and the children were returned to their mother.

9. A few months following the hearing, the judge who heard the visitation amendment accepted a partnership in the firm of the counsel representing the father in this case.

10. In many cases, this is true because they are dissociated themselves.

11. Because of confidentiality concerns, I am unable to present additional evidence regarding this man’s dissociation for at least part of the crimes for which he was convicted.

12. See Smith (1993).

13. The DSM-5 uses the term factitious disorder imposed on another instead of Munchausen’s syndrome by proxy.

14. Technically speaking, the CPS caseworker was not a licensed professional who legally had the authority to make a psychiatric diagnosis. Unfortunately, such individuals involved in a child protective agency will sometimes take on more authority than they are qualified by training and experience to assume. Often other mental health professionals will simply go along with such situations because of their desire to cultivate referrals from the agency.

15. See Laurence and Weinhouse (1994, pp. 264–292) for a discussion of the gender bias in women’s mental health, which may account for the disparity in the court-ordered psychologist’s interpretation of Emma’s psychological test scores and the observations of other mental health professionals working with the family.

16. Almost a year after this case, the court-ordered psychologist was arrested when, in the course of another of her court-appointed evaluations, she reportedly admonished a child for making allegations against her father. There was evidence to suggest that the child was indeed being victimized, and the therapist was in violation of her duty to protect the child and inform authorities of the child's complaint.

17. The national organization Alliance for the Rights of Children (ARCH) was formerly called Friends of Elizabeth Morgan.

18. The Social Security Administration does not recognize any professional other than a physician or psychologist as a qualified treating source.

21. Under the regulations, individuals are entitled to Medicare benefits 24 months from the onset of their disabling condition. However, there is a five-month waiting period that brings the total delay between onset and approval to 29 months.

17. See Bromley and Shupe (1981) and Shupe and Bromley (1985).

18. To avoid confusion, I rarely use the term deprogramming in reference to the forcible removal of individuals from cults. The term exit counseling is, in my opinion, a more accurate descriptor for those who use questionable strategies to lure or abduct adults from their life choice. I reserve the term “deprogramming” to describe the process whereby control over dissociated mental states is returned to the dissociated person. Forcible indoctrination by a “deprogrammer” is simply another form of programming.

19. A number of encyclopedic reference works have been published that attempt to identify the various cults. Unfortunately, due to the authors’ biases, some groups that have been so identified object strenuously. Nevertheless, these resources do make an attempt to describe groups for which there is a consensus of opinion that they meet the criteria for cult or cult-like groups. See Larson (1989a, 1989c); Marrs (1990); Martin (1980); Mather and Nichols (1993); McDowell and Stewart (1992); and Nichols, Schmidt, and Mather (2010).

20. See Flynn and Gerhardt (1989).

21. This category may surprise some readers, but I’ve heard such reports from dissociative clients and from other therapists who work with this patient population. There is also a body of literature that addresses this alleged problem. The Manchurian Candidate (Condon, 1959) is one such fictional account. However, there are nonfiction accounts as well, including the following: Deep Black (Burrows, 1986), Operation Mind Control (Bowart, 1994), The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence (Marchetti & Marks, 1974), and The Search for the “Manchurian Candidate”: The CIA and Mind Control (Marks, 1979). These books recounted the CIA’s interest in mind control techniques and its allegedly dubious methods of exploring mind control. Also of note is former Nebraska state senator John DeCamp’s (1992) report of a government cover-up of a case involving ritual abuse allegations in which he was involved as an attorney. In her book Lessons in Evil, Lessons from the Light (1993), Feldman described an investigation of her client’s allegations of ritual abuse that appeared to be obstructed by the FBI. experimentation, see also Albarelli's (2009) A Terrible Mistake: The Murder of Frank Olson and the CIA's Secret Cold War Experiments.

24. See Ehrenreich and English (1973), Eisler (1987), and Greer (1971).

25. See Stover and Nightingale (1985) and Gil (1969). Amazingly, Gil, referencing a nationwide survey on the physical abuse of children, wrote:

> For a number of years the "abused" or "battered" child has elicited very strong concern on the part of professionals in law, medicine, social work, and child care. And one consequence of this concern has been the establishment of legislative machinery and a reporting system. Good epidemiological research reveals, however, that child abuse, despite the intense response that it has aroused, has, in fact, relatively low prevalence and that, by implication, the funds and manpower that it now absorbs more appropriately be devoted to a more significant cause of childhood injury. (p. 857)
